On another occasion I was bringing down the American Express train from Albany. It was so black and foggy that I could not see farther than the length of two cars ahead. When we had gone about a quarter of the trip we were stopped by signals, and I was informed that a freight train had broken in two, and that the first part had gone about fifteen miles ahead and was probably on a siding. From that point on, as you may imagine, I ran at reduced speed. We had gone a little more than fifteen miles without discovering the fugitive, when suddenly and without reason the thought came to me that it was time to stop.

"Elliot," said I to the fireman, "we've gone far enough without finding out where that freight train is."

I shut off steam and applied the brakes, and at that very instant the fireman shouted, "Great Heavens! What's that ahead of us?"

We had stopped within a car's length of the freight train. There was no light on the rear car, and in another second our train would have been wrecked. This kind of precaution does not come under any head that I know of. I do not know what you would call it, so I shall set it down as "intuition," but it is a pretty valuable quality for an engineer to have on such occasions.

Another time I was going north with the South Western Limited. As we rounded a sharp curve I saw a gang of trackmen carrying a rail across the track. Realizing instantly that it would be impossible for them to get over in time to clear the track unless I slowed down, I applied the brakes and whistled before shutting off steam. They heard the whistle, dropped the rail and saved themselves. The rail went under the pilot and slid along the track for fifty feet or more, but did no serious damage. If I had waited to shut off steam before applying the brakes and sounding the whistles, the men would have been killed and the engine probably derailed, as we were going at the rate of a mile a minute when we came upon them.

These three illustrations show the necessity for instantaneous action when emergency arises. There is no time for delay. On the engineer's judgment depends the safety of his passengers. At the rate of sixty miles an hour a train covers about ninety feet in a second — which is twenty feet more than the length of an ordinary passenger car. This will give the reader an idea of the necessity for action as rapid as thought itself when danger confronts the train.

SHOOTING THROUGH A SNOW DRIFT

The life of an engineer is not always a rosy one. Sometimes we are called out on some "old mill" whose flues are stopped up in bitter cold weather, with icicles hanging from the grate bars, and are required to make as good time as with an engine in first-class condition. Here comes into play all those fine points in locomotive handling that have been acquired during an engineer's earlier experience. A resourceful engineer, aided by a competent fireman, is often able to make the trip on schedule time, and if he does his work well he is not called "upon the carpet before the super" the next day to explain any failure to come up to the mark.

These weather conditions demand the patience of Job. They bring out all the qualities that have been formed during the long years of plodding, thorough industry of his apprenticeship. In extreme cold weather, on stormy days when the snow is piled mountain high over the tracks, as was the case in the blizzard of 1888, an engineer is called on often to do double work under circumstances that are almost appalling. At such times the engineer is face to face with emergencies from the round-house to the end of his trip, and the experienced man who has added theoretical knowledge to his practical training is often able to succeed where a less proficient man fails.

Take the blizzard of 1888 for an example. The road had been tied up for three days. I took the first train out of the Grand Central Depot. Superintendent Voorhees was in the cab with me. Only one track was open, if you can call a track open that was covered with snow, and at times we were completely buried beneath the drifts. At Kingsbridge there is a sharp curve and rock cut, where it is customary to slow down. As I started to shut off steam Mr. Voorhees called to me.

"Don't slow down," he said, "the track is buried in snow round the curve. I live here and know."

So I sent the engine ahead at full speed and we shot through a drift that was higher than the cab roof. Had we slowed down we might have been stalled. It took us nine hours to plow our way to Albany and I was wringing wet from the snow that poured into the cab window.

During this same blizzard many engines were stalled in the drift and the engineer and fireman were kept busy feeding the tank with snow, instead of water, to keep the engine alive and warm the cars. On occasions during the winter hours are sometimes doubled and even trebled, especially in the through freight service. I have known of men who have worked continuously on these trains for forty hours or longer. But these occasions, happily, are rare.

In spite of these hardships and of accidents railroad men as a rule live quite as long as other men. Most life insurance companies now readily accept firemen and engineers as risks at a slightly advanced premium. By careful train management and the improved roadbeds of the present day, loss of life has been reduced to a minimum.

HOURS AND PAY OF ENGINEERS

A railroad engineer is a good deal like a soldier. He is always working under orders. Nine-tenths of the employees of the transportation department are seldom under the direct supervision of their immediate superiors. From the moment I leave the round-house until I pull into it again at the end of the round trip I am constantly under orders that must be obeyed to the letter. Except in cases of emergency every action is laid down in the rules of the road. I always do certain things at certain points in the run, never before and never after that point is reached.

Such in outline are the duties of a locomotive engineer. The pay is fully as high, if not higher, than that paid to other classes of skilled labor. A switch engineer on the best roads gets about $100 the month; a freight engineer from $140 to $150, and a passenger engineer from $150 to $175.

Switch engineers work ten hours the day every day in the week, with one hour for dinner.

Freight engineers work ten hours the day, the week through.

Local passenger engineers average eight hours work the day, with three Sundays off each month.

Through passenger engineers average from fourteen to sixteen hours every other day. Their working time includes the lay-off at the end of the single trip at the other end of the run.

Upon the subject of education for engineers a volume might be written and not exhaust the subject. To begin with, no engineer can know too much, and the more knowledge a beginner has the better it is for him. A college education is better than a grammar-school training, and a theoretical education along technical lines is better than a collegiate education without that feature. Many of the best engineers in the country are making or have made up the deficiencies in their early training by taking special courses of instruction in mechanical branches after they were already far advanced in their calling. I am now completing a course in theoretical mechanics, and if I should see any signs of a prospective change in motive power from steam to electricity I would at once fit myself to be a practical electrical engineer. That is the trade I have set my son to learn. Of course a beginner who has an education in these branches is better fitted, everything else being equal, to succeed in the railroad business than one who has not. But this need not discourage a man, as there is always time for study, and no man is too old to learn. Theory, however, is not everything, as I have tried to show. It must be coupled with practical experience to accomplish the best results, and this experience can only be acquired as I have acquired it and as thousands of other men have acquired it—by years of hard and patient work on the deck of a locomotive.

WHAT EDUCATION DOES FOR RAILROAD MEN

There are other and immediate rewards offered to the conscientious and studious engineer than promotion in other departments. For instance, the railroad company shows particular favor to the best-informed engineers, and that in itself is as gratifying as an increase in pay would be. Suppose a superintendent of motive power contemplates making a test of the efficiency of certain kinds of coal, special grades of oil, recent inventions in tools or new devices in engine construction. He details an engineer on whom he can rely to conduct the experiment. Upon the result of this engineer's test the alteration may be adopted or rejected. When a railroad plans a new train service, the run is divided between the most reliable engineers on the line, and the schedule of time is fixed in accordance with the time they make on that trial trip. The management trusts its best men, and this confidence is a remuneration to be prized as much as a pecuniary reward.

There is another result of education which is far-reaching in its good not only to railroad men at large but to the country as well. Education quickens a man's intelligence and broadens his views. He can look on both sides of a question where formerly he could see only one. This broadness of vision is of inestimable value in time of labor troubles. It enables the men to consider the matter of a strike with calmness and fairness. Then, too, a railroad company trusts its men according as they have proved their trustworthiness, and when the settlement of a dispute rests between two parties, each having a certain measure of confidence in the other, a fair solution is more than probable.

The manifold advantages of education have been fully realized by most railroad managements throughout the country, and they have come to its aid in a manner both generous and practical. In almost every large city railroad clubs with reading-rooms, libraries and restaurants have been established for trainmen within the last few years. Most of them are under the direction of the Railroad Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association, and they offer benefits to the men that were not even dreamed of when I entered the service. In these clubs a man may spend his leisure time as comfortably and as profitably as in his own home. Indeed they offer advantages that few homes possess. The libraries are large and well selected. The reading-rooms contain the current periodicals, daily newspapers and the best class of railroad journals. It is in the pages of these trade publications that the richest field for technical study is found. The latest inventions and improvements are recorded there, and many an engineer has discovered in some article the practical solution of a problem that has long confronted him. Two hours in a club reading-room or library are equal to a lecture in a class-room, provided the desire to learn is in the man.

There is still another benefit in these institutions which should be emphasized. They minimize the temptation to dissipation that formerly met the railroad man at the farther end of his trip. There was a time when the round-house and the railroad depot were the only places where a man away from home could spend his lay-off time unless he went to a hotel or a liquor saloon. No engineer who hopes for success can afford to drink. Sobriety and study are two of the chief factors in his advancement, and to-day the incentives to this end are as nearly perfect as man can make them.

The Winter Nights at Home

By Joe Lincoln

A STRETCH of hill and valley swathed thick in robes of white,
The buildings blots of blackness, the windows gems of light,
A moon, now clear, now hidden, as in its headlong race
The north wind drags the cloud-wrack in tatters o'er its face;
Mailed twigs that click and clatter upon the tossing tree,
And, like a giant's chanting, the deep voice of the sea,
As 'mid the stranded ice-cakes the bursting breakers foam—
The old familiar picture, a winter night at home.

The old familiar picture—the firelight rich and red,
The lamplight soft and mellow, the shadowed beams o'erhead;
And father with his paper, and mother calm and sweet,
Mending the red yarn stockings stubbed through by careless feet;
The little attic bedroom, the window 'neath the eaves,
Decked by the Frost King's brushes with silvered sprays and leaves;
The rattling sash which gossips with idle gusts that roam
About the ice-fringed gables—the winter nights at home.

What would I give to climb them—those narrow stairs so steep—
And reach that little chamber, and sleep a boy's sweet sleep!
What would I give to view it—that old house by the sea—
Filled with the dear lost faces who made it home for me!
The sobbing wind sings softly the song of long ago,
And in that country churchyard the graves are draped in snow,
But there, beyond the arches of Heaven's star-jeweled dome,
Perhaps they know I'm dreaming of winter nights at home.

Playing Chess in Texas

A MAN who won a reputation for cool daring and almost eccentric fearlessness along a thousand miles of the southwestern border died in Texas a short time ago—died, too, in bed, like a Christian. This man was A. L. Parrott, formerly a sergeant in McNelly's company of Texas Rangers. In 1875, when McNelly and thirty of his men pursued a great band of raiding cattle thieves to the Rio Grande, only to find that the raiders had crossed into Mexico, it was Parrott who swam the river while the thieves were swarming on the other side, stole a boat from under their very noses, and rowed back, the Mexicans keeping up a merry fusilade at him.

One night about six months after Parrott left the State service he was sitting in a house in a little town in southwest Texas, playing chess with a friend. It was a warm night, and the chess-board was on a table close to an open window. Parrott had the white men. His queen was in a direct line with the black king, but a black knight was between the two pieces. It was Parrott's move. Suddenly there was a sharp report outside and a bullet whistled in through the window, hit the black knight and buried itself in the wall. Parrott had been bending over the board, and the bullet was evidently intended for his head. But for a few seconds he did not stir. He saw the black knight suddenly vanish. Then in his peculiar drawling, hesitating way he said: "Check!"

Those Who Take Early and Hold Long

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY reports in his Apologie for Poetrie a fine saying from the mouth of one John Pietro Pugliano, an esquire at the court of an Emperor, who was giving him some lessons in horsemanship. Speaking of cavalry, he said that they were the noblest of soldiers, "speedy goers and strong abiders."

A certain pithy quality in those five words may easily suggest the very highest evidence of human efficiency. Men who go quickly to the point are admirable, and those who hold the ground when they capture it are considered successful; but the man whom all the world accepts as its permanent model of efficiency is the one who wins early and holds late—the speedy goers and strong abiders. We wonder at Keats, at Charles XII of Sweden, and other youthful prodigies of genius; but the sane and hale old heroes, like Tennyson, Gladstone, Goethe and Angelo, the mighty men with the aspect of hoary maturity, grip our highest admiration with a steadfast power that is godlike. They won a great place in the flower of youth and kept it serenely through a long life.

Sir Philip Sidney himself challenges but the warm, romantic side of our nature; he was never more than a beautiful and chivalrous boy; his character promised far more than it might have filled; we cannot be sure that at eighty he would have held the head of age loftily above the infirmities of common humanity. When Oliver Wendell Holmes spun the fine filaments of his humor in the heyday of octogenarian boyhood he somehow won a lap from his competitors in the race of life, and he went to his grave, as Bryant did, with the air of one who "lies down to pleasant sleep."

Perhaps it is due to an inherent strain of wisdom that a man discovers himself early and lays hold at once upon the safeguards which insure permanent success at the outset of his career and at the same time conserve his natural forces for a long and steady course. The dignity of a really great nature refuses itself to the insistent demands of all untempered ambitions; it makes haste slowly, like the influence of planets and suns; but you feel how it outstrips the flare of rocket and petty meteor. Ages do not try the placid and vast patience of the man who is to be a master.

If the young person were but truly teachable, if the wisdom of the elders, crystallized by the heat of that terrible friction which we call experience, could actually be turned to the account of youth in its full-blooded prime, what a change would soon come over the countenance of life! What if the boy of twenty could actually stand sure-footed on the lofty eminence of the successful but time-scarred man of sixty—expand the horizon of efficiency from the circle of the college campus to a full periphery of manly power; what if—— But let us not go off on such a tangent. It serves best our practical turn to keep pace only with possibilities.

We may, even if the process be almost invisibly slow, train the generations to be "speedy goers and strong abiders." The task is physical as much as spiritual. Nature has no use for soul without body in this life. The source of sane sentiment is in the core of a healthy and well-kept body. Not that the sick and puny physique cannot house a great spirit; but how much efficiency is lost when the blood runs with a watery pallor and the muscles hang in flabby folds. The man and his soul must be boon companions and lusty comrades in arms. The body must sturdily abet the spirit in all the brave aspirations of life. If we would be speedy goers and strong abiders we must look to the physical basis of efficiency while we are shaping the course of the mind. When Alfred Tennyson "crossed the bar" the voice of age sent down from the loftiest billow of the outward-rolling tide a strain as magically fresh and powerful as any ever flung from the rosy lips of youth.

People Who Save

IT IS frequently said that the working class, so called, is the first to suffer from a panic or other cause of business stagnation and the last to recover from such misfortune; it is further said that in good times this class spends as fast as it earns. If this be true, there must be something radically wrong in the reports of the savings banks of the several States, as collated and published by the Comptroller of the Currency.

From the Comptroller's statistics it appears that in 1892, the year before the last panic began, the savings banks had about four and three-quarter million depositors, with more than seventeen hundred million dollars to their credit. In 1893—the panic year—the number of depositors increased nearly sixty thousand, with a credit of almost seventy million dollars. In 1894, the hardest year of the period of depression, the number of depositors was reduced by less than five thousand, and the deposits decreased only thirty-seven million dollars. In 1895, while the depression still continued, the number of depositors exceeded that of any preceding year by about forty-five thousand, and the deposits became about twenty-five million dollars greater than in any year before. In 1896, business still being stagnant and a Presidential contest under way, about two hundred thousand additional depositors appeared, with nearly one hundred millions in money. In 1897 and 1898 there were large gains, while last year brought the savings banks about three hundred thousand new depositors, and the moneys on deposit increased by more than one hundred and sixty millions, the grand total for the year being more than five and one-half million depositors and twenty-two hundred and thirty million dollars.

In all the years named—the bad as well as the good—the average of the money on deposit exceeded three hundred and fifty dollars per individual. It has often been said that the working class in America is not so economical and prudent as the same class in Europe. On the other side of the Atlantic the number of savings bank depositors, in proportion to population, is greater than here; nevertheless, the entire sum on deposit in all European savings banks is not twice as great as that in the United States, the average per individual is not half so great as it is here, nor does the average of the most prosperous European states much exceed one-half of our own, although in these states the small farmers use the savings banks to an extent unknown in farming sections of the United States.

These figures prove beyond doubt that the working class in the United States does not squander its money, and that it is so successful at accumulating that even a long period of business depression cannot ruin it, for, as is shown above, the worst year of the recent "hard times" reduced the aggregate of savings bank depositors by only about two per cent., and this, too, at a time when in every State of the Union the bank balances of thousands of persons supposed to be well-to-do dwindled and disappeared. It is true that not all savings bank depositors belong to what is called the working class. It is also true that some working men drink their possible surplus instead of saving it, but after all possible exceptions and allowances are made, the savings bank statements indicate that as a rule the American workingman is well paid, industrious, provident, economical and thrifty; he is better off than the champions of his own class admit, and he has far more self-denial, self-command and character than are attributed to him by his critics.

Telephones in the Country

A QUIET revolution is taking place in Western country life, which promises to accomplish results within a year more important and far-reaching than any since the advent of the transcontinental railroads. Already the pioneer life of the isolated farmer has disappeared and the tide of industrial and educational advance has swept over the Northwest. The national telephone system, which until recently extended its arms only to the large cities, has within a few months entered the houses of thousands of Western farmers and bound together city and country, producer and consumer, in bonds of actual contact and constant communication.

To the economist the results of this extension through the rich farm lands of the Northwest are of most profound interest, and must be the basis of an entire revision of the theories of the relations between producer and consumer. The immobility of the country is destroyed at a blow, and the farmer is raised from a passive agency to an aggressive economic force.

To the sociologist the results are no less important, as the telephone does away with the seclusion of rural life, binds together scattered communities, creates social interests, and destroys the barrier between city and country. Henceforth the country is but a vast suburb, in touch with the metropolis of its neighborhood, unified by the voice of one leader.

It is only within the past year that the farmer has opened his eyes to the possibilities of the telephone, but since he has recognized them there has been such a demand upon the telephone companies that it has been impossible to fill the orders, and local geniuses have built lines out of fence wire and china knobs. No farmer is considered up to date without his telephone. In the early morning the rattle of the bell arouses him to the day's work, and he hastens to care for his cattle. After breakfast he calls the post office several miles away, and inquires for his mail. There he is sure to hear the news of the town and to have a talk with some of the gossips of the place.

On the great ranches of the Southwest a use of the telephone more startling and really novel has been made. There, in the past few years, the vast free range of the early days has been checkered by the dreaded wire fence. Across the old trails of ante-railroad days, around the green-edged springs where wild herds used to water, and about the choicest pastures of the range, the wire fence—the enemy of cowboy and hunter, of wild beast and roving cattle—has drawn its magic circle. The ranchman of to-day has made this dreaded wire do him a noble service. He has made of it a line of communication across the barren hills from cattle round-up or sheep-dip to the ranch-house. He is a strange mingling of the old West and the new West, this rancher with the telephone.

All the forces of rural society are organized and controlled by the little wire which bobs over the hills and down the shady lanes. Through the telephone it seems inevitable that the farmer will assume a new economic position. Keeping in touch with the market, he is able to dispose of produce directly to the city dealer or to the consumer without the assistance of any middleman. Fluctuations in the market will be felt immediately by the producer, and he will be able to prevent any advantage being taken of him. He may talk to his town buyer and to his city broker the same hour and sell his produce at the top of the market.

This was recently shown in the broom-corn district of Illinois in a most graphic way. This district, which lies in the southern part of the State, was visited by buyers who offered sixty dollars per ton for broom-corn. This was the ruling price at the end of the previous season, and was generally accepted. The buyers had almost covered the district, buying the entire output, when an official of the telephone company, quick to see the possibilities of the corner, caused the farmers who had telephones to be notified that the price had risen and that they had better consult the market. These more enterprising farmers consulted the magnates of Troy, Ohio, the centre of the broom-corn market, and, as a result, sold their crop for four times the price paid to their neighbors, two hundred and forty dollars a ton. This lesson of progress has sunk deep into the broom-corn district, and, needless to say, every farmer in the county has been convinced of the practical value of the telephone.

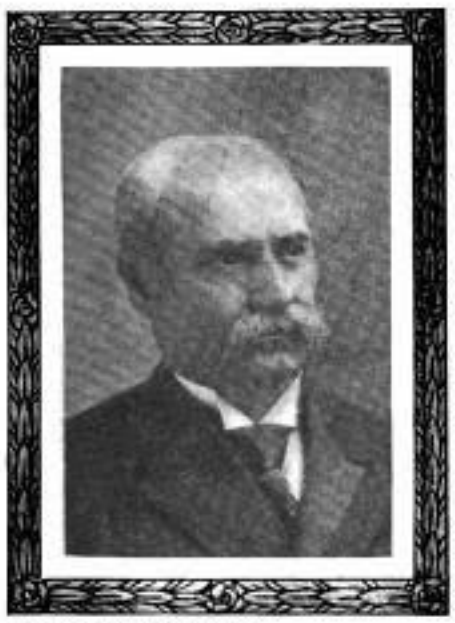
The Things that Really Happen



MANY of the great fighters and men of action, after perils on land and sea and heroic deeds that live in history, found commonplace ends. It seems curious that a General should go through dozens of battles unscathed and then choke to death on a peach stone. It seems wrong that a man should endure the dangers of an adventurous life and then become the victim of a folding bed. But all these things happen, and it was hardly necessary for the papers of the country to poke so much good-natured fun at Captain Sigsbee, who, after being blown up in the Maine and having a conspicuous part in a war with a foreign country, met his first mishap with a Brooklyn trolley car. Of course, we understand that the Brooklyn trolley car is a peculiarly aggressive and murderous specimen of its kind, but there is no reason why it should not have had more respect for such a hero as Captain Sigsbee. After all, the things that really happen are the things we never expect. The pert, freckled, snub-nosed girl, who never knew her lessons, in after years marries a millionaire, while the lovely, modest belle of the village, who stood well in her classes and sang in the choir, is drudging away, wondering at Fate. The good boy, who everybody in the neighborhood knew would be either a preacher or President of the United States, is still clerking in the dry-goods store, while the mischievous kid, who everybody expected would land in the penitentiary, is in Congress. So it goes. The girls marry other fellows and the boys marry the other girls. The things we expect people to do they do not do, and the things that we never look for simply come around to show how little we know about Fate.

"All that lies between the cradle and the grave is uncertain," said old Seneca, and this is what makes the world endurable. If a man knows that he is as liable to escape from an explosion as from a trolley car, or if he feels that big dangers are often less than the small ones, the very confidence in such a condition of things makes him a philosopher; and if there is anything calculated to produce content or happiness it is philosophy. When we can convince ourselves that the things that really happen, happen for the best, and that if they did not happen unexpectedly to us there would not be much interest in living, then we have reached a peace of mind and understanding which keeps the eyes bright and the soul young.

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES" That are Making HISTORY

GEORGE G. VEST, OF MISSOURI

Silver Once More Valuable than Gold

Bewildering aptly describes the result when the figures of the money question are thrown at the average audience. Gladstone achieved his first reputation when he made statistics interesting. He is dead, and he left no equal, but in a general way we can appreciate the stupendous totals that are used in the discussion of the financial facts of the world.

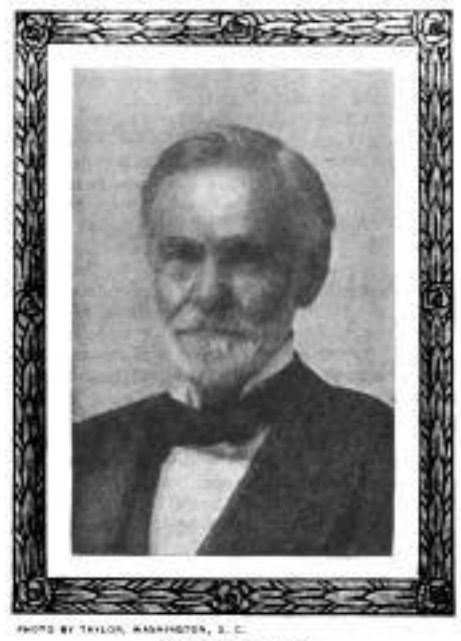
All the important European countries, save France, Italy and Spain, are on a gold basis. The United States is placed in the gold and silver column largely from the fact of her enormous holdings in silver. We have, for instance, between six and seven hundred millions of silver stock, or within seventy millions of our total of gold stock. The production of gold in this country annually amounts to more than the production of silver. Mexico, the principal country on a silver basis, has a ratio of 1 to 16½; Japan, which is both gold and silver, has a ratio of 1 to 16.18. Our own ratio is not 1 to 16, but 1 to 15.98. The other ratios of the world are 1 to 15½ except that of Turkey, which is 1 to 15⅓, India, which is 1 to 15, and the Netherlands, which is 1 to 15⅝.

There was a time in the history of the world when silver had more value than gold. It was the case in ancient Arabia, and also in ancient Germany. The first reported ratio after gold began to be considered more valuable was 1 to 2, and through the ages it has fluctuated, gradually rising, with few exceptions. In England during the twelfth century it was 1 to 9. In France during the fourteenth century gold and silver coins of like weight bore the same value. Portugal in the seventeenth century was able to govern the rate, and she fixed the value of gold as sixteen times that of silver. The nation which first raised the 16 to 1 arrangement over three centuries ago is now among those on a gold basis. It is somewhat curious that no two sets of tables as to the ratios of the different years exactly agree, but in round numbers the value of gold as compared to that of silver has increased since 1850 from about 1 to 15.70 to 1 to 36. The commercial value of the dollar of to-day is said by the mint authorities to be considerably less than fifty cents. From the gold standpoint this is called a case of metal finding its intrinsic level. According to the advocates of the compulsory ratio of 16 to 1, it is the result of legislation and manipulation.

In one case, at least, silver in this country outranks gold. The perfect silver dollar of 1804 is worth $1000—one was sold not long ago for $1200—while the rarest of the gold pieces, the half eagles of 1815 or 1822, would not bring much more than $300. Still there are only thirteen of the silver dollars of 1804 known to exist—which again forcibly illustrates the unpopularity of that unlucky number.

The New Development of an Old Issue

Recent events assure the ascendency of silver as one of the great issues of the Presidential contest. In his annual message President McKinley urgently recommended that the existing gold standard be supported and maintained, and he used these words: "The financial transactions of the Government are conducted upon a gold basis. We receive gold when we sell United States bonds, and use gold for their payments. We are maintaining the parity of the money issued or coined by the authority of the Government."



In order that this might be done more effectually, he recommended new legislation. Currency bills were introduced both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate early in the session. That in the House was entitled: "A bill to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all moneys issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes." This measure, which was in charge of Mr. Jesse Overstreet, aroused a spirited debate and came to a vote on the eighteenth of last December. The Republicans voted for it unanimously, thus placing themselves indisputably in favor of the gold standard. Eleven Democrats also voted for it.

It was striking proof of the change which has taken place in the Republican party, which formerly showed favor to gold, but denied that it intended to abandon silver. Indeed, one of the amusing features of the debate was the manner in which the silver orators quoted the leading Republicans against themselves. But the Republican decision is for gold absolutely and uncompromisingly, and the present status is an interesting case of political evolution.

The Senate bill was entitled: "A bill to affirm the existing standard of value, to maintain the parity in value of all forms of money, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes." Mr. Overstreet, the Republican manager of the House bill, is from Indiana. Mr. Aldrich, the Chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, is from Rhode Island. Mr. Bailey, one of the most eloquent of the silver leaders of the Democrats, is from Texas, and Mr. Vest, whose devotion to silver through many long years gives him a prominent place on the Finance Committee of the Senate, is from Missouri. Back of all this fight, of course, was the great contest in John Sherman's time, when, under his leadership, began the official appreciation of gold as the money standard of the nation, and when Bland, with powerful and exhaustless assiduity, worked his best for silver. In both the Republican measures the unit of value is the same: 25.8 of gold .9 fine. This means that, according to the existing valuations, it would take between thirty and forty units of silver to make one unit of gold.

Against this opposition the silver forces are still fighting. Over his own signature, Mr. William Jennings Bryan, the last Democratic candidate for President, stated: "The sentiment in favor of the re-affirmation of the Chicago platform is so overwhelming that all opposition is likely to disappear before the convention is called to order." The plank in that platform referring to money was as follows:

"We demand the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1, without waiting for the consent or aid of any other nation. We demand that the standard silver dollar shall be a full legal tender, equal with gold, for all debts, public and private, and we favor such legislation as will prevent for the future the demonetization of any kind of legal-tender money by private contract." There are other planks, but this is chief.

THE LATE RICHARD P. BLAND

The Silver Shilling that Went from Home

The Director of the Mint at Washington has a table from 1687 to the present, giving each year the ratio of silver to gold. It never reached 16 before 1800, when it began the century with 15.68, and it did not reach 16 in the present century until 1874. Since then the figures have been steadily going up, or down, as one may choose to call it. In 1898 it was 35.03 and it has been in the neighborhood of those figures ever since. The day this article is written the bullion value of the silver dollar is $0.467, or, expressed in cents, 46.7, the ratio being equivalent to 34.23. In 1873 it was intrinsically worth more than 100 cents. In 1900 its bullion value is about 47 cents.

The other day in the change was a Canadian twenty-five-cent piece. Along the borders of the United States it would easily pass current, but in the Middle States it was uniformly returned. The experiences of the coin were related at the dinner-table when a young voice remarked, "Why, that is like The Silver Shilling in Andersen's Fairy Tales."

Of course the story is familiar. The shilling, fresh from the mint, rushed forth into the world with a desire to see all it could, but when it got far away from home it began to have trouble. People called it a fraud and a cheat, and it felt low to think that it should be the cause of distress. After many vicissitudes, a traveler from its own country came upon it and accepted it at its face value. "And at last I got home again," said the Shilling. "All my troubles were ended; joy came back to me, for I was of good silver and had the right stamp, and I had no more disagreeables to endure. One must wait for the end and one will be righted at last—that's my belief."

The gold people hold that each coin should be so valuable that it will pass current in any country. The silver people say that as long as the money is good for use at home it performs all the purposes of useful currency. Undoubtedly silver has been getting the worst of it in its wanderings over the earth; but perhaps it may repeat the philosophy of the shilling and say, "One must wait for the end and one will be righted at last."

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS: The three men—Harris, George and the author—are on a bicycle tour through Germany. A tandem and a safety are the mounts.

The Regeneration of George

WE WERE on our way to Prague and were waiting in the great hall of the Dresden station until such time as the Powers-That-Be should admit us to the platform. George, who had wandered to the bookstall, returned to us with a wild look in his eyes. He said:

"I've seen it!"

I said: "Seen what?"

He was too excited to answer intelligently. He said:

"It's here. It's coming this way, both of them. If you wait you'll see it for yourselves. I'm not joking; it's the real thing."

As is usual about this period, some paragraphs more or less serious had been appearing in the papers concerning the sea serpent, and I thought for the moment he must be referring to this. A moment's reflection, however, told me that here in the middle of Europe, three hundred miles from the coast, such a thing was impossible. Before I could question him further he seized me by the arm.

"Look!" he said; "now am I exaggerating?"

I turned my head and saw what, I suppose, few living Englishmen have ever seen before—the traveling Britisher, according to the Continental idea, accompanied by his daughter. They were coming toward us in the flesh and blood, unless we were dreaming, alive and concrete; the English "Milor" and the English "Mees," as for generations they have been portrayed in the Continental comic press and upon the Continental stage. They were perfect in every detail. The man was tall and thin, with sandy hair, a huge nose, and long Dundreary whiskers. Over a pepper-and-salt suit he wore a light overcoat reaching almost to his heels.

His white helmet was ornamented with a green veil; a pair of opera-glasses hung at his side, and in his lavender-gloved hand he carried an alpenstock a little taller than himself.

His daughter was tall and angular. Her dress I cannot describe; my grandfather, poor gentleman, might have been able to do so; it would have been more familiar to him. I can only say that it appeared to me unnecessarily short, exhibiting a pair of ankles—if I may be permitted to refer to such points—that from an artistic point of view called rather for concealment. Her hat made me think of Mrs. Hemans, but why I cannot explain. She wore side-spring boots—"prunella," I believe, used to be the trade name—mittens, and a pince nez. She also carried an alpenstock (there is not a mountain within a hundred miles of Dresden), and a black bag strapped to her waist. Her teeth stuck out like a rabbit's, and her figure was that of a bolster on stilts.

Harris rushed for his camera, and of course could not find it; he never can when he wants it. Whenever we see Harris scuttling up and down, like a lost dog, shouting, "Where's my camera? What the dickens have I done with my camera? Don't either of you remember where I put my camera?"—then we know that for the first time that day he has come across something worth photographing. Later, he remembered it was in his bag; that is where it would be on an occasion like this.

I turned my head and saw what, I suppose, few living Englishmen have ever seen before—the traveling Britisher

They were not content with appearance; they acted the thing to the letter. They walked gaping around them at every step. The gentleman had an open Baedeker in his hand, and the lady carried a phrase-book. They talked French that nobody could understand, and German that they could not translate themselves. The man poked at officials with his alpenstock to attract their attention, and the lady, her eye catching sight of an advertisement of somebody's cocoa, said, "Shocking!" and turned the other way.

Really, there was some excuse for her. One notices even in England, the home of the proprieties, that the lady who drinks cocoa appears, according to the poster, to require very little else in this world; a yard or so of art muslin at the most. On the Continent she dispenses, so far as one can judge, with every other necessity of life. Not only is cocoa food and drink to her, but it should be clothes also, according to the idea of the cocoa manufacturer. But this by the way.

Of course they immediately became the centre of attraction. By being able to render them some slight assistance I gained the advantage of five minutes' conversation with them. They were very affable. The gentleman told me his name was Jones, and that he came from Manchester, but he did not seem to know what part of Manchester, or where Manchester was. I asked him where he was going, but he evidently did not know. He said it depended. I asked him if he did not find an alpenstock a clumsy thing to walk about with through a crowded town; he admitted that occasionally it did get in the way. I asked him if he did not find a veil interfered with his view of things; he explained that you only wore it when the flies became troublesome. I inquired of the lady if she did not find the wind blew cold; she said she had noticed it, especially at the corners. I did not ask these questions one after another as I have here put them down; I mixed them up with general conversation, and we parted on good terms.

I have pondered upon the apparition, and have come to a definite opinion. A man I met later at Frankfort, and to whom I described the pair, said he had seen them himself in Paris three weeks after the termination of the Fashoda incident; and a traveler for some English steel works whom we met in Strasburg remembered having seen them in Berlin during the excitement caused by the Transvaal question. My conclusion is that they were actors out of work, hired to do this thing in the interests of international peace. The French Foreign Office, wishful to allay the anger of the Parisian mob clamoring for war with England, secured this admirable couple and sent them around the town. You cannot be amused at a thing and at the same time want to kill it. The French nation saw the English citizen and citizeness—no caricature, but the living reality—and their indignation exploded in laughter. The success of the strategem prompted them later to offer their services to the German Government, with the beneficial results that we all know.

Our own Government might learn the lesson. It might be as well to keep near Downing Street a few small, fat Frenchmen, to be sent around the country when occasion called for it, shrugging their shoulders and eating frog sandwiches; or a file of untidy, lank-haired Germans might be retained to walk about, smoking long pipes, saying, "Soh?" The public would laugh and exclaim: "War with such? It would be too absurd." Failing the Government, I recommend the scheme to the Peace Society.

Our visit to Prague we were compelled to lengthen somewhat. Prague is one of the most interesting towns in Europe. Its stones are saturated with history and romance; its every suburb must have been a battle-field. It is the town that conceived the Reformation and hatched the Thirty-Years' War. But half Prague's troubles, one imagines, might have been saved to it had it possessed windows less large and temptingly convenient. The first of these mighty catastrophies it set rolling by throwing the Seven Councilors from the windows of its Rathhaus on to the pikes of the waiting Hussites below. Later it gave the signal for the second by again throwing the Imperial Councilors from the windows of the old burg in the Hradschin—Prague's second "Fenster-sturz." Since, other fateful questions have been decided in Prague. One assumes, from their having been concluded without violence, that such must have been discussed in cellars. The window as an argument, one feels, would always have proved too strong a temptation to any true-born Pragueer.

Our Guide

In the Teynkirche stands the worm-eaten pulpit from which preached John Huss. One may hear from the selfsame desk to-day the voice of a priest, while in far-off Constance a rude block of stone, half ivy hidden, marks the spot where Huss and Jerome died burning at the stake; history is fond of her little ironies. In this same Teynkirche lies buried Tycho Brahe, the astronomer, who made the common mistake of thinking the earth, with its eleven hundred creeds and one humanity, the centre of the universe, but was otherwise observed the stars clearly.

Through Prague's dirty, palace-bordered alleys must have pressed often in hot haste blind Ziska and open-mouthed Waldstein—they have dubbed him "The Hero" in Prague and the town is honestly proud of having owned him for a citizen; in his gloomy palace in the Waldstein-Platz they show as a sacred spot the cabinet where he prayed, and seem to have persuaded themselves he really had a soul. Its steep, winding ways must have been choked a dozen times, now by Sigismund's flying legions followed by fierce killing Taborites, and now by pale Protestants pursued by the victorious followers of Maximilian. Now Saxons, now Bavarians, and now French; now the saints of Gustavus Adolphus, and now the steel fighting-machines of Frederick the Great, have thundered at its gates and fought upon its bridges.

The Jews have always been an important feature of Prague. Occasionally they have assisted the Christians in their favorite occupation of slaughtering one another, and the great flag suspended from the vaulting of the Altneuschule testifies to the courage with which they helped Catholic Ferdinand to resist the Protestant Swedes. The Prague Ghetto was one of the first to be established in Europe, and in the tiny synagogue, still standing, the Jew of Prague has worshiped for eight hundred years, his women-folk devoutly listening without, at the ear-holes provided for them in the massive walls. The Jewish cemetery adjacent, "Bethchajim, or the House of Life," seems as though it were bursting with its dead. Within its narrow acre it was the law of centuries that here or nowhere must the bones of Israel rest. So the worn and broken tombstones lie piled in close confusion, as though tossed and tumbled by the stifled host beneath.

The Ghetto walls have long been leveled, but the living Jews of Prague still cling to their narrow lanes, though these are being rapidly replaced by fine new streets that promise to eventually transform this quarter into the handsomest part of the town.

At Dresden they advised us not to talk German in Prague. For years racial animosity between the German minority and the Czech majority has raged throughout Bohemia, and to be mistaken for a German in certain streets of Prague is inconvenient to a man whose staying powers in a race are not what once they were. However, we did talk German in Prague; it was a case of talking German or nothing. The Czech dialect is said to be of great antiquity and of highly scientific cultivation. Its alphabet contains forty-two letters, suggestive, to the stranger, of Chinese. It is not a language to be picked up in a hurry. We decided that on the whole there would be less risk to our constitutions in keeping to German, and, as a matter of fact, no harm came to us. The explanation I can only surmise. The Praguer is an exceedingly acute person; some subtle falsity of accent, some slight grammatical inaccuracy, may have crept into our German, revealing to him the fact that, in spite of all appearances to the contrary, we were no true-born Deutscher. I do not assert this; I put it forward as a possibility.

To avoid unnecessary danger, however, we did our sight-seeing with the aid of a guide. No guide I have ever come across is perfect. This one had two distinct failings. His English was decidedly weak. Indeed, it was not English at all. I do not know what you would call it. It was not altogether his fault; he had learned English from a Scotch lady. I understand Scotch fairly well; to keep abreast of modern English literature this is necessary; but to understand broad Scotch, talked with a Slavonic accent, occasionally relieved by German modifications, taxes the intelligence. For the first hour it was difficult to rid one's self of the conviction that the man was choking. Every moment we expected him to die on our hands. In the course of the morning we grew accustomed to him, and rid ourselves of the instinct to throw him on his back every time he opened his mouth, and tear his clothes from him. Later we came to understand a part of what he said, and this led to the discovery of his second failing.

It would seem he had lately invented a hair restorer which he had persuaded a local chemist to take up and advertise. Half his time he had been pointing out to us not the beauties of Prague, but the benefits likely to accrue to the human race from the use of this concoction, and the conventional agreement with which, under the impression he was waxing eloquent concerning views and architecture, we had met his enthusiasm, he had attributed to sympathetic interest in this wretched hair-wash of his.

The result was that now there was no keeping him away from the subject. Ruined palaces and crumbling churches he dismissed with curt reference as mere frivolities, encouraging a morbid taste for the decadent. His duty, as he saw it, was not to lead us to dwell upon the ravages of time, but rather to direct our attention to the means of repairing them. What had we to do with broken-headed heroes or bald-headed saints? Our interest should be surely in the living world; in the maidens with their flowing tresses—or the flowing tresses they might have by judicious use of "Kophkeo"—in the young men with their fierce mustaches—as pictured on the label.

Unconsciously, in his own mind he had divided the world into two sections: The Past ("before use"), a sickly, disagreeable-looking, uninteresting world. The Future ("after use"), a fat, jolly, God-bless-everybody sort of world; and this unfitted him as a guide to scenes of mediæval history.

He sent us each a bottle of the stuff to our hotel. It appeared that in the early part of our converse with him we had, unwittingly, clamored for it. Personally, I can neither praise it nor condemn it. A long series of disappointments has disheartened me; added to which a permanent atmosphere of paraffin, however faint, is apt to cause remark, especially in the case of a married man. Now I never try even the sample.

I gave my bottle to George. He asked for it to send to a man he knew in Leeds. I learned later that Harris had given him his bottle also, to send to the same man.

A suggestion of onions has clung to this tour since we left Prague. George has noticed it himself. He has attributed it to the prevalence of garlic in European cooking.

It was in Prague that Harris and I did a kind and friendly thing to George. We had noticed for some time past that George was getting too fond of Pilsner beer. This German beer is an insidious drink, especially in hot weather; but it does not do to imbibe too freely of it. It does not get into your head; but after a time it spoils your waist. I always say to myself on entering Germany:

"Now, I shall drink no German beer. The white wine of the country with a little soda water; perhaps occasionally a glass of Ems or Potash. But beer, never—or at all events, hardly ever."

It is a good and useful resolution, which I recommend to all travelers. I only wish I could keep to it myself. George, although I urged him, refused to bind himself by any such hard and fast limit. He said that, in moderation, German beer was good.

"One glass in the morning," said George, "one in the evening, or even two. That can do no harm to any one."

Maybe he was right; it was his half-dozen glasses that troubled Harris and myself.

"We ought to do something to stop it," said Harris; "it is becoming serious."

"It's hereditary, so he has explained to me," I answered; "it seems his family have always been thirsty."

"There is mineral water," replied Harris, "which, I believe, with a little lemon squeezed into it, is practically harmless. What I am thinking about is his figure. He will lose all his natural elegance."

WE WALKED HIM AROUND THAT STATUE FOUR TIMES AND SHOWED IT TO HIM FROM EVERY POSSIBLE POINT OF VIEW

DRAWN BY HERMON HINES

We talked the matter over and, Providence aiding us, we fixed upon a plan. For the ornamentation of the town a new statue had just been cast. I forget of whom it was a statue. I only remember that in the essentials it was the usual sort of street statue, representing the usual sort of gentleman, with the usual stiff neck, riding the usual sort of horse—the horse that always walks on its hind legs, keeping its front paws for beating time; but in detail it possessed individuality. Instead of the usual sword or bâton, the man was holding, stretched out in his hand, his own plumed hat; and the horse, instead of the usual waterfall for a tail, possessed a somewhat attenuated appendage that somehow appeared out of keeping with his ostentatious behavior. One felt that a horse with a tail like that would not have pranced so much.

It stood in a small square not far from the farther end of the Karlsbrücke, but it stood there only temporarily. Before deciding where to fix it, the town authorities had resolved, very sensibly, to judge by practical test where it would look best. Accordingly they had had made three rough copies of the statue, which, viewed from a little distance, produced all the effect that was necessary. One of these they had set up at the approach to the Franz-Josefsbrücke, a second stood in the open space behind the theatre, and the third in the centre of the Wenzelsplatz.

"If George is not in the secret of this thing," said Harris—we were walking by ourselves for an hour, he having remained behind in the hotel to write a letter to his aunt—"if he has not observed these statues, then by their aid we will make a better and a thinner man of him, and that this very evening."

So during dinner we sounded him judiciously, and, finding him ignorant of the matter, we took him out and led him by side streets to the place where stood the real statue. George was for looking at it and passing on, as is his way with statues, but we insisted on his pulling up and viewing the thing conscientiously. We walked him around that statue four times and showed it to him from every possible point of view. I think, on the whole, we rather bored him with the thing, but our object was to impress it upon him. We told him the history of the man that rode upon the horse, the name of the artist who had made the statue, how much it weighed, how much it measured. We worked that statue into his system. By the time we had done with him he knew more about that statue, for the time being, than he knew about anything else. We soaked him in that statue, and only let him go at last on the condition that he would come again with us in the morning, when we could all see it better; and for such purpose we saw to it that he made a note in his pocketbook of the place where the statue stood.

Then we accompanied him to his favorite beer hall and sat beside him, telling him anecdotes of men who, accustomed to German beer and drinking too much of it, had gone mad and developed homicidal mania; of men who had died young through drinking German beer; of lovers that German beer had been the means of parting forever from beautiful girls.

At ten o'clock we started to walk back to the hotel. It was a stormy-looking night, with heavy clouds drifting over a light moon. Harris said:

"We won't go back the same way we came; we'll walk back by the river. It is lovely in the moonlight."

Harris told a sad history as we walked, about a man he once knew who is now in a home for harmless imbeciles. He said he recalled the story because it was on just such another night as this that he was walking with that man the very last time he ever saw the poor fellow. They were strolling down the Thames Embankment, Harris said, and the man frightened him then by persisting that he saw the statue of the Duke of Wellington at the corner of Westminster Bridge, when as everybody knows it stands in Piccadilly.

It was at this exact instant that we came in sight of the first of these wooden copies. It occupied the centre of a small railed-in square, a little above us on the opposite side of the way. George suddenly stood still and leaned against the wall of the quay.

"What's the matter?" I said; "feeling giddy?"

He said: "I do, a little. Let's rest here a moment."

He stood there with his eyes glued to the thing. He said, speaking huskily:

"Talking of statues, what always strikes me is how very much one statue is like another statue."

Harris said: "I cannot agree with you there; pictures, if you like. Some pictures are very like other pictures, but with a statue there is always something distinctive. Take that statue we saw early in the evening," continued Harris, "before we went into that concert hall. It represented a man sitting on a horse. In Prague you will see other statues of men on horses, but nothing at all like that one."

"Yes, they are," said George; "they are all alike. It's always the same horse, and it's always the same man. They are all exactly alike. It's idiotic nonsense to say they are not." He appeared to be angry with Harris.

"What makes you think so?" I asked.

"What makes me think so?" retorted George, now turning upon me. "Why, look at that thing over there!"

I said: "What thing?"

"Why, that thing," said George; "look at it. There is the same horse with half a tail, standing on its hind legs; the same man without his hat; the same——"

Harris said: "You are talking now about the statue we saw in the Ringplatz."

"No, I'm not," replied George; "I'm talking about that statue over there."

"What statue?" said Harris.

George looked at Harris, but Harris is a man who might with care have been a fair amateur actor. His face merely expressed friendly sorrow, mingled with alarm. Next George turned his gaze on me. I endeavored, so far as lay within me, to copy Harris' expression, adding to it on my own account a touch of reproof.

"Will you have a cab?" I said as kindly as I could to George; "I'll run and get one."

"What the deuce do I want with a cab?" he answered ungraciously. "Can't you fellows understand a joke? It's like being out with a couple of confounded old women," saying which he started off across the bridge, leaving us to follow.

"I am so glad that was only a joke of yours," said Harris, on our overtaking him. "I knew a case of softening of the brain that began——"

"Oh, you're a silly ass!" said George, cutting him short; "you know everything." He was really most unpleasant in his manner.

We took him around by the river side of the theatre. We told him it was the shortest way, and, as a matter of fact, it was. In the open space behind the theatre stood the second of these wooden apparitions. George looked at it and again stood still.

"What's the matter?" said Harris kindly. "You are not ill, are you?"

"I don't believe this is the shortest way," said George.

"I assure you it is," persisted Harris.

"Well, I'm going the other," said George, and he turned and went, we, as before, following him.

Along the Ferdinand Strasse Harris and I talked about private lunatic asylums, which, Harris said, were not well managed in England. He said a friend of his, a patient in a lunatic asylum——

George said, interrupting:

"You appear to have a large number of friends in lunatic asylums." He said it in a most insulting tone, as though to imply that that is where one would look for the majority of Harris' friends. But Harris did not get angry; he merely replied quite mildly:

"Well, it really is extraordinary, when one comes to think of it, how many of them have gone that way sooner or later. I get quite nervous sometimes, now."

At the corner of the Wenzelsplatz, Harris, who was a few steps ahead of us, paused.

"It's a fine street, isn't it?" he said, sticking his hands in his pockets and gazing up it admiringly.

George and I followed suit. Five hundred yards away from us, in its very centre, was the third of these ghostly statues. I think it was the best of the three, the most like, the most deceptive. It stood boldly outlined against the wild sky; the horse on its hind legs, with its curiously attenuated tail; the man, bareheaded, pointing with his plumed hat to the now entirely visible moon.

"I think, if you don't mind," said George—he spoke with almost a pathetic ring in his voice; his aggressiveness had completely fallen from him—"that I will have that cab, if there's one handy."

"I thought you were looking queer," said Harris kindly; "it's your head, isn't it?"

"Perhaps it is," answered George.

"I have noticed it coming on," said Harris, "but I didn't like to say anything to you. You fancy you see things, don't you?"

"No, no, it isn't that," replied George rather quickly; "I don't know what it is."

"I do," said Harris solemnly, "and I'll tell you. It's this German beer that you are drinking. I have known a case where a man——"

"Don't tell me about him just now," said George. "I daresay it's true, but somehow I don't feel I want to hear about him."

"You are not used to it," said Harris.

"I shall give it up from to-night," said George. "I think you must be right; it doesn't seem to agree with me."

We took him home and saw him to bed. He was very gentle and quite grateful.

One evening later, after a long day's ride followed by a most satisfactory dinner, we started him on a big cigar and, removing things from his reach, told him of this stratagem that for his good we had planned.

"How many copies of that statue did you say we saw?" asked George, after we had finished.

"Three," replied Harris.

"Only three?" said George. "Are you sure?"

"Positive," replied Harris. "Why?"

"Oh, nothing," answered George.

But I don't think he quite believed Harris.

How the Boy Won: General McArthur's First Victory

By Major J. A. Watrous, U. S. A.

ENLIST him, Captain. Sure there is the making of a second Lieutenant-General Winfield Scott in the lad."

Big Harry Dunn, of our company, who made the remark, was known for his wit and keen sarcasm, and as he spoke a dozen soldiers who had seen the pale-faced boy, long, lean and slim, as he walked by the side of the Captain, earnestly begging to go to the war in his company, laughed loudly at Private Dunn's outburst. I didn't laugh, probably because I had heard the boy's earnest appeal to the Captain, and also, probably, because I saw a tear on his cheek when the Captain said: "No, my boy; you are not old and strong enough for a soldier in my company."

"Then you will not take me?"

"No; you would not last a month."

It was at this point that Harry Dunn made his sarcastic remark.

The incident occurred when the Sixth—the blessed old Sixth—was making its last parade in Milwaukee before boarding the train for Washington, in July, 1861, the week after the disaster at Bull Run.

That schoolboy, a stripling under sixteen, undismayed by our Captain, slipped to the side of each company commander and besought him for a place in his ranks. The other nine replies were enough like the first to make the boy leave the station, crying. As he passed Company B, Captain Dill called to him with a word of encouragement, saying, among other things, "You would better be a scholar than a soldier, anyway."

"I propose to be both, sir," was the quick reply.

Other regiments that passed through the city that year imitated the Sixth in its lack of encouragement to the spindling schoolboy, and though he made many visits to the recruiting office, he was each time turned away as poor material for a soldier.

The great war had been in progress over a year when the boy and his father had a long talk about the lad's enlisting.

"My son," said the Judge, "you are too young, and not strong enough, for a soldier. Besides, I want you to get an education and adopt my profession, the law."

"Please do not refuse me," pleaded the boy. "I must go. I have wanted to go so badly ever since the war began that I have made a failure in school, and I cannot fix my mind on studies while others are going to fight for the country. Lots of my friends are going in the Twenty-fourth, and some of them are no older nor stronger than I am. I wish you knew how my heart is set on becoming a soldier. I simply can't give up the idea."

"But suppose I refuse to give my consent? Would you try to run away and enlist, as you did last year?"

"Don't make me run away, father. Let me join the Twenty-fourth."

"Wait two or three days."

"Then may I go?"

"Wait."

"He is determined to go and I shall surrender," said the Judge to himself.

The next morning the Judge left for Madison, returning that night. He went out to see the Governor.

"Certainly, Judge," said Governor Salomon. "By the way, how old is your son?"

"Not yet seventeen."

"Rather young, but so were Alexander Hamilton and Napoleon when they received their first commission."

At the breakfast table the following morning the Judge handed a large envelope to his son.

Seeing his father's name on the envelope and that he was addressed as Adjutant, the boy enthusiastically exclaimed: "Now I know you will let me go, for as Adjutant you can look after me."

"But I am not to be Adjutant of the Twenty-fourth, child; can't you see the 'Jr.' after the name?"

The boy's appetite was gone when it finally dawned upon him that his greatest desire was to be gratified—that he was to become a soldier. But his face soon sobered after reading the commission as First Lieutenant and Adjutant. He had only planned to be a private to begin with. He understood enough about military matters to know that the Adjutant of a regiment was an important officer.

"Well, I'll do my best; and if I fail, why, I can go in the ranks, and that is all I have wanted."

The next day he reported to the pompous Colonel as his Adjutant.

"You are too young, sir—far too young for so responsible a position. I shall ask the Governor to give me a man for Adjutant of this regiment—a qualified man, sir."

The pompous Colonel put a hot telegram over the wire an hour later, and in another hour the Governor returned his answer. It consisted of two words: "Try him."

Before night the boy took the oath and was a full-fledged Adjutant.

"Oh, yes, I'll try him," said the Colonel, as he directed an orderly to request the Adjutant to call at his tent.

When the youthful officer reported to his commander, the Colonel, with a frown and a voice harsher than usual, addressed him thus:

"Adjutant, this regiment will have a dress parade—its first—next Saturday evening. Get your uniform and be ready to officiate."

That was Tuesday—not much time in which to have a uniform made. But by much urging and an extra price the outfit was ready, and so were the sword and sash. In the meantime the boy Adjutant burned more than midnight oil in looking up and studying the duties of his office. By Saturday morning he was sure of his footing in all respects save one. His voice—well, it was like all boys' voices at a certain stage—a good mate for that of the young rooster at its first crowing.

The Twenty-fourth was formed for its initial dress parade. Fifteen thousand people were present to witness the event. At the proper time the Adjutant stepped to the front and faced to the left. His "Attention, Battalion!" was heard about three companies down the line, and "Shoulder, arms!" no greater distance, but the companies which could not hear did as those which heard and brought their pieces to a shoulder. "Prepare to open ranks, to the rear; open order, march!" was squeakier than the others, but the Twenty-fourth got around to execute the order in its own chosen time and way. When the command "Front!" was given, and the stripling, with long strides, his sword more on his shoulder than at his side, had forged to the centre, made a bad half circle to the right and advanced toward the Colonel until it was time to stop and about face—in doing which he nearly tripped by tangling his legs with his scabbard—the officers and men of the regiment who were not too mad to do so were laughing. After the First Sergeants had been called to the "Front and Centre," had reported and to their "Posts, marched," and the regiment was brought to a "Present," the poor fellow had to pass through another ordeal—to about face, salute the Colonel and report the parade formed, and then pass around that officer and take his place to his left and rear. While the Adjutant was making this movement the Colonel, with a contemptuous look, followed the boy, and was so noticeably disgusted that the whole regiment was aware of the fact.

That first dress parade was not by any means a success, and when it was dismissed the Colonel took pains to let his officers know that he was going to demand of the Governor the appointment of a grown man for Adjutant in place of that "white-faced, chicken-voiced boy."

The Adjutant's heart was well-nigh broken that night when he sought rest. Immediately after dress parade he had heard many of the officers make uncomplimentary remarks touching his chicken-voice and awkward appearance. As if that was not enough, he strolled through the company streets after dark. In nearly every tent he heard the men talking about the Adjutant, and in nearly every tent there was one or more who tried to imitate his dress-parade commands. From every street came such commands as these, in the most boyish voices possible: "First Sergeants to the front and centre, march!" "Present, arms!" followed by cat-calls and remarks like these: "Who's got a baby Adjutant?" "The Twenty-fourth Milwaukee." "Colonel Larrabee has bought a new milch cow." "What for?" "For the nurse who will have charge of our Adjutant."

Kindly old Captain B., who knew of the Adjutant's efforts to get into the service, and was full of sympathy for him, saw him wandering through the streets with head bowed and sighs that told of mental distress, approached him and told him not to mind what he had seen and heard, but to go right on doing the very best he could, and in time those who made fun of him would praise and applaud instead.

It is quite safe to say that no would-be soldier ever had a harder struggle to enlist than the little Adjutant. I have endeavored to make plain a few of the obstacles he encountered and how heroically he tried to overcome them. I particularly want the reader to keep in mind the young fellow's many struggles to enlist, for they will look well with what follows.

Twenty-fourth. No place of danger was too perilous for him to ride to. His bravery was so conspicuous that he attracted the attention of both brigade and division commander. After that battle every soldier in the Twenty-fourth was the boy Adjutant's sworn friend, admirer and defender.

At Missionary Ridge the color-bearer of the Twenty-fourth fell. The Adjutant was bending over him in an instant. Picking up the flag, he sprang to the front of the line and shouted: "Now for their line of works, boys!" With a yell the Twenty-fourth made a new rush, but they couldn't outsprint the Adjutant, who was the first man on the works, and as he waved Old Glory a mighty shout went up on the right and left. Both officers and men hugged the boy Adjutant after the battle, and I do not blame them.

A few weeks after that famous battle the Twenty-fourth was to have a new Major. The rank and file wanted their boy Adjutant, and so did many of the officers. Phil Sheridan, in whose division the Twenty-fourth had often fought, asked that the Adjutant be made Major, and it was done.

DRAWN BY WILL CRAWFORD

Picking up the flag, he sprang to the front of the line and shouted: "Now for their line of works, boys!"

The Twenty-fourth had no more dress parades in Milwaukee. It was soon hurried to the front to assist in preventing General Braxton Bragg and his large army of Confederates from sweeping into Louisville and invading the North. Within two or three weeks the big regiment of poorly drilled men was marched headlong into the battle of Perryville, Kentucky. It was halted in a hollow. From the front came shell, shot and bullets which made terrible music for a new regiment. The officers could not tell how much of a force there was in their front, or how far away it was. The boy Adjutant heard the Colonel say he would give a horse to know just what was coming at his command. Without waiting for an order, the little fellow put spurs to his horse, and in a minute was on the brow of the hill, coolly taking in the situation and drawing a furious fire from the enemy he saw in large force rapidly advancing. Riding back to the Colonel, he reported and suggested that the Twenty-fourth quickly advance to the hill from whence he had come so as to have a chance to strike back, instead of remaining in that hollow to be cut to pieces, with little opportunity to harm the enemy. The suggestion was heeded, and the regiment had a prominent part in checking the Confederate advance. When the brigade commander thanked the Colonel that night for his command's good work, old Captain B. nudged the boy Adjutant and gently said: "I'll see that the General hears who it was that opened the way for the regiment to win praise. Keep on, my boy; you are on the up grade. The officers who sneered at you back in Wisconsin are already ashamed of themselves."

At Stone River, the last day of 1862 and the first day of 1863, the Adjutant proved to be a real hero, an inspiration to the men, and of great assistance to the officers of the

The gold leaves of a Major looked odd on the shoulders of the beardless boy, just turned eighteen, but they were not misplaced. During most of the following year the young Major commanded the Twenty-fourth, and none of Sherman's regiments did better work from Chattanooga to Atlanta, and surely none of General Thomas' regiments fought more heroically at Franklin and Nashville.

When the Twenty-fourth went back to Wisconsin, after the war, it was commanded by the youngest Colonel on either side of the great struggle.

Later, when the young Colonel, not yet a voter, was mustered out, he exchanged the eagles on his shoulders for the straps of a Second Lieutenant in the Regular Army, and not long after that was a Captain. When the new war came he was a Lieutenant-Colonel of the staff, but in June, 1898, he went to San Francisco with a silver star on each shoulder, to take command of a brigade on the way to the Philippines. It was his brigade that first scaled the walls of Manila the following August. The succeeding week I read the name of the boy Adjutant of the long ago in the list of newly appointed Major-Generals. Ever since then he has been conspicuous for his good service in subduing the insurgents. No one has done better.

Now please recall the sarcastic remark of Big Harry Dunn when the Sixth was marching through Milwaukee, in July, 1861.

If Big Harry Dunn will come a little closer I will whisper in his ear something like this: "You were right, Harry; there was the making of a second Lieutenant-General Winfield Scott in that lad; in a few months he will be a Brigadier-General in the Regular Army, and not so very long after that two Regular stars will shine on the shoulders of General Arthur McArthur.

An Acadian Coquette

By Charles G. D. Roberts

MADEMOISELLE DE LALANNE was in a gay mood that night. She was very happy, and might therefore have been expected to be kind. On the contrary, with a woman's title to the unexpected, she was filled for the moment with a kind of radiant malice. An impulse to be delicately cruel lurked behind the tender scarlet curve of her lips, and the wide innocence of her bewildering eyes hid very successfully a merciless desire to wound the two men who hung upon her words. From time to time, after a coquetry more audacious than usual, she would glance half-repentantly at the closed door, as if looking for yet another visitor. Her mother, Madame de Lalanne, an elderly gentlewoman of Quebec who had declined into a rustic dullness after years of life among the good country folk of Acadie, dozed over her knitting beside the ample hearth.

Mademoiselle was dressed in a shortish skirt of the pattern worn by the country girls. The material, however, was not the coarse wool of the district, but a heavy homespun linen, bleached to the tint of cream. The bodice was of the same stuff, with sleeves turned back at the elbows to show arms that were slim almost to thinness, but milk white and bewitchingly moulded. Over her shoulders was thrown carelessly a shawl of fine silk, black, but no blacker than the silken hair above it. On her small, slim feet, one of which kept restlessly tapping the floor, she wore shoes of fine scarlet leather. These little shoes every girl in Acadie had heard of, and discussed with jealous admiration; but few, indeed, even of the Grand Pré maids, had seen them, for the De Lalannes, mindful of their past seignioral pride, maintained much of their aloofness amid their changed fortunes.

Beautiful as was her face, broad-browed, finely chiseled, white with the warm whiteness of ivory, it was, above all, her eyes that made Marie de Lalanne the wonder of all Acadie. When she turned their dark radiance upon her two cavaliers, both felt their hearts jump painfully and each burned with a fierce impulse to pitch the other from the nearest window.

WITH INSTANT AND INSTINCTIVE OBEDIENCE BOTH MEN SPRANG BACK AND DROPPED THEIR POINTS; THEN, IN THE NEXT SECOND, BOTH TURNED INDIGNANTLY UPON THE INTRUDER

This tempting window, low and broad, looked out across a snowy slope that sparkled under the full moon. At the foot of the slope, visible from Mademoiselle's chair, a close hedge of young fir trees hid the channel of the Gaspereau River. A sullen, grinding roar from the flood tide a-chafe among the ice cakes was heard in the quiet room whenever the light talk flagged. It flagged often, as moments of absent-mindedness crowded Mademoiselle's whimsical mood; but it never flagged for long, seeing that it was her pleasure to be gay that night. The white moonlight, too, came in through the window, and mixed curiously with the leaping red firelight and the pale yellow of the two candles that stood on the brick chimney-piece, and added inextricable complications to the enigmatic lights that flamed softly from Mademoiselle's eyes.

The two young men upon whose passions she was playing so recklessly had come to Grand Pré village that same evening from opposite directions. Both had made all haste out over the hill to the old farmhouse by the Gaspereau. Captain Barras, journeying on snowshoes from the French fort at Chignecto, had arrived first, flushed with elation at finding Mademoiselle alone—for Madame de Lalanne was ever too sunk in old dreams to count as a personality. Scarcely had he bowed his devoirs over the little, restless white hand, which Mademoiselle was wont to use as mercilessly as her eyes, when there came from the hunting-fields behind La Hêve the spare, sombre-suited, silent figure of Jean Michel Landry de Latour, the proud and impoverished descendant of the De Latours of Port Royal and St. John.

Now, on the coming of Captain Barras, Mademoiselle had not been over-gracious. She had been merely ennuyée. It was when De Latour arrived that the caprice of gayety had seized upon her. What were these unencouraged suitors for, indeed, if not to furnish amusement through the hour of waiting before her? On the instant she was all graciousness.

"I trust your absence from Grand Pré has not seemed as long to you as it has to us, Monsieur!" she murmured as De Latour kissed her finger-tips and shot a glance of dark disdain at Barras.

The Captain's mouth grew dry suddenly as he perceived in this changed demeanor of his hostess an explanation of the chill civility which had greeted his own arrival. But in the next moment those resistless eyes flashed upon him something that thrilled like a caress; and straightway, remembering all that he was and his rival was not—rich, handsome, and in high favor with the Governor at Quebec—he returned the newcomer's challenging glance with interest.

When Mademoiselle presented the two, De Latour's curt formality was a veiled declaration of war, while the elaborate courtesy of Barras was an exquisite insolence. And Mademoiselle was sinfully delighted.

The demeanor of the two men contrasted sharply. Barras, not long from the revels and lightness of Quebec, hung boldly on Mademoiselle's glances, and his vanity was facile game to her. He could not take his eyes from her face except to dart an occasional look of supercilious impatience at the intruder, who, as he now felt convinced, alone stood in the way of his conquest. De Latour, on the other hand, while ever seeking the glances which enthralled him, seemed ever unable to endure their light. Whenever he encountered them he would drop his own eyes—and quietly fearless eyes they were in the little customary matters of battle and peril—from the too-dazzling brilliancy of her face to the daintiness of her scarlet shoes. He seldom troubled to look at his rival; but his reserve managed somehow to express quite unmeasured depths of contempt. He spoke little, even to Mademoiselle, but that little always had point. The burden of the conversation was borne by Barras, who had a flow of glittering compliment at command. Mademoiselle de Lalanne had but to direct the game, now with deft turn of phrase, now with a smile, now with a swift look; and with such wicked nicety of skill did she direct it that within the half-hour the air of that peaceful chamber seemed full of swords.

At this point, however, she kept things under curb, so that neither man dared in the least degree ruffle the shining surface of civility which she had spread between them. Madame de Lalanne sank so deep into her dreams that her knitting fell unheeded to the floor, and was seized upon by a gratified black kitten. One of the candles on the chimney-piece guttered spitefully and went out. The ghostly patch of moonlight moved across the floor till it touched and paled the scarlet of Mademoiselle's shoes. Then, on a sudden, just as she opened her lips for some sally more sweetly envenomed than any that had gone before, the faint sound of a footstep in another part of the house caught her ear. No one else heard it; but it was what she was waiting for. Her face softened and she sprang up.

"Excuse me, Messieurs," she said hastily. "I have forgotten something." And in a breath she was gone, closing the door behind her and leaving the two men to stand with blank faces staring after her.

So they stood for a moment, then turned to each other. De Latour spoke first.

"Your society is distasteful to me, Captain Barras!" said he coldly.

"I can quite imagine it, Monsieur!" replied Barras, with the most courteous intonation. "Different, I suppose, from that to which you are accustomed!"

De Latour smiled grimly. Mere verbal repartee seemed to him little worth while when the retort of the sword was in question.

"Nevertheless," said he, "I could tolerate it for a short time under other conditions. Behind yonder fir trees there is a level space by the side of the water, where the moon shines clearly. I could meet you there with pleasure, so it be at once, Monsieur!"

Barras' bold eyes flashed. This was just what he wanted. Yet for the mere insolence of it he affected to hesitate.

"Your appearance is against you, Monsieur," he drawled; "but—yes, you are received by Mademoiselle de Lalanne, and therefore I may without dishonor cross swords with you. His Excellency would understand."

He went out brusquely, leaving De Latour to follow. But the iron face of the woodranger (for such he was) was untroubled by the insult. He felt only compassion for the ignorance of a Canadian who knew not the precedence of the De Latours.

The two strode in silence, side by side, down the crisply glittering slope, their distorted, black shadows dancing grotesquely behind them. When they were within about a hundred paces of the fir grove, Mademoiselle de Lalanne reëntered the room which they had so hastily forsaken. Her face was now more softly radiant, and the laughing malice had died out of her eyes. Close at her skirts came a tall, fair-haired, ruddy-featured man, with "English" written large all over him. His eyes rested for a moment on Madame's slumbering form in her big chair, then swept the empty spaces quizzically.

"Your fine birds have flown, sweetheart!" he exclaimed with a boyish laugh.

Mademoiselle was at the window in time to note the direction of their flight. At a glance she understood the imminent results of her coquetry. Pale with sudden fear, she turned and clutched her companion's arm.

"Oh, Jack!" she cried, "they have gone away to fight. Quick! Quick! Stop them!"

The Englishman laughed again, but very softly so as not to wake Madame, and looked down into the girl's face. He was thinking of her eyes, of her lips, and he only half heard her words.

"Stop what?" he asked, stooping with a swift movement to kiss her. But she sprang back angry and frightened.

"Stop them, I say, Jack. They are going to fight, and perhaps they'll kill each other. And it's all my fault. I've been very wicked. Oh, I'll go myself!" And she darted out of the room.

At this he awoke. He caught her before she was out of the house and checked her firmly.

"It's an awkward thing, Sweet," said he, "to interfere between two indignant gentlemen who have a right to disagree in their own way. But if you say so, I'll do it. What shall I say to them? How is it your fault?"

"Oh, Stupid! Can't you see how wicked I've been? I've made them both think I cared for them; I've made them furiously jealous! I was so tired waiting for you to come! And now if they're killed I'll never speak to you again!"

Jack Moleby's face broke into a grin of delighted comprehension.

"Wretch!" he retorted, "I go!" And he made off down the snow with long strides. Throwing a hooded cloak about her, and thrusting her feet, red shoes and all, into a pair of white, fur-lined moccasins, Mademoiselle sped after him.

The winter air was crisp, clear, and with a fine, frosty sting in it. There was no wind whatever. There was no sound but the grinding of the tide among the ice cakes. The light was almost like full day in the little white glade where the two Frenchmen faced each other with swords at the salute. The next instant the sibilant whisper of the steel began, deadly in its soft reserve; and the easy superciliousness of the smile on Barras' lips changed to a look as stern as his adversary's as he felt the dangerous competence of the wrist opposed to him.

The two fought in their vests, their coats lying upon the snow near by. In skill they appeared to be well matched, and De Latour, who had never before met any one at all his equal in fence, began to conceive an unwilling respect for the coxcomb Captain. In fact, he had just by the merest hair's-breadth escaped a scratch when from the edge of the grove a voice of sharp authority rang out, "Halt!" and Captain Jack's tall figure appeared suddenly beside them.

With instant and instinctive obedience both men sprang back and dropped their points; then, in the next second, both turned indignantly upon the intruder.

"Who are you, sir?" demanded De Latour curtly. "And by what right, if I may ask, do you interfere in our pastime?" inquired Barras.

Captain Jack, who was more embarrassed than he would have cared to show, chose to answer the latter question.

"By no right, gentlemen," he replied heartily; "and I beg to apologize in the fullest manner. I know, too, I owe you satisfaction for my abruptness, and of course I am quite ready to afford it to you both if you demand it. But I beg you rather to accept my apology!"

"We can discuss that later on," said De Latour in tones of ice. "And meanwhile, Captain Barras, with your consent we will resume."

But before the blades could cross again the Englishman stepped forward sharply, his own sword half drawn.

"Really, gentlemen," he began in a voice of mastery, "I must insist that you stop fighting. No more of it, I say!" And his blood began to get hot. Then he remembered that he would certainly not be fulfilling Marie's wishes if he should himself kill one or perhaps both of these impetuous and infatuated Frenchmen; and the thought gave him pause. He considered the situation deuced awkward altogether.

Both men faced him.

"This is astonishing, truly," exclaimed Barras, with a biting sneer. "I think we had better have an immediate explanation before we go on with our own affair."

But now Jack Moleby had an inspiration. He would try diplomacy. Replacing his sword, and relapsing into his customary large good-humor, he smiled genially upon the scowling faces.

"You see, gentlemen, I hated to disturb you, but I had to do as I was commanded. Mademoiselle de Lalanne sent me with positive orders to stop the fight at any cost. In my stupidity I thought I might have to fight you both in order to obey her. But I should have known, as soon as I saw the courtly gentlemen you were, that my one effective weapon would be the expression of her wishes. She implores you, if her happiness is of any concern to you, that you will do each other no injury. She beseeches you to promise that you will put your quarrel, whatever it may be, forever by, without which promise she declares that she will live in ceaseless anxiety. I think, gentlemen, from my observation of her solicitude in this matter, that one or the other of you must be honored by a very distinguished place in her regard."

Each, on hearing these sagacious words, conceived himself to be the one so honored. Into De Latour's cold eyes came a gleam of elation.

"Mademoiselle de Lalanne's wishes are a command, Monsieur," said he, sheathing his sword. "I need no apology from you for having obeyed them. Rather should I wish to hold you to account had you failed to fulfill them to the letter!"

"I thank you, Monsieur, with all my heart," replied Captain Jack, bowing and biting back a smile. "And you, Monsieur," he went on, turning to Barras, "have I grace from you also for my somewhat blundering zeal?"

Barras' face, no longer that of the fearless and inexorable swordsman, wore now a simper of pleased vanity. The coxcomb was back. "Mademoiselle's wishes are my law," said he, bowing elaborately, "and he who carries them out is my ensample."

With another ceremony to De Latour he slipped his sword back into its place, as if to say, "Let there be peace between us."

At this moment Mademoiselle came tripping from the grove, the hood of her cloak half fallen back from her hair. She came up to the Englishman's side and laid her hand lightly on his arm. Upon the two swordsmen she turned a smile of subjugating sweetness.

"With all my heart I thank you, gentlemen," she said, "for your gracious courtesy in yielding to my wishes. Let us go back to the house and I will ask you to take a glass of wine with me to the long continuance of friendship between two such gallant gentlemen as I well know you to be."

Both men stood bowing, each with his hand over his heart, and each boiling inwardly at sight of those small fingers on the Englishman's sleeve. There was a brief pause, during which Mademoiselle flushed faintly and her eyelids fluttered down. Then she went on steadily:

"And let me present to you, Captain Barras, and to you, Monsieur de Latour, my dear friend, Captain Moleby, of the English garrison at Halifax. It is my prayer, gentlemen, that when your flag and his are again at war, as is like to be soon, he may not find such swords as yours opposed to him, for he is my betrothed. I commend him to your kind good will."

The two Frenchmen met each other's eyes with a glance of mutual comprehension, murmured some inarticulate compliments, and hid their discomfiture in the final bitterness of permitting Captain Jack to help them into their coats.

It was one of the triumphs of Captain Jack Moleby's career that he did not smile.

How WE make Presidents

The Hayes and Garfield Campaigns

By Colonel A. K. McCLURE

Drawings by CARL KLEINSCHMIDT

THE Presidential contest of 1876 had many strange complications, most of which were not visible to the public. In my article on Blaine's Battle for the Presidency the details of the struggle at the Cincinnati convention that met June 15 are so fully given that they need not be again presented. It is enough to say that Blaine had a majority of the delegates in that body; that a majority of the whole convention voted for him at one time or another but never on the same ballot; and that his nomination was defeated by a very powerful and well-handled combination of power that had its centre in the Grant Administration. By shrewd management the Blaine vote was kept divided until a landslide was made to Governor Hayes, with whom William A. Wheeler, of New York, was nominated for Vice-President.

The Democratic National Convention of 1876 was the first to cross the Father of Waters. It was held in St. Louis on June 28, and resulted in the nomination of Samuel J. Tilden, of New York, for President, and Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, for Vice-President. Tilden was the ablest political manager in the Democratic party of that day. He was tireless, methodical and sagacious, and he made his nomination over Hancock and Hendricks by early and complete organization of his friends in all the debatable States. He had won national reputation by his courage in bringing Tweed to justice, and he was regarded by the country generally as well equipped for the high duties of Chief Magistrate. The friends of Hendricks made a desperate battle for him, but they were outclassed in leadership, and it was a Tilden convention when the body convened, with very able men to hold it in subjection.

A DUEL AVERTED BY A DINNER

The Tilden forces required little leadership in St. Louis, as his nomination had been thoroughly accomplished before the convention met. Tilden exhausted his wonderful powers of organization in getting control of the delegations of doubtful States, and looked minutely to the men who should be chosen as delegates, and when the convention met there was no boisterous jostling between the opposing forces, as the majority was complete in its organization and moved with directness to the accomplishment of its purpose. William L. Scott, of Erie, Pennsylvania, who was twice elected to Congress in an overwhelmingly Republican district, was the accepted leader of the Tilden people. He was personally popular, self-poised, sagacious and discreet, and all he had to do was to keep his solid lines unbroken.

The minority was dumbfounded at the development of the Tilden strength, but the Hendricks people, led by McDonald, of Indiana—afterward United States Senator—and most zealously and aggressively aided by the helpless Tammany minority in the New York delegation, fought heroically at every step; but with Scott to manage and Henry Watterson to inspire the Tilden people they maintained their mastery from start to finish and Tilden was declared the nominee. When the nomination was announced the convention presented a singular spectacle. The Tilden delegates were at once upon their feet cheering lustily and waving their handkerchiefs, and one after another of the minority delegations rose and joined in the huzzas for the declared candidate, but the Indiana delegates sat stubbornly in their seats. Later, when Hendricks was made the candidate for Vice-President, they were compelled to rise and join in united cheers for the ticket.

Much bitterness was developed during the struggle between the opposing clans, and a duel between General Morgan, a fighting Democratic soldier of Ohio, and Colonel Breckinridge, of Kentucky, was only averted, when the convention adjourned, by Colonel Watterson hurrying Breckinridge off to dinner, and compelling him to make concessions which satisfied the Ohio warrior.

TILDEN'S MAJORITY OVER HAYES

The campaign was one of unusual interest, and the popular tide was with Tilden because of his accepted integrity and ability, which were regarded in bold contrast to the Administration of Grant, that had brought a tempest of scandals upon the party and the Administration. On the popular vote Tilden received 250,961 majority over Hayes, and in the electoral college, as the popular vote was cast in the States, Tilden received 203 votes, to 156 for Hayes. On the morning after the election Senator Chandler, of New Hampshire, who was Secretary of the National Committee of which Senator Zachariah Chandler, of Michigan, was Chairman, announced that Hayes was elected, and declared that the States of Florida, Louisiana and South Carolina had honestly voted for Hayes, and that he would finally receive their electoral votes. With the whole machinery of the Government in the hands of the Republicans it was almost a hopeless battle for Tilden to fight for the disputed Southern States, but the Democratic people became violently aroused, and threats were freely made that the inauguration of Hayes would be prevented by mob violence if attempted. So grave did the situation become that Congress finally passed an act, supported by a number of Democrats, appointing an Electoral Commission consisting of Senators, Representatives and members of the Supreme Court.

A duel was only averted by Colonel Watterson hurrying Breckinridge off to dinner

Judge David Davis was assigned by the Supreme Court to act on the commission, but he declined, and Judge Strong, of Pennsylvania, took his place. Had Davis remained on the commission Tilden would doubtless have been elected, as he lost the disputed States at every trial of strength in the commission by a vote of eight to seven. I have explained in the article on Blaine, and later in the article on the contest of 1868, how and why Tilden lost the battle and the highest honor of the Republic.

MEETING FRAUD WITH FRAUD

The true history of the struggle for the control of the electoral votes of South Carolina, Florida and Louisiana has never been written, and now never can be fully written. The ablest men of both sides attended the contest in those States to battle for or against the action of the returning boards. All three States had voted for Tilden, but the returning boards, which had been created by the carpet-bag rule of the South, set aside the returns on the plea of fraud and certified the electoral vote for Hayes. The strength of the claim of the Democrats was practically admitted after the inauguration of Hayes by the President aiding in the adjustments which gave the Democrats the Governors and the Legislatures of those States, and ousting the Republicans who had given the electoral vote to the President.

The chief factor in the bold and revolutionary action that returned the three States named for the Republican candidate for President was J. Donald Cameron, then Secretary of War under President Grant, and later United States Senator. He is nothing if not heroic when occasion demands it. I remember calling upon him at the Continental Hotel, Philadelphia, after the election, and inquiring of him whether he really meant to force the reversal of the vote in those States and have Hayes returned as elected. He answered with perfect frankness that he had started in to do it, that he meant to do it, and that it was right to do it, as the Republicans had not opportunity to vote in the South, and the only way to meet such frauds was by the strong power of the Government.

But for the assurance that the Army and Navy would sustain the returning boards of those States in whatever they did under color of law, the reversal of the popular vote never could have been accomplished. The State of Florida was manipulated by Robert W. Mackey, who was the most accomplished politician the Republicans have ever produced in Pennsylvania. He was apparently dying of consumption for ten years, and when it became necessary to send some competent man to handle Florida he was selected. He started on his mission, and his racking cough and general consumptive features gave plausibility to the statement that he was going South to nurse his health. Two Democratic visiting committeemen were on the same train, both unknown to Mackey, and he overheard them mature their plans to hold the State for Tilden. He telegraphed to C. D. Brigham, who had been a prominent editor and Republican politician in Pittsburg, but who then resided in Florida, to meet him at the station, and before the Democrats attempted to carry out their plans they were completely blocked by Mackey, who could summon all the Federal officials to his aid.

HOW TILDEN'S INDECISION LOST THE BATTLE

Governor Curtin and Senator Sherman met face to face at New Orleans in the struggle to win the electoral vote of Louisiana, and at one stage of the battle Tilden could have secured the vote by telegraphing a single word to Curtin, but Tilden seemed to have lost his cunning, and hesitation was exhibited by him at every stage of the conflict when the promptest action was indispensable. I visited him at his home in Grammercy Park when the contest was on at white heat, and was amazed to find his table covered with legal briefs, as though his election depended upon the law that would govern before a competent and impartial judicial tribunal. He permitted himself and his friends to become involved in a compromising way in the Oregon dispute for a single elector, and had the same method been adopted in Louisiana he would have won. Instead of discussing the situation as it was, he presented to me elaborate arguments to show how it should be, and I could not refrain from reminding him that he was not dealing with judicial tribunals, and that he must either meet his opponents on their own ground and with their own weapons or he must fall in the fight. He seemed to be utterly bewildered, and the man who had organized his nomination and election with consummate skill shriveled up into pitiable indecision and inaction when he had the power to cast the die for or against himself.

Governor Curtin and Senator Sherman met face to face at New Orleans

The severe strain upon the popular sentiment of the country that had given Tilden 250,000 majority for President was greatly tempered, especially in the South, by a very shrewd movement planned early in the after-election contest to conciliate the leading people of the South. They received positive assurances from men very close to Hayes, and who gave the assurance of Hayes' approval of the movement, that if Hayes should be inaugurated President without violence the State governments of Louisiana, Florida and South Carolina would be given to the Democrats. That Hayes approved of the plan is evidenced by the fact that after he became President he stood resolutely by the promise made by his friends to give the Democrats control of the governments of those States.

THE BATTLE IN FLORIDA AND LOUISIANA

There was no serious friction in Florida; the Democratic candidate for Governor was allowed to be inaugurated on a returned majority of 195 as given by the Supreme Court. In South Carolina the face of the returns gave Wade Hampton 1134 majority for Governor, with about a like majority for the Democratic Presidential electors, but the returning board threw out Democratic counties and returned Chamberlain, Republican, as elected Governor by a majority of 3433, and gave the Republican electors majorities ranging from 600 to 900.

Two Legislatures were organized and two claimants for the Governorship were qualified, but after a long siege, in which the friends of Hampton were with difficulty restrained from taking violent possession of the capitol, the Republicans gave up the contest, as they discovered that President Hayes would not support them, and Hampton and his associate Democratic candidates and a Democratic Legislature were accepted.

The great battle was made in Louisiana, where the returning board gave Hayes the State by a majority of 4807, and declared the Republican electors chosen by about the same majority. The face of the returns gave a majority of 7876 for Tilden and 8101 for Nichols, Democratic candidate for Governor. There, as in South Carolina, two Governors were qualified and two Legislatures organized, and Stephen B. Packard, who had been counted in as the Republican Governor, and had been largely instrumental in giving the electoral vote to Hayes, and hence in electing him, demanded that the President should sustain him, logically insisting that if Hayes was elected Packard was elected, and that if Packard must go out Hayes must go out with him.

The faith of the President and his friends were pledged to the people of property in Louisiana that they should have their own State government, but it was a most difficult obligation to discharge. Finally, the President appointed a committee, two of whom were Senator Hawley, of Connecticut, and ex-Attorney-General Wayne MacVeagh, of Washington, to go to New Orleans and solve the problem in some way to give the State government to Nichols and the Democrats. The first necessity was to withdraw enough Senators and Representatives from the Packard Legislature to the Nichols Legislature to give the latter a quorum of undisputed legislators in both houses, as that would leave Packard without a Legislature and clothe Nichols' government with the ceremony of law.

THE LOUISIANA LOTTERY BARGAIN

Many of the Packard legislators were negroes, and most of them commercial. The change could be effected only by purchase, in which the Hawley and MacVeagh committee had no part. There were enough and to spare of Packard legislators who were willing to sell out, but the Democrats were impoverished and could not raise money to buy them.

In this emergency the Louisiana Lottery Company came forward and proposed to furnish the citizens of New Orleans, who were managing the movement, all the money they needed on condition that when the Democrats came into power and amended the constitution they should give the Louisiana Lottery a twenty-five-year charter in the constitution. It was a hard bargain, but as they could do no better they accepted the proffer, and a very large sum of money was thus furnished and paid to the negroes and carpet-bag legislators, who were very glad to get under cover with cash in their pockets, knowing that the end of carpet-bag rule was near at hand. Packard finally found himself abandoned by a majority of the undisputed Senators and Representatives. His administration thus ended, and the promise of the friends of Hayes, which

The Fitting of the Peats

Part IV—Thirteenth Chapter

IT WAS late afternoon upon Millwharchar Muir. The sun began to cast long, slanting shadows thwartwise across the ruddy purple and golden brown. The moss-hags acquired threatening eyebrows as their overhanging summits shut off the sunshine from their gloomy deeps.

Seven times had Bell remarked that it was time to be going homeward lest one of her brothers—or perhaps Will Begbie—might take it into his head to come that way.

Besides, the peats were fitted—as many as two rows of stooks—work for half an hour at least. But then, Bell had had to wait till the casting was dry enough. Other things also had interfered. At last, however, after an eighth declaration, she rose determinedly to her feet. This time there must be no dallying. She must be going. No, she would not sit down again and think it over. It was time, and high time, too. And he ought to know better than to ask her, considering the danger to them both; what would she do if anything happened to him?

Well, just a minute, then. There! Was he satisfied now?

So, in the quiet, peaceful-seeming evening these two walked slowly toward the little copse which erected its crest of birch and fir over the edge of the moor. They went hand in hand, and discussed the flight to Isle Rathan. Adam was to arrange through a faithful retainer that Gideon Lamb, outed clergyman and good Jacobite, was to be in readiness. Mistress Patrick Heron (erstwhile May Maxwell) was to be warned. Bell's heart throbbed at the thought of meeting her, reassured, however, by the news that she had been a farmer's daughter.

"Now, little love," said Adam, "we must say good-night. Good angels keep you—till to-morrow, love, till to-morrow! And then, on the third day—why, then there will begin to be no more to-morrows forever and ever!"

"Good-night, Adam!"

"Why do you not say Charles Francis?" he said, smiling.

"I like Adam now. You are my Adam."

"Good-night, little Eve!"

"In the King's name, stand!"

The voice rang out like a trumpet, imperious and commanding, yet with a certain amount of the weakness of self-conscious youth in it.

Adam Home lifted his head and confronted a score of dismounted King's troopers. An officer was at their head, with his sword drawn in his hand. Their carbines were at the ready, and the black muzzles approached within a dozen yards of his breast.

Very haughtily Adam Home, another Adam Home from him who had spoken these last words to his love, looked at his captors, his head high and his eyes straight and unabashed. He did not take his arm from about his sweetheart's waist under the gaze of so many men, but rather, as it seemed, kept it there with a kind of ostentation.

So they stood, the red tunics of the dragoons almost black against the sunset, the last rays glinting on sword blade and gun barrel and looking fair into the dark and angry face of Adam Home and the wild eyes of Bell, the plighted wife of the man whose life was forfeit.

Behind the troop stood Will Begbie, despair and remorse already tugging at his heart-strings. But it was too late.

"Kilpatrick—you!" cried the young officer of dragoons in sheer and unfeigned astonishment.

"Ah, Harry!" was all that Adam Home replied.

DRAWN BY HARRY C. EDWARDS

"IN THE KING'S NAME, STAND!"

There was a pause. The young ensign sheathed his sword with a sharp click, but his men remained fixed with their muskets pointed at the rebel.

"Cousin Adam," said the lad, his face coloring, "this is a deucedly awkward business for me. I declare I must take you prisoner!"

Adam Home smiled, and, removing his arm from his sweetheart's waist, took her hand instead. He could feel that her bosom was heaving tumultuously, the storm not far off. He resolved it should not break if he could help it.

"Certainly, lad," he cried cheerfully; "I am your prisoner. But I am this lady's prisoner first. I present you to my wife!"

"Your wife?" repeated the officer, obviously mystified.

"Yes, my wife, or almost," said Adam Home. "His Highness the Elector of Hanover permitting, we are to be married the day after to-morrow at the house of Mr. Patrick Heron, of Isle Rathan, Justice of the Peace in the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright."

"That's worse still, Adam," said the lad, "for there's a warrant out for your arrest on a charge of high treason. And Uncle Harry is in Cairn Edward to meet with my Lord Galloway."

"Content, my boy," said Adam Home calmly; "it will be quite a family gathering! All I ask is that you march your men around by Millwharchar, which your guide (he looked at Will Begbie with a dry smile) doubtless pointed out to you in the valley as you came up. I would desire your leave to place in safety this lady who is so dear to me."

"Of course I will," cried the boy, brightening; "it is a shift most damnable that I am in. Pity me, Adam, and tell me what you would do if you were in my shoes."

"Why," said Adam Home, "do what you must do—your duty. Besides, you are my uncle's favorite and next heir, and when they stick my head on Tower Hill it will all be for the best."

The poor boy's distress was evident, but in another direction Adam Home had gone too far. At the image which his light words called up but too easily in her heart Bell clasped his hands.

"Oh, Adam," cried she, "I have brought you to this! Wicked girl that I am—I am the cause of your death! You will hate me. You will curse the day you saw me. You must. I will not love you if you do not!"

She turned upon the officer.

"Oh, good sir, I know you are kind. Do, I pray you, release him. I beg you from my heart to let him go. Indeed he was not plotting nor doing any harm to the King. He only came to see me. All the way from France he came. And I love him. And I hate you, Will Begbie. Yes, I hate you; I could kill you—crush you like a serpent under my foot! I know why he has done this, gentlemen; it is because I would not marry him. Ugh—the wretch! I always knew what he was. It always made me feel as if a toad hopped into my hand every time he shook it. And now he has wickedly betrayed my love—my life. But you will let him go, good gentleman. Sir Captain, I will do anything you ask. I will be indebted to you all my life. Do take me to prison in his place. I alone am the guilty one, if there is any harm. He came all the way only to see me. Would not you have done the same?"

"Indeed that I would!" cried the boy eagerly.

"If you had been my sweetheart, I mean."

"Whether or no!" cried the boy with enthusiasm. He had never seen so pretty a girl, he thought.

"Then you will let him go?"

The lad clasped his hands in despair as she smiled hopefully into his face. But Adam answered for him, tenderly caressing Bell's hand with his right, all the while keeping it firm in his left.

"He cannot, dearest heart," he said; "he has his duty to perform He is an officer of King George. I would do the same in his place. Indeed, he cannot let me go. My uncle could—but he will not." He added the last sentence in an undertone.

"But they will kill you. I am sure I shall never see you again. And—the day after to-morrow was so near!"

At the sound of her sobs the lad bowed his head in a burst of boyish sorrow.

"This is hard, Adam," he moaned. "Heavens and earth, I declare if you say the word you can run for it when my troop is at the farmhouse. I will not let them fire. They can only break me. They won't shoot me. My Uncle Henry would not let them do that, much as he hates you. And I haven't got any sweetheart!"

"My boy," said Adam Home gently, "I would not think of it for a moment. They will not hang me—at least, I do not think so. They are all for conciliation now. They say that the Prince has been in London, and that the Government knew of it."

"Do not be too sure. My uncle is very angry with you for rebelling. He never had any favor for you. And now he swears that you nearly loaded him with the King."

"And then, after all, he would have my estates if I were to hang, while the King would get them if they were only confiscated," said Adam in a whisper. "But cheer up, boy, and let us keep up this lady's spirits."

They were come by this time to the little green loaning which leads through an orchard of crabapple and gooseberries to the house of Millwharchar.

Bell had walked quietly the last part of the way, holding her lover's hand while he talked with his cousin. She dried her eyes and listened. There seemed to be some hope. His uncle, they said, was a great man in whose hand were the powers of life and death. Surely he would not order to the scaffold his own nephew—just for coming home to see one who loved him.

"Say 'good-by' to me here, little one," said Adam at the gate gently; "I will soon be back to you. And though the day after to-morrow cannot bring me all the happiness I had hoped, yet to-night I shall sleep happier than ever before, knowing that you love me. Be not afraid. We must put the other off a little—but, please God, only for a little. God bless you, Bell. Be mindful of me—a worthless fellow enough, but one who loves you."

"Good-night, then—and not 'good-by,' Adam," said Bell, brightly holding up her face to be kissed, unashamed before them all.

And so, with a wave of his hand and a look out of his eyes for her alone, Bell's lover marched off to prison smiling and debonair as ever—though the road he went might be even to the scaffold.

Bell stood on the doorstep and watched them go. Then, in a moment, her mood changed from resignation to alertness.

"John," she cried, "saddle me Brown Bess. And be quick. Don't ask why. You will know in good time. I will answer to my father when he comes home. Do as I bid."

And as John obediently departed stableward his imperious sister ran upstairs to her own little room to array herself in her daintiest dress, her whitest and fleeciest lace, her smartest shoes, and to don the pretty low-sitting hat over her sunny curls, which, when duly settled in its place, made her the most ravishing vision man could look upon. After that she stole into her brother's room, and, securing a rowel spur, fitted it carefully upon the heel of her shoe.

By the time she was finished and had dabbed her eyes free of all traces of tears, Brown Bess was at the door. And once more as Bell mounted John besought her to tell him whither she was going.

"To Cairn Edward," she cried, as she sent the rowels home with absolute disregard for Brown Bess' feelings, and started at a tearing gallop down the brae.

At the loaning foot, where she had looked her last upon the man she loved, the man who only loved her stood full in her path.

"Bell, listen to me: Bell!" he cried. "Do not go till I have had speech with you. I could not help it! He but played with you, while I have loved you all my life."

He spoke piteously, wildly, with a hoarse bark of despair in his voice. But he spoke in vain. Bell was of that nature which can forgive all things that do not touch the beloved. But the she-wolf guards not her young with fiercer tooth. She had found her love. Now she would fight for him. Rich or poor, peer of the realm or condemned traitor, Bell MacLurg cared no jot. He was hers. He was her all. What mattered a lifetime's devotion in any other?

"Out of my way, treacherous hound!" she cried, and as he tried in desperation to seize her bridle rein she pulled Brown Bess sharply around and sent in the spur a second time. Even then Will Begbie stood his ground, but the pretty vixen on horseback cut him sharply across the cheek with her whip.

"That is all I have for traitors!" she cried as she passed him. She meant one who was a traitor to her love—King George or King James she cared nothing for. Why should she? She had but one king, and even now they were taking him to his death.

Will Begbie fell back with a red line across his face and his heart broken, while Bell swept down the Cairn Edward road in a tumult of angry exultation.

"This for a lifetime's devotion!" he said, with his hand touching his stinging cheek.

"That for betraying my love to his enemies!" she said, and inconsistently bestowing a little of the same upon Brown Bess, who at least was wholly innocent.

For love is a fire that eats up all, and there is no fuel that it burns faster than bygone kindnesses which are awkward to remember.

A grave-faced man of middle age sat writing in the best parlor of Mistress Douglas' change-house in the town of Cairn Edward. He had laid aside his wig for greater ease, and now sat occasionally rubbing his cropped poll of badger gray with one hand, while he made the other to travel rapidly over the blue official sheets of foolscap which a secretary had placed on the table before him.

Occasionally he took snuff from a golden box with the royal arms on the lid, and then again he would look out of the low window before which a crowd of loafers was assembled. They were trying to get a glimpse of the man of quality within, who had come with so great a retinue to meet My Lord Galloway. It was even reported that he was one of the Royal Princes traveling in disguise.

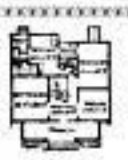
Suddenly there was a noise in the passage. The clear, determined demand of a feminine voice predominated. Then came the lower tones of a man refusing some request. Both of these were iterated and reiterated, growing every moment more insistent, till with a gesture of annoyance the man at the table went to the door and flung it wide open.

"What is this unseemly brawl?" he cried in the tone of one accustomed to be obeyed.

At sight of him his secretary and the valet who had been barring the way fell back, and between them their master found himself gazing at one of the loveliest maidens it had ever been his lot to behold. She was dressed in a short-plaited kirtle, over which was a silken overskirt prettily draped to show a tiny foot and the turn of a handsome ankle.

The girl's color was vivid, her eyes at once brimful of tears and brilliant with indignation.

"A girl of spirit," thought Mr. Henry Pelham, First Lord of the Treasury of King George II, and at present, in that august Monarch's absence abroad, Lord Justice of the Three Kingdoms as well.



As soon as Bell saw her way plain before her she ran to Pelham and clasped his arms as if for protection.

"I knew I would see him. I knew he would listen to me!" she cried triumphantly. "My Lord, will you protect me from these—domestics? They would not let me see you! You will not permit them to drag me away. They would not dare, when you are by!"

"No, no," said My Lord Justice; "come in, madam, and tell me what it is you wish with me."

Mr. Henry Pelham was embarrassed at being taken without his wig, in which, like the locks of Samson, abode much of the formal dignity of his age.

"Place a chair for the young lady, Benson," he commanded, and as the valet obsequiously did so and Bell followed him,

Teaches by mail, with perfect success, his original and scientific method of Physiological Exercise, without any apparatus whatever, and requiring but a few minutes' time in your own room just before retiring. By this condensed system more exercise can be obtained in ten minutes than by any other in two hours, and it is the only one which does not overtax the heart.

It is the only natural, easy and speedy method for obtaining perfect health, physical development, and elasticity of mind and body.

Perfect Health means an absolute freedom from those ailments which a well-informed mind knows are directly or indirectly due to a lack of properly arranged exercise.

Pupils are of both sexes, ranging in age from fifteen to eighty-six, and all reconnoitre the system. Since no two people are in the same physical condition individual instructions are given in each case.

with her eyes on the floor, My Lord Justice endued himself swiftly with his wig, and then, standing in a dignified attitude by the mantelpiece, looked at the vision of loveliness which had so suddenly burst in upon his seclusion.

"You need not wait," said Mr. Pelham gravely to his servant, Benson. The door closed instantly, and he turned toward his visitor. She had arisen also to her feet, and after regarding him a moment with troubled countenance, all suddenly she took two or three swift steps and fell on her knees before him. At the same time her hat slipped over backward and hung upon her shoulders by its riband.

The First Lord of His Majesty's Treasury stood aghast. His very wig trembled with amazement in every hair.

"Oh, will you forgive your nephew?" she cried. "He has been a rebel, I know, and he should not have come from France—but I made him. I am a wicked, wicked girl (though you might not think it to look at me). But he loved me, and he had not seen me for so long! And so would you have returned if you had loved me as he did. You know you would. For you are just like him; your eyes are the same. So you won't hang him. I rode at a gallop all the way to tell you first before any one else—and, oh, you won't let them put him in prison, or kill him. Indeed, he only came to see me——"

This is what these three saw

Tears were running fast down her face by this time, and every sentence was punctuated with her sobs. She had taken possession of Mr. Pelham's hand, and now held it fast in both of hers.

"What—what," quoth My Lord Justice, stammering in sheer amazement, "what is this? I do not understand. What nephew of mine? My nephew Harry is an officer in the King's Army, and at this moment has gone out to capture a lurking rebel of Lord Dalmarnock's forces who has returned at the peril of his life to this countryside."

"That is he—that is he!" cried Bell, loosening her grasp and holding up her hands clasped before him in the attitude of the sweetest and most pathetic supplication. "The rebel he went to take was your nephew, Adam Home. And he found him on the moor—with me. I was teaching him to fit peats. And he never plotted any against King George, or anybody. He never so much as mentioned his name."

"Adam Home—my nephew? You mean Lord Kilpatrick. That is the only rebel nephew I have," said Mr. Pelham. "He is in France—in, let me see, Avignon, with the Young Pretender; that was the last news we had of him."

Bell passed this declaration of her lover's quality without a heart-beat. She was hard on the track of something else—his life.

"But it is the same," she said, repossessing herself of the great man's hand. "He came straight from Avignon to see me. And we were to be married on Thursday and then go away again. Do let us go, and we will never trouble you or the King again."

"Ha—ahem!" said My Lord Justice; "this is grave indeed. My nephew, Adam, a proscribed rebel and companion of the Young Pretender, in Scotland, and being brought here in custody!"

"Yes, but in your custody, and your kind nephew's. Nobody else will be the wiser. And he is so sorry for rebelling, and he would never do it any more. I will see to it myself that he does not!"

"Rise, my good girl!" said Mr. Henry Pelham, thinking how awkward it would be if My Lord Galloway should happen to come in at that moment. "Allow me to assist——"

"No! I will not rise from my knees till you have promised me his life. You will not let them hang him. Send him away anywhere—only let me go with him. He will get into no more mischief then, I warrant you!"

"There! There! We will see what can be done!" said Mr. Pelham, touching Bell's curls and finding pleasure in the task.

"But promise! I will kiss your foot if you will only promise!" Bell spoke vehemently now.

"That is not necessary. Indeed, not my foot on any account when you are about it. Your hand! No, they shall not hang Adam for a traitor. I promise you they shall not. Gad, I did not think that the dog had the spirit in him to make a girl like this so much in love with him."

Bell was now on her feet and stood before My Lord Pelham, looking down and twisting her slender fingers.

"I wish any one so pretty loved me half as much!" said My Lord Justice, taking snuff. He was rather pleased with himself now that he had passed his word.

"You are very like your nephew. The same figure of a man—only a little more mature!" said the sly minx, looking with a certain admiration at the portly figure of the First Lord.

"Ahem!" ejaculated Mr. Pelham, brushing down his lace ruffles daintily. "Gad, it is true. That young rascal's mother, my poor sister, always said so. Well, well, you shall have your lover, though I am not at all sure that he deserves you."

Then he looked again at her under his shaggy brows.

"But, pray, who may you be, young lady, who have thus captured and tamed so shy a bird as Adam Home?"

"I am called Bell MacLurg. My father is a laird in this county of Galloway. But I have no money of my own. So we shall be very poor, unless"—she went close up to him, and laid her hand on the sleeve of his coat, caressing it softly as if she had been accustomed to do it all her life—"unless you think there is any chance of Adam getting back some of his property. Do you think there is, uncle?"

The stern features of the First Lord relaxed into something approaching geniality. "You would make a fool of me between you. I warrant Adam put you up to all this."

"Oh, no, he did not," asserted Bell hurriedly; "he does not know I am here. He will be very angry. But I can soon make it up with him. Now, can he have his estates back, or some of them?"

She faltered a little, and showed symptoms of relapsing again into tears. My Lord, alarmed and thinking of My Lord Galloway, approached her side.

"Do not cry, like a good girl. And we shall see—we shall see. But," he hesitated, "the King had as good as promised them in reversion to me. And indeed, I do not see what I am to get out of all this if I give back the estates."

He took his petitioner by the soft, rounded chin and turned up her face. He saw two blue eyes looking into his through a mist of unshed tears.

"I am an old fool, I know," he growled, "to let myself be cozened by a brat like you out of something like ten thousand a year."

Bell clapped her hands joyously.

"Can he have them, then? Will you promise? If you do—I—I will give you a kiss. I never gave a man a kiss before."

"What! not Adam?"

"No, not Adam!"

She forgot to say that he had taken one or two.

"By Gad, it is tempting—I will! It makes a man young again! But it must be with all the forms. No dab on the nose for Harry Pelham!"

"Besides," said Bell, casting down her eyes and hesitating.

"Besides what, you baggage?" cried My Lord, looking admiringly at her.

Bell hesitated a moment, and then, warned by a noise on the street, said quickly, with a dangerous upward glance at the First Lord of the Treasury, "besides, you will like having me for a niece. Even at Court it is permitted to kiss one's uncle!"

The door of Mistress Douglas' best parlor was suddenly opened. Without were My Lord Galloway, Lord-Lieutenant of the County, with Ensign Henry Pelham, of His Majesty's Fifth Dragoons, and between them, a prisoner, stood Adam Charles Francis Home, eighth Lord Kilpatrick.

This is what these three saw:

Henry Pelham, Lord Justice and Prime Minister of the Realm, was bending from the heights of an austere dignity to lay on the smiling lips of beauty a chaste salute—nay, as it seemed, to repeat one that had already been offered upon the same altar.

"Ha!" cried My Lord of Galloway. "Ha, Pelham; fairly landed this time, Pelham, my boy!"

"Uncle!" said Ensign Pelham, aghast.

"Bell!" cried Adam Home, yet more aghast.

"Gad, Pelham, I must have a Garter at least for holding my tongue about this. It is too good to keep from the coffee-houses! Horace will crack fifty jests on this!" laughed jovial Galloway.

"I did not know that the old fellow went in for this!" murmured his nephew, who had been lectured about his behavior at the last Assembly Ball.

Adam Home said nothing more, but kept his eyes on Bell, who stood with her hands clasped demurely about his uncle's arm, looking down and blushing becomingly, yet with a pretty air of proprietorship very clearly marked indeed.

"Ahem!" said Mr. Pelham, at last recovering himself. "You mistake. You do not know this very remarkable young lady. Not even you, Adam, you rascal, can lay claim to knowing her. This is—what is your first name again, my dear?—this is my niece, the Lady Bell, eighth Viscountess Kilpatrick. And if any man of you has a word to say to it, or any quarrel with the innocent kinsmanly privilege of which you have been witness, damme, let him step out into Mistess Douglas' inn-yard, where Harry Pelham's sword is very much at his service!"

And the old gentleman stood patting the little hand of his companion, all the while frowning and browbeating his three interrupters, throwing out his chest and nodding with his head till his bushy eyebrows became as threatening as those of Majesty itself.

"And now, Adam, you dog, come here!" he cried. "This is the young lady who saved not only your life, but your lands. One was forfeit to the King's laws; the other to my breeches' pocket. I have given both into this young lady's hand. You must beg them from her. You do not deserve either. You have behaved abominably to the best of uncles, sir, and to the most paternal of Sovereigns. But we will say nothing more about that, if—ahem—if you gentlemen will give me your word of honor to say nothing about the—ah—little ceremony it was your good fortune to witness. Galloway will not, I warrant. I know a thing or two too many about him. Harry, by the Lord, I'll break you if you peach! And as for you, Adam Home, you will have job enough on your hands to keep this young lady out of mischief!"

"Mischief!" said Bell innocently, lifting her eyes for the first time from the floor.

"Yes, madam, mischief!" frowned Mr. Pelham; "I repeat it—mischief. Making a fool of men who ought to know better—men more than thrice your age! Adam, your rebelling days are over, my lad. Willy-nilly, you must join the Government. I hear that you are to be married on Thursday! Well, all I can say is—God help you!"

"Adam," said Bell, three days after, when all was over, "what a blessing it was not your aunt I had to deal with in the inn parlor at Cairn Edward. In that case you would have been hanged instead of wed!"

A WATCH IN THE NIGHT

By Madeline S. Bridges

The Doctor's Wife (opening her eyes):
What! Going out again? It must
Be after one o'clock.
The Doctor (struggling into his vest):
Yes, just.
The Doctor's Wife:
How dreadful! Wear your heavy coat.
And, dear, please, will you mail my note,
There, on the mantel?
The Doctor: Yes; all right.
The Doctor's Wife:
And hurry, hurry back, for, oh,
When you're away, like this, at night,
I never sleep!
The Doctor: You don't?
The Doctor's Wife: Why, no!
What wife could calmly rest?
The Doctor: Ah, true!
The Doctor's Wife:
So come straight home.
The Doctor: That's what I'll do;
I won't stay out to view the sky.
But try to doze, dear, meanwhile.
The Doctor's Wife (reproachfully): If (Opening her eyes, after a silence):
Do hurry and get off, for then
You'll be the sooner back again.
It is so lonely watching here!
The Doctor (taking off his necktie):
I've just been gone three hours,
my dear!

WHAT to READ

Sienkiewicz's Half-Told Story *

IT SEEMS hardly worth while for the publishers of The Knights of the Cross to assure us in a line on the flyleaf that Mr. Curtin's translation is "unabridged." A book of four hundred and twelve closely printed pages which leaves us just in the middle of the story does not suggest abridgment. We in this hurried New World, which seldom has time for anything, envy more than we would like to admit these deliberate Poles and Russians who write as Richardson wrote two hundred years ago, and who never doubt a corresponding degree of leisure on their readers' part.

The novel has all the striking characteristics with which Sienkiewicz has made us so familiar in his earlier books. There is the same wonderful and almost painful accuracy of detail, an accuracy which—where details are so superabundant—must be the result of splendid and indefatigable labor. There is also but little attempt to construct a story out of this mass of material, the author contenting himself, as in Quo Vadis, by presenting scene after scene of exceptional power and beauty; while the men and women who play their parts in this magnificent setting are drawn on broad and simple lines, without touch of subtle characterization. Their emotions are as primitive as their drugs. A wounded man drinks a dozen pots of melted bear's fat to facilitate the removal of an arrow-head from his flesh. "When everything is oiled properly," he observes, "that dog-mother of an arrow point may slip out of me somewhere." A man in love reveals his passion with robust directness, and a man with an enemy sets himself at once the congenial task of hewing off that enemy's head.

All this is as it should be in a Mediæval romance. We cannot pierce the impenetrable veil which hangs between the twelfth century and the twentieth. We know nothing of Polish nobles or German soldiers in those dim old days, save that they were proud and brave, fierce, amorous and devout. A freedom from complex mental equipment, a corresponding vigor in action—these things made the history of the Middle Ages, and these things Henryk Sienkiewicz understands and delineates. Perhaps, as a Pole, he is systematically unjust to the Germans. Perhaps the exigencies of his tale compel him to be still more unjust to one of the great military and religious orders, whose misdeeds may have been many, but whose records gleam with superb heroism and devotion. Be this as it may, the interest of the story is so well sustained that when the reader wades through a sea of blood to the last chapter, and finds that—like a penny dreadful—it breaks off just as an appalling climax has been reached, his heart is sore and angry at the prospect of waiting he knows not how long for the conclusion. To leave poor little Danusia—that blue-eyed, bright-haired child—languishing in captivity; to leave her mighty father, Yurand, mutilated, perhaps dying, in a dungeon; to leave young Zbyshko eating out his heart for battle; and to remain in ignorance as to the ultimate triumph of innocence or guilt—this is, for the right-minded, a fiery trial. The interruption which might be borne so patiently, and even thankfully, when we are perusing a masterpiece of realism, is beyond human endurance when we are rushing through the pages of romance.

A Test of Mental Agility †

IT WOULD be a very great comfort to ordinary readers if novelists would consent to begin at the beginning of their stories, and work on steadily and methodically to the end. Jumping from London to Bombay and from Bombay to San Francisco after the characters of fiction is fatigue enough for most of us; but to skip backward and forward over intervening years involves a degree of mental activity which should be exacted of no one in moments of so-called relaxation.

A veteran story-writer, like Mr. Egerton Castle, knows the rules of his craft; and in The Light of Scarthey he starts pleasantly enough with a middle-aged recluse, Sir Adrian Landale, living in a partly ruined castle on the Lancaster coast. Yet by the time we have accustomed ourselves to this gentleman's gray hairs and forty years, we take a sudden plunge into the past, pick him up in his fiery youth, carry him through some stirring scenes in the French Revolution, and drown him—past consciousness at least—in one of the terrible noyades devised by the ingenuity of Carrier. This done, we return to the Isle of Scarthey, and enjoy a chapter or two of the middle-aged period, only to bound back when we least expect it, and see the unfortunate hero—again in youth—captured by a press-gang, and carried off for five long years of naval service. By the time we have finished with this episode, and settle down into the story proper, we are nearly as spiritless as poor Sir Adrian himself, who appears to have had all vivacity knocked out of him by the adventures of his early life.

What he lacks in this respect, however, is amply atoned for by the turbulence of his young wife, who at seventeen bedevils him into marrying her, and at eighteen discovers she doesn't love him any longer. Molly Savenaye is perhaps more interesting as a heroine than satisfactory as a yokemate, and between her wild vagaries and the plotting of his malicious and hypocritical younger brother, Sir Adrian has as comfortless a time at forty as at twenty-four. He bears his trials so beautifully the wonder is he ever escapes from them; but Rupert the Bad is happily murdered by an enterprising young smuggler, who gets hanged for his pains—more's the pity—though it requires a good deal of resolution on a novelist's part to hang an honest smuggler for making away with a villain.

After this, we are given to understand that the long-suffering Baronet wins back his wife's fluctuating affections, and starts in for a serene old age; but, from what we have seen of Molly, we cannot help cherishing doubts. There were probably times when Sir Adrian sighed for his hermitage at Scarthey, his faithful servants, his beloved books. By the way, can it be possible that any one—even a friend of his youth—ever called Wordsworth "dear Willie Wordsworth"? It has a most presumptuous sound.

The Shirt-Waist in Fiction *

IF I CATCH Barbara Yechton's point of view, the shirt-waist, that triumphant emancipator of a sex, marks the division between riches and poverty, the happy and the miserable, and one may almost suppose, between virtue and vice. Most of the characters in A Young Savage are poor—proudly and defiantly so; but they are safely across that terrible dead-line on the wrong side of which is a slight, pale girl "in a shabby skirt and shirt-waist" and with a shy and embarrassed manner, whom it is proper to aid in a manner sure to be offensive to persons with conventional dresses. The sudden swooping down from the rampant West of an unsophisticated, loyal-hearted girl into the lap of an entirely correct but impoverished family in New York brings about a series of events not difficult to predict. It takes a great deal of exemplification, however, to show how distressing a thing is vulgarity; but priggishness and demonstrative invalidism are faults which might also have been dwelt upon with a reasonable insistence. The offset to the daring essays of this belle sauvage is another girl who rules a household with the combined severity of Justinian and Portia. The daughter in turn is reduced to a lowly mind at the bedside of the little mother, a sufferer from "heart trouble" unsuspected both by herself and by the rest of her children. To keep the knowledge of this shadow from her mother and her brothers and sisters is the central purpose of the elder sister's life. A wise or even pagan contempt of death and a serenity to meet it whenever it might come would have delicately rebuked this undiscriminating sacrifice not only of self but of everybody else. I dislike to use the words "morbid" and "sentimental," they are so often unjustly applied, but if books were to be graded like groceries A Young Savage might fairly pass among "seconds!"

BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG—It Cost Fifty Thousand Dollars

($50,000) And took 18 years to make Bachelder's famous steel engraving, "Battle of Gettysburg." It is 110 times as large as this miniature reproduction, which shows but a small portion of the picture. The whole battlefield, five miles long and five miles wide, is shown in the original steel which we offer so low. It is the greatest work of art ever cut in steel, and will increase in value each year in any home, college or school. Gens. Meade, Hancock and Longstreet said: "It is correct in landscape and position of troops." Capt. Long and Luther Minargh, the official guides of the battlefield, say: "It is historically correct in all its features, and is the most interesting and beautiful war picture in the world." With each engraving we send key giving 300 references, showing location and movements of Generals, Regiments, Companies, Cavalry, Infantry and Artillery at time of Pickett's charge.

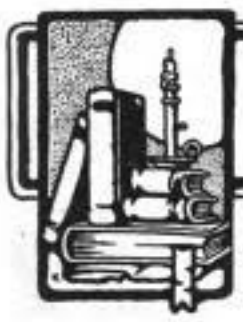
In a Moral Yellowstone Park*



THE exhaustless theme of self-sacrifice to the point of self-obliteration is again met in Sarah Orne Jewett's The Queen's Twin, and Other Stories, but how differently treated! The great renunciation is never enjoined, but simply accepted as a discipline native to the rocky pastures, the barren shores, the contracted centres of life over which Miss Jewett has long brooded lovingly and faithfully. New England renders up still choice essences of character to those who distil its subtle romance. Hardly of American flesh and blood seem the two lovers in A Dunnet Shepherdess, who quietly and unconsciously keep apart for reasons sufficient to themselves, but are sustained none the less in solitude by a love beyond words.

It is perhaps well for this land of the hustler that there should be one fenced-off retreat wherein idealism and conscience may live unharassed by the perturbations of comfort and prosperity. A sort of moral Yellowstone Park is this New England, over which a few discriminating minds like Miss Jewett are trusty guides.

Thin is the blood and unsubstantial are the personalities of those who haunt these upland pastures of our national heritage, but they are worthy of our closest knowledge. Miss Jewett has in this volume tried her hand at another difficult task—the transplanted Irish character—and in one story, Where's Nora? has wrought successfully, but perhaps too enthusiastically.

NEWS FROM BOOK-LAND

Mr. Burgin's Composite Model.—One of the characters in George B. Burgin's new book is a dissipated tom-cat. That it is well drawn is little wonder, because the author has a warm liking for the feline race, and is the proud possessor of what his friends call a "cattery," or "catterwaulery." The creation is not a portrait, but a composite of several Toms and Tabbies who started life well, but departed from grace.

Miss Reed's Early Beginning.—Miss Myrtle Reed, author of Love Letters of a Musician, wrote the book in six days on a typewriter; this is tolerably quick work even for an energetic young woman of twenty-three. In writing of her book, Miss Reed says that while it was written in six days, it is the result of more than twenty years of preparation. The basis for this claim probably rests in part upon the foresight of her father, who was a journalist. Mr. Reed destined his daughter for literature when she was in her cradle, and to smooth the way for her so far as lay in his power he gave her the name of Myrtle as an appropriate pen name. Miss Reed dates her preparation, therefore, from her christening. One of the singular results of her literary success is shown in her correspondence. She has received several offers to collaborate with lesser-known authors, and one enthusiastic admirer has begged her to write her own letters, which he is sure would be far more entertaining than those her book contains, however clever they may be.

Dusé's Favorite Tragedy.—Eleonora Dusé, the famous Italian tragedienne, enjoys considerable celebrity in her own country as a talented if not brilliant writer.

One of her works is a novel whose plot hinges on the stage. It was submitted to some friends, who read it eagerly, expecting to find a melodramatic or tragic tale. They complained to the author that they had been disappointed in this respect. She laughed and answered, "That's the comedy I like to play but dare not. All my available tragedy is used up on the boards."

When Mr. Robertson Was Put Out.—Last fall a New York literary periodical printed a sketch of Morgan Robertson's life with his likeness. A few days after it had appeared Mr. Robertson walked into the bookshop of the firm and carelessly looked over a table, partly in search of a book that he wanted, and partly to see how his own work fared. Now Mr. Robertson is broad, and tall, too, but so much broader than most men that he looks almost short, and the roll of the sea is still in his gait. His hands are brown and his face has a color that land winds never give. Mr. Robertson was smoking and searching, when down the aisle came one of the members of the firm whom he had met months before. He did not come straight toward him, but he made a circle around him, and the story-writer watched him out of the tail of his eye, thinking to himself thus pleasantly: "I know what he is going to do. He's going to say, 'Ah! Mr. Robertson, I'm glad to see you again. Glad to tell you that your book is selling well. I presume you have read the article about yourself that we printed.'"

That is what Mr. Robertson thought.

This is what the member of the firm said: "Will you kindly not smoke in this store?"

And then, making another circuit, he disappeared behind the railing in the rear of the store that separates the book-makers from the book-buyers.

"Was I hurt?" said Mr. Robertson. "Did you say hurt? Not in the least. Why should I have been? I simply faded out into Fifth Avenue, and I leaned up against the building and laughed long and loud, all to myself."

Mrs. Steel's Cook-Book.—"It is odd," said Mrs. Flora Anne Steel, the novelist, not long ago, "that one often achieves what one most wishes for in one's youth. I used to love to read Thackeray's Ballad of Bouillabaisse when I was a girl, and I often said that if ever I attained greatness I hoped it would be by writing a poem or a story upon some choice article of food that everybody liked. The years passed and I went to India and became a school inspector in the Punjab. Before this I had known very little of cooking, although I must confess I always liked good things to eat. But down in a remote district for three months I had to get my own food stuffs and do my own cooking. I studied the native languages and picked up their cooking and ways of housekeeping, and later it gave me so much pleasure to tell the incidents to my friends and gave them so much amusement to listen, that I put the experiences in a book. Although I have written novels and stories of my travels, none of my books has sold so well as my little Indian cook-book."

A New Scientific Writer.—The late Grant Allen and Dr. Weir Mitchell are not the only scientists who have distinguished themselves in fiction. One of the most popular writers of detective stories in England is Dr. Rodrigues Ottolingue, who, despite his Italian name, is an American. By profession he is a prosperous dentist with a strong leaning toward photography.

He took up photography as a relaxation from chemistry, and after he had mastered the use of the camera he found that his pictures, although accurate, were deficient in finish, so he went to a high-class gallery and succeeded in being accepted as an assistant. It was there that he learned the niceties of toning and retouching that have made his work famous the world over.

America's Greatest Historian

Dr. Ridpath needs no introduction to the American public; his name is a household word, and his history stands unequaled among all works of a like kind, giving the real substance of many exhaustive histories within the compass of a single work. How completely this is done, with what consummate skill the historian has sifted the wheat from the chaff, how the vividness of his narrative grows in fascinating power to the close, is well attested by the fact of its phenomenal sale.

Feathered Stars & Amateur Fanciers

By H. L. Fitz Patrick

A WANDERING WINNER—A LIGHT BRAHMA HEN

TO THE greater number of the exhibitors the poultry shows are merely a detail of their trade, and the cash value of a prize is of more consequence than its sentimental worth, the only subordinate consideration being that to win enhances the market price of a bird or strain. A more interesting point of view is that of the amateur fancier, who takes the keenest interest in the competitions as such, who values the blue ribbon more than the cash that comes with it, and who, aside from the pleasure of possession, is proud to devote his time and money to improvement of the poultry breeds for the benefit that will ensue. "Pro bono publico" is the motto of one millionaire who is spending thousands each year on his poultry yards, and who, though he has always a breeding pair or a setting to give away, never sells a bird nor an egg.

There are so many poultry and pigeon shows that a man, according to one in the "fancy," if he set his mind to it, could take in two a week all the year round. This does not include the poultry exhibits at the country fairs, which do not count as the "real thing" with the experts, but only those conducted in cities, towns and villages by regularly organized local associations. Through their State boards these associations are in affiliation with the national organization, the American Poultry Association, which regulates the poultry business in every part of the country and fixes the "Standard of Perfection." This is a book containing the description in brief of the recognized breeds and the scale of points under which they are judged. The judges do not fill out a card showing the way they size up a bird, but each does his best to be in accord with the ideal of the standard. The sectional parts, plumage and carriage of each fowl are considered.

NO MORE USE FOR THE CHINA EGG

The amateur fanciers, like the men in poultry breeding as a business, mainly rely on incubators and brooders to keep up their stock. The thoroughbred hen has practically been forced out of the hatching business. The time taken up in setting is a sheer waste according to the modern poultrymen, who regard the two-hundred-egg-a-year hen as the only perfect bird. The new order of things is vastly satisfactory to the non-setting breeds, like the Leghorns, but all have to make way for the incubator, even the Cochin Chinas, which, when they have the fever, would try to hatch out a doorknob. The brooders and incubators take up considerable space at every show. It is a curious sight to watch the tiny chicks pecking their way out of the shells and floundering about in the incubators until the time comes to change them to the brooders. It was the sight of an incubator in full blast at a recent show that moved a six-year-old child to say: "Look, mamma, the eggs in this little closet are blossoming into birdies!"

Amateur fanciers differ widely in the choice of poultry breeds and in their methods, for some keep but one sort at a time, while others keep a variety. Each of New York's millionaires, of the thirty who form the Farmers' Club, cultivates fine poultry at his model farm, while those who have large estates keep pheasants as well, the golden breeds to adorn their lawns, with the peacock and the English pheasants to stock the game preserves. To supplement the work of the amateurs in the latter field, the New York State laws make it illegal to shoot or snare a pheasant until 1903.

All breeds are hard to keep up to the standard of show-winners, but at the Metropolitan show the amateur fanciers win as many prizes, in the proportion of exhibits, as the men in the trade. To the gentleman fancier who is seeking an opening in the realm of feathered stars the exhibition Games might be commended in any of the varieties. They are not a farmyard breed, but are excellent layers, the perfection of table fowl, splendid sitters and mothers, and so uniform in breeding that it is comparatively easy to attain and retain winning form. They need runs in green fields, and, like the pheasant, are a rich man's breed. Their tall, commanding figures and gorgeous beauty of feather compel the admiration of all. It is the most costly breed; a cockerel, called a "stag," will bring $125 or $150.

A COSMOPOLITAN ASSEMBLAGE

Where the penned fowls quack or hiss is far from the least interesting spot at the shows. Although this is the greatest country on earth for wild ducks and geese, the show strains in these fowls are mostly of foreign origin. In what is believed to be the first of our chicken books, the American Poultry Book, by Micajah R. Cocks, published at New York in 1840, the only domesticated ducks mentioned are the common duck and the Muscovy, but the geese and kindred species mentioned include the "Gray Lag, or common goose, the wild goose, the China goose, the brant and the swan." Mention is also made of a new breed of geese "introduced into the United States from Bremen by Mr. James Sisson, of Rhode Island." They are described as being pure white, growing to a large size, and attaining the weight of eighteen or twenty pounds, the common gray goose averaging from eight to ten pounds. The Muscovy is still a favorite duck, and, with the Rouen, Cayuga, Aylesbury, Indian Runner and Pekin has its classes at our shows. The Pekin is nearly as heavy as the common geese were in 1840. It is nearly pure white, easy to raise, and finely flavored, the breed having improved since first brought from China twenty years ago. The Gray Toulouse, White Emden and Chinese geese are the only sorts penned which are extensively bred by dealers and amateurs.

PHOTOGRAPH BY A. J. HALLOCK, SPEONK, L. I.

FIRST PRIZE OLD DUCK, NEW YORK, 1899

The Indian Runner duck is the latest to be brought out in this country, the first seen in New York having been shown by A. J. Hallock, of Speonk, Long Island, in 1898, but the breed has been known for fifty years in Cumberland County, England. A drake and three ducks were originally brought from India by a sea captain and presented to friends who were farmers in West Cumberland. They have a peculiar carriage, much like the penguin, and, although lighter in weight than other domestic ducks, they are wonderful layers, the record claimed for the breed being from two hundred and twenty-five to two hundred and eighty eggs a year. They have been known to begin to lay at seventeen weeks old, and they thrive as well when without water to swim in as if near a stream or pond.

PRIZE SILVER DORKING

JUDGMENT ON THE WEIGHT OF A FEATHER

It is even harder to keep pigeons up to the standard than poultry, for in many breeds the placing is determined by a single feather. Although the amateur procures the best stock to begin with, he will meet with many heart-burning disappointments before the inner mysteries of breeding true to type are as an open book. In the moment of defeat the novice will be apt to say with Rob the Grinder, of Dombey & Son, that he thinks "a cove had better to do with lions than them little creeturs, for they're always flying back in your face when you least expect it."

The very difficulty of mastering the science of pigeon culture makes it so fascinating. Perhaps the most successful prize-winners, aside from the men who make pigeon raising a business, are men who have other occupations and who devote their leisure to the care of their birds—one of the most successful is a paper-hanger in Washington—but there are many amateurs of wealth who win a fair share of honors at the shows. The rich fanciers have an expert to manage their pigeon lofts, and they are usually in poultry as well; but what the "working" amateur lacks in traditional lore he often makes up in enthusiasm. After all, experience must be bought in one form or another. The rich are liberal buyers of breeding stock and of prize birds, but not more so than the "working" amateurs, any of whom will give from $50 to $100 for the bird they want.

FANTAILS, SWALLOWTAILS AND FRILLS

At the New York show there are about three hundred and twenty-five classes for pigeons, with some two thousand birds in competition. The breeds provided for are pouters, carriers, barbs, tumblers, Jacobins, magpies, owls, fantails, Oriental frills, turbits, dragoons, swallows, trumpeters, nuns, archangels, runts (an especially heavy breed) and homers, the latter having prizes for record-flying birds. The specialty clubs also offer a long list of cups, medals and money prizes. The regular prizes aggregate $2000.

Except in the exhibition pens, in which flocks of the different breeds make pretty pictures, the pigeons are caged in solitary state. The judges, each of whom makes a specialty of one or two breeds, wear long linen dust coats, the "duster" of the commercial traveler and the trotting-horse driver, and they gently prod the birds with canes to make them show off as they stand in front of the cage. The birds have been drilled at home to expect this treatment, and they put on all the airs imaginable. When the race is very close between two birds the judge handles them for a more minute inspection, but this is seldom done except to note the feathering when coloring counts more than everything else. The pouters, fantails and Jacobins, who must show a style, are judged in a walking pen in which they have a chance to strut around. The pouters are said to be the highest-priced pigeons caged. The prize-winning birds are worth from $25 to $100 each.

A KING AND SCOTSMAN OF NO DIGNITY

The imported stock comes mostly from Scotland, where they are called the "King o' the Doo's." They are a good-natured bird, and enjoy being noticed by the show visitors, displaying a kittenish eagerness to be spoken to and petted. When in the walking pen, to make a pouter show to the best advantage one has but to chuck it under the beak a few times in a jovial way, when the bird will flutter along in such great pride that it swells up like a balloon and the judge may readily note its markings and worth. The fantail also throws out the chest in showing off, but its breast is solid flesh, like an Indian game cock. With its unruffled fan uplifted like a peacock's spread, a fine bird will bend back until its head rests on the cushion at the base of the fan, yet as the fly feathers of the wing are kept under the tail this pigeon will strut around bravely in this seemingly impossible position. It is against a bird if he puts his head into the fan and disarranges it, and, too, if a bird has such short fly feathers that the wing will not hold under the tail as he bends backward, he cannot stand on an even keel, and a capsize results, which puts the bird out of the prizes.

FIRST PRIZE YOUNG DUCK, N. Y., 1899

Pigeon culture and poultry breeding for show would seem to be an exceptionally congenial occupation for women, yet comparatively few are on the list of exhibitors. There are more in poultry than in pigeons, although the last would seem to offer an attractive field for the fair sex, particularly to those who would like to take up a recreation that would bring in some extra money. The beginner will learn by daily contact with the birds to know what they like and dislike, and the practical work, with observation at shows and the study of the many excellent works on the subjects, will soon blaze the road to success.

SOME SOCIETY WOMEN WHO ARE EXHIBITORS

A woman who is in the "fancy" for pleasure and who has been very successful is Miss Selma Wieners, of College Point, Long Island, who has made nearly a clean sweep of the blue ribbons at the last two or three New York shows in rose-combed black bantams. Now she finds that there is money in her poultry yard should she care to sell. Among the stockholders in the New York Poultry and Pigeon Association are a number of women prominent in metropolitan society: Mrs. Robert Colgate, Mrs. Adolf Ladenburg, Mrs. Samuel T. Peters, Mrs. Sidney Dillon Ripley, Mrs. G. P. Reynaud, Mrs. Lewis M. Rutherford, Mrs. Thomas H. Terry and Mrs. Francis T. Underhill. Though now only occasional exhibitors, nearly all retain their old interest, and have pheasants, poultry and pigeons at their country houses, and it is their appreciation of the thoroughbred in featherdom which impels them to keep in touch with the annual show.

PRIZE WHITE PLYMOUTH COCK

A FANCY OF ONE FARMER'S WIFE

It would be as idle to attempt to teach a grandmother to suck eggs, to use a bucolic adage, as to tell the farmer's wife that there is pin-money in a well-stocked poultry yard; but it may be suggested that there is more money in the thoroughbred, egg-producing breeds than in the usual motley barnyard crew. A view in harmony with this idea was expressed by Mrs. J. G. Osborn, who was at the New York show of 1898 with some choice White Minorcas.

"We are farming people up in this State," said Mrs. Osborn, "but while my husband and the men look after the stock and the farm, I devote my spare time to the poultry. I find both enjoyment and profit in keeping only birds up to show form. It has always been my luck to win at the State fairs near my home, and now I am flying at higher game here in the city. To my mind the countrywoman who bothers with coarse-bred fowl is simply wasting her time and losing lots of instructive entertainment. The poultry yard is a book that is never dull."

Let it be recorded to her pluck that Mrs. Osborn won a fair share of prizes at the big show. The Jersey Blues, a breed that traces back to Colonial days, is represented at New York yearly by a few specimens. But for the zeal of a young woman on Long Island, who makes the breed a specialty, it would probably have been lost sight of long ago.

Ignoring epicurean delights, the pigeon of true utility is the homer. There are classes both for breeding and record homers at the shows. In its strong, long, racy body and alert movements the homer looks the thoroughbred more than any other pigeon.

The Philadelphia show was unusually strong in the exhibits of birds with short and long distance records, for the lofts near by have long been leaders in pigeon flying, yet a fair number of record birds are seen at the other important shows. Homers with Federation records from one hundred to six hundred miles are often on view at the New York show. In 1898 for the first time, and again last year, there were exhibits of birds, mostly of Belgian stock, from the United States Navy Homer Service. Over the pens were placards, and often copies of the messages, showing the work the birds had done in conveying messages from the battleships to their home lofts.

Some of the metropolitan newspapers use the birds to carry messages from the yacht races. Liberated twenty or thirty miles out at sea, the birds make a bee line to their home lofts, and the messages they bring are then telephoned to the newspaper offices.

THE HOMER'S TRADE BY LAND AND SEA

To be available for use at sea the homers have to learn their business by careful training on land. The homing fanciers in the Federation clubs are mostly "working" amateurs. Our country gentlemen and other fanciers of wealth and leisure do not do much to aid in the development of the homing pigeon.

A contrast to their inaction is the example of the Prince of Wales and his son, the Duke of York, who both have lofts of homing birds at Sandringham. Their aim is to breed racers capable of flights at the medium distances under the sternest weather conditions. Yet the Royal lofts are represented in all the races.

"Quilling" is resorted to, that the birds may not fly away to their old homes. This means to strip the feather parts from the quills of the wing. Until the wings grow the birds are permitted to walk about the lawns at Sandringham, and by the time they are able to fly they are too well pleased with the beautiful grounds to leave them. Homers are now in use in the Transvaal.

There is a rare beauty in the fluffiness of hackles, the curve of sickle plumes, the sweep of half-poised wings, and a riot of colors in the velvety blues, violets and greens of the waterfowl, the scarlet and gold of pheasants and the metallic sheen of the bronze turkeys; if this wealth of feathers were more in fashion with the ladies there would be no call for laws against the slaughter of song-birds and the tern gull.

Giant Flowering Caladium

NEW CENTURY

A New Species, and the Grandest Foliage and Flowering Plant yet Introduced

LEAVES three times as large as any other Caladium, having a heavy, leathery texture and a bright, lustrous, glossy-green color, which is remarkably handsome. It does not produce a bulb, but is increased by suckers, and is perennial. The leaf-stalks are strong and tall, holding the mammoth leaves well above ground. Leaves 3 to 5 feet long by 2 or 2½ feet broad; perfectly immense, and make a plant which for tropical luxuriance has no equal. Added to this wonderful foliage effect are the mammoth lily-like blossoms, 12 to 15 inches long by 7 inches wide; snow-white, changing to cream, with a rich and exquisite fragrance so powerful as to perfume a whole garden, filling the air with fragrance for a long distance. Plants bloom perpetually all summer in the garden, or all the year round in pots. Not only is it the grandest garden or lawn plant, but as a pot plant for large windows, verandas, halls or conservatories, it rivals the choicest palms in foliage, to say nothing of its magnificent flowers. Thrives in any soil or situation, and grows and blooms all the year. As many as 6 to 12 flowers rise successively from the base of each leaf-stalk, and are borne on stems 18 to 24 inches high. Regardless of all we can say in its praise, the plant will astonish every one with its magnificence — so novel and so wonderfully effective, free growing and fragrant. Certainly worthy of the new century.

Well-rooted plants, which will bloom and reach full perfection this summer, $1.00 each, 3 for $2.00, delivered by mail or express, prepaid, guaranteed to arrive in good condition.

Hayes manfully sustained, was fully performed, and the property people of the South were given their right to govern their own States as the price of assenting to Hayes as President.

Faith was kept with the Louisiana Lottery Company, and the people of Louisiana have ever since been unjustly criticised as the only State in the Union that gave the highest possible charter to a lottery company, as they could not explain the inexorable conditions which compelled them to do it. This was the last act of the great political drama of 1876-7 that made Rutherford B. Hayes President.

GRANT'S CONTEST FOR A THIRD TERM

The greatest battle ever fought in a national convention was witnessed at Chicago where the Republican National Convention met on June 5, 1880. Grant had made his journey around the world, received the homage of the highest and lowest rulers of every clime, and returned to be greeted with a degree of popular enthusiasm that had never before been given to any citizen of the Republic. During Grant's absence his friends had made tireless efforts to organize his forces in all the States, and the friends of Blaine, who fought this battle royal with the friends of Grant, had been equally earnest and ceaseless to give Blaine the victory. It was indeed a battle of giants, and the auditorium in which the convention was held was the most impressive picture I have ever witnessed. There were not less than 10,000 spectators in addition to the full delegations and alternates from the States. Neither of the opposing chieftains ever had a majority in the body, but for a week they stood up face to face with unbroken lines and belligerent leaders in hand-to-hand conflict.

Among the delegates were Conkling, Garfield, Harrison, Logan, and many other conspicuous and able leaders of the opposing factions. Blaine's people, with the aid of the field, weakened Grant's lines by preventing the unit rule in any delegation, whereby Grant lost a considerable number of votes in New York, Pennsylvania and other States. That was a test of the distinctive Grant strength in the body. Conkling opened the nominations by presenting the name of Grant, and he did so in imperial grandeur and with a degree of eloquence that was most impressive. Next to the speech of Ingersoll, who nominated Blaine in 1876, Conkling's appeal for the nomination of Grant will stand as the ablest of all the many able deliverances in the history of American politics. I sat quite close to him on the platform when he delivered it, and he was a most interesting study. Had he been as discreet as he was eloquent it would have been a perfect exhibition of impressive oratory, but Conkling was inspired not only by his love of Grant, but more influenced than he confessed to himself by an intense hatred of Blaine that he cherished until his death.

He mortally offended every friend of Blaine, and thereby made it impossible even to win the hesitating men in the Blaine ranks, by his keen and pungent fling at the delegates who disregarded their instructions to vote as a unit for Grant, and by his aggressive assault upon Blaine when he referred to Grant as a candidate "without patronage, without emissaries, without committees, without bureaus, without telegraph wires running from his house to this convention or running from his house anywhere." Unlike the Ingersoll speech nominating Blaine in 1876, the speech of Conkling, able, eloquent and grand as it was, left Grant weaker instead of stronger.

GARFIELD'S NOMINATION OF SHERMAN

Very general interest centred in General Garfield, who was at the head of the Ohio delegation that was instructed for Senator Sherman for President. Garfield knew the situation; he knew that a third candidate must eventually be accepted, and he illy concealed his efforts to advance himself while ostensibly struggling for Sherman. His speech nominating Sherman was a plea for peace rather than an aggressive presentation of Sherman's claims, and it was well understood that his plea for peace was in fact a plea for himself. At various stages of the balloting tidal waves of enthusiasm would start for Garfield, and he narrowly escaped a spontaneous nomination. He was personally very popular, of imposing presence, a most accomplished speaker, and he was finally accepted by the friends of Blaine because he was not the partisan of either Blaine or Grant, and also because they could certainly win with him and thus defeat Grant.

GENERAL GARFIELD AS A DARK HORSE

The convention was finally weary of what was evidently an equal contest between the Grant and Blaine forces, and all who were not intensely enlisted in the factional fight were glad to end the bitter struggle by accepting Garfield. Grant's memorable 306 stood by him and never lowered their flag until they were defeated, and fell with their faces to the foe. Chester A. Arthur was a member of the convention, and was nominated for Vice President to appease the disappointment of the friends of Grant.

General Grant had become intensely interested in the contest for a third term, and he had every reason to believe that it would be accorded to him. Foreign travel and intelligent observation had greatly enlarged his narrow political ideas and tempered his political asperities, and he would undoubtedly have made a much better President than ever he did before. But the unwritten law of the nation confronted him, declaring that no man could fill the Presidential chair for a longer period than did George Washington. It was that sentiment that decided the contest against him.

He was at his home in Galena, not far from Chicago, during the sessions of the convention, but though he was advised of every happening from day to day he gave no directions. He had the ablest galaxy of leaders that ever appeared in a national convention in support of any one candidate, and he trusted them implicitly. On the morning after the convention adjourned he came to Chicago, and I met him at the Palmer House, where he had come to confer with his discomfited friends. His face gave no sign of the disappointment he had suffered. He met his friends in even a more genial way than was his custom. He expressed himself as entirely content with the decision of the convention and greatly appreciated the support that had been given him. He never looked better in his life, and though I could not congratulate him, I could truthfully express my gratification at seeing him the picture of health and comfort.

He was then in entire accord with his leading friends in their purpose to prevent the election of Garfield, but after Conkling's conference with Garfield in Ohio Grant's friends gave a most zealous support to Garfield's election, and barely saved him by the aid of Tammany's betrayal of Hancock.

DANIEL DOUGHERTY'S MOST FAMOUS SPEECH

The Democratic National Convention met in Cincinnati on June 23. The leading names discussed for the Presidency were those of Samuel J. Tilden, General Hancock and Congressman Randall. It was on this occasion that the late Daniel Dougherty made the most eloquent speech of his life, presenting the name of Hancock to the convention. He was not a member of the delegation, but was called into it for the purpose on the morning of the day that the nomination was to be made. He hurried around to my room at the St. Nicholas, as he hesitated about accepting the duty assigned him. He always prepared his important speeches and memorized them. I earnestly urged him to go at once to his room and write a short speech and be prepared to deliver it. He finally decided to do so, and in a speech of not over twenty minutes he delivered the greatest oration of his life. Tilden's name was withdrawn before a vote was taken, and General Hancock was nominated on the first ballot. He had not a majority when the ballot closed, but changes were made before the vote was announced to give him the requisite two-thirds vote. With him was nominated William H. English, of Indiana, for Vice-President.

The Presidential contest of 1880 was remarkable for the absence of bitterness or vituperation. Garfield and Hancock were both highly respected, and I cannot recall a struggle for the Presidency that exhibited less of the asperities which are usually displayed in the struggle for the political control of the nation. Hancock was beaten on the popular vote by a majority of but little over 5000, and he lost his election by Tammany failing to give him a cordial support in New York. Garfield received 214 electoral votes, to 155 for Hancock.

NO SMOKE NO SMELL

THE ANGLE LAMP
"The light that never fails"

Is better than anything we can say about it. It is impossible to describe in any advertisement the comfort and pleasure derived from a light that, according to countless users, has absolutely no defect. The old-fashioned lamp, with its smoke, smell and trouble, was an entirely different institution. The Angle Lamp simply cuts out all its faults and intensifies its merits. It never smokes, smells or gets out of order, is lighted and extinguished as easily as gas, may be filled while lighted and without being moved, and, unlike acetylene, gasolene and some other new systems, it is absolutely non-explosive and is safe in any hands. In addition to the above advantages it possesses the greatest economy.

EIGHTEEN CENTS'
Worth of ordinary oil burns for one month. The feature of

"NO-UNDER-SHADOW"

is strikingly unique, as it insures all the light falling directly downward and outward. Thousands of these lamps are in use in homes, stores, factories, halls, churches, offices, etc., and are admitted to be a perfect substitute for gas and electricity. If you wish the very best light, with the least trouble and expense, send for our Catalogue K, showing all styles from $1.80 up.

A Crisis in Congress

By Thomas B. Reed

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

THE most exciting episode in the history of the House of Representatives happened in the last years of the reign of Andrew Jackson. It is worth rehearsing, not only for its own sake, but for some lessons suitable for consideration in our own times.

Democracy in its practical workings exhibits, from time to time, very strange incidents which are little to be anticipated by any foreknowledge we may have. One would have supposed, had we not had other experience, that the doctrines of liberty as carried out by a free people would lead to larger individual independence, to wider range of toleration and more freedom of action; but in our history the result has been otherwise, and the disposition to be intolerant has in many ways increased. Reliance upon numbers rather than upon strength of argument has grown with our growth. It is much to be hoped that this is only a temporary result, and that the dream of full and free expression of dissent from temporary popular opinions may become a working reality.

Our government is based in theory upon the control of all by the judgment of the majority. Rightly comprehended, this is a sound basis. Indeed it is the only basis possible in this world under any form of government. There is a voice of the people which is the voice of God, but not all voices are His, as the history of the world too often testifies. The deliberate judgment of the people, though it may not be sound for eternity, will, at least, do for the time. The sudden, unreflecting judgment, however, of the noisiest who are first heard is quite as often a voice from the under world, the voice of him who cometh "from going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it." Hence it is that every form of government is, and should be, a stronghold of conservatism, giving time for the people to reason, and opportunity to save themselves from being carried away by sudden clamor. No nation ought ever to be left to rush into war without counting, and being forced to count, the cost. There is no more pitiable thing that can be said by a great people at any time than the saying so often heard of in the life of many nations, "It was a foolish and wrong thing to be in, but we are in it and must go through." We have had in our own recent history examples not a few of the value of time for reflection, and we have been in that way saved from disasters almost too great to be borne.

Mr. Waddy Thompson presented this resolve

At the commencement of the great contest which ended in 1878 in the final defeat of "fiat money," the opinion of our people was very much in favor of the unlimited issue of greenbacks, and had there been a chance for the immediate expression of that opinion we should have been overwhelmed in the struggle, and might to-day be still wrestling with the problem of a debased currency. But thanks to the steadfastness of John Sherman and President Hayes, we passed the days of doubt and difficulty and had an opportunity for full discussion. The final judgment of the people turned out to be wise and good.

In like manner, after full discussion of the free coinage of silver, the time for which we largely owe to Cleveland, the people, contrary to their first inclinations, took different views and will soon embody them clearly in their statutes.

FOREBODING OF THE ANTI-SLAVERY STRUGGLE

The year 1837 found slavery apparently most firmly entrenched. Public opinion was only just bestirring itself in a vague way among Quakers and wild and unreasoning persons. The people as a whole wanted quiet, and a chance to do business undisturbed. Wars of conquest in the interests of slavery went on. The area of the institution was extended, and slavery seemed and was prosperous; and then we paid the penalty, the mere echo of which still costs us $150,000,000 a year. Nevertheless, though the doomed institution waxed and grew great for a dozen years more, the year 1837 was the year when it was revealed to the discerning that the conflict between the doctrines on which this nation was founded—and which were recited in broad and glowing language in the Declaration of Independence—and that other doctrine that national growth in wealth and extent must be held to be superior to the right of self-government which belonged to man as man, was to force itself to the front as one of those questions that have no pity on the peace of nations or of mankind.

THE CHIEF ACTORS IN A FAMOUS SCENE

John Quincy Adams had been Minister to Russia and to England, Secretary of State and President of the United States, and had returned to public life, having accepted the place of member of Congress in the House of Representatives. Of his long and most remarkable career there is certainly no occasion to speak to the generation which has almost all passed from the stage, and the new generations have probably not forgotten the Old Man Eloquent. Almost all, if not all the actors in the scene have so utterly passed away that they have to be described in order to give even half lights to the picture, and the materials for that are rapidly passing away.

The worst buffeted man in the arena in this debate was Waddy Thompson, of South Carolina, thirty-nine years old, citizen of a proud State, foremost on the side which was finally to fail. Thompson was a man of sense, and on subjects other than slavery was well grounded in the principles of liberty. To-day the citizens of his State can read good lessons of sound doctrine applicable to our days in Thompson's Recollections of Mexico, for he was afterward Minister to that country, and used his time to acquire knowledge and some wisdom.

Dixon H. Lewis, who went into action first, is hardly remembered now, except as a disorganizer of all ordinary weighing machines by the tremendous avoirdupois of 480 pounds. But notwithstanding this multitudinous envelopment of his soul, he was a gallant gentleman, ready once in a shipwreck to continue the peril of his life rather than risk the lives of others to save his own.

THE ATTITUDE OF SOUTHERN MEMBERS

Haynes, of Georgia, was in his third term in the House, and has no other distinguishing history. George C. Dromgoole was from Virginia, and was thought to be the brightest and shrewdest spirit on the slavery side, but his unfortunate phrase, "color to an idea," roused for a moment at least, under Adams' outpouring, the laughter of mankind.

First among the defenders of Adams was Caleb Cushing, whose career was as remarkable for its disappointments as for its honors. Diplomatist, lawyer, soldier, writer and orator, distinguished always, but seldom successful, he illustrated in his career the great rule, not often broken, that the highest talents are but failure when they are not coupled with steadfastness of purpose and a due fear of the Almighty.

Henry Clay said of George Evans, of Maine, that he knew more about the tariff than any other man in the country. Evans was then in the prime of life, the only man who ever attacked John Quincy Adams with impunity. He did it and went unscathed. Although the records of his participation in this debate are very imperfect, it is evident that he made many of the points which Adams afterward used so handsomely. Naturally, however, what was said draped itself about Adams, who had the right all through to be the central figure.

Adams had for many years contended for the right of petition, and there had been innumerable conflicts over the presentation of those petitions which related to slavery. There was much wild talk of the kind which usually surrounds a dangerous subject. According to the friends of slavery, the institution was never so commendable nor the slaves ever so happy. Wisdom was fully justified of her children. The case was clear; everybody was content. The huge pile of snow on the mountain side was so firmly fastened to its place that it could not fall. In fact, there was no snow there. Nevertheless, there was to be no whispering, not because it might bring down the avalanche, but because it was offensive to the slaveholder. The Southerners took the tone of gentlemen who had really, you know, reached the furthest verge of toleration. They would contend no longer. They would go home to their people. The responsibility was on the Northern Apologists, and even they, unless they bestirred themselves, would be treated with only distant politeness. This was "civil but visible impatience."

THE RIGHT OF PETITION DENIED

But Mr. Adams was not to be deterred. For two years he had hardly failed any day to present from one to a hundred petitions. Just a year before the scene to be described, a Committee of the House had been raised to consider this evil of petition, for if an institution could not exist, if talked about, there must be some way to stop the talk if the institution was to be maintained.

This committee reported, and the report was unanimous, that slavery could not be assailed in the United States, ought not to be assailed in the District of Columbia, and therefore, "finally" to arrest agitation, all memorials and petitions about slavery should be laid on the table unprinted, unreferred, and there things should end. How strange that word "finally" looks now under the light of history! The report was adopted against the protest of Mr. Adams, who declared the last resolution to be a violation of the Constitution, the rules of the House and the rights of his constituents. Nevertheless, amid storms of reproaches, Adams daily presented his petitions.

Mr. Cushing replied

An Attempt to Expel an Ex-President from the House

On February 6, 1837, Mr. Adams, after going through with a number of petitions, hesitated and seemed about to resume his seat, but, instead, turned to the Speaker with a paper in his hand and said: "Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a paper on which, before it is presented, I desire to have the decision of the Speaker. It is a petition from twenty-two persons declaring themselves to be slaves. I wish to know whether the Speaker considers such a petition as coming within the order of the House. . . . I wish to do nothing except in submission to the rules of the House. . . . "

A SPARK IN THE PARLIAMENTARY TINDER

The Speaker was embarrassed, declared the proposition a novelty, and left it to the House to decide.

The visible excitement of the Speaker attracted the attention of Dixon H. Lewis, who demanded to know the nature of the petition, and when told, burst into language involving at least one of the specifications of the great Saxon oath. Other gentlemen joined the cry and proclaimed treason, shouted "put him out," "old scoundrel," and the like. Mr. Haynes, of Georgia, took the floor and expressed his astonishment. It was a grave and dignified astonishment which grew on him as he spoke. Mr. Alford, of Georgia, proposed to burn the petition, and expected everybody to help him.

Thereupon Mr. Waddy Thompson, leaving out of sight, as did all the rest of them, the question really before the House—which was what the Speaker should do with the petition proposed to be offered—presented this resolve:

> "That the Hon. John Quincy Adams, by the attempt just made by him to introduce a petition purporting on its face to be from slaves, has been guilty of a gross disrespect to the House, and that he be instantly brought to the bar to receive the severe censure of the Speaker."

Dixon H. Lewis, who went into action

In order to make quite clear the wild and senseless rage that filled the multitude which Mr. Thompson tried to represent, he proceeded to threaten Mr. Adams in addition with condign punishment by the juries and grand juries of the District of Columbia for words spoken in debate in the House of Representatives.

When Mr. Thompson had said his say, Mr. Haynes, of Georgia, who had been almost the first to have his feelings stirred, proposed as a substitute:

> "That John Quincy Adams, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, has rendered himself liable to the severest censure of the House, and is censured accordingly, for having attempted to present to the House the petition of slaves."

This was met by cries of "No! No!" "Let him be brought to the bar," and was not accepted.

ANOTHER RESOLUTION OF CENSURE

Then Mr. Dixon H. Lewis appeared again upon the scene, and offered as a change, which Mr. Thompson accepted:

> "Resolved, that John Quincy Adams, by his attempt to introduce into this House a petition from slaves for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, committed an outrage on the rights and feelings of a large portion of the people of this Union, a flagrant contempt on the dignity of this House; and by extending to slaves a privilege only belonging to freemen, directly invites the slave population to insurrection, and that the said member be forthwith called to the bar of the House, and be censured by the Speaker."

After Mr. Lewis had declined to argue, and threatened that if this kind of thing were not suppressed he and the Southerners would go home, Mr. Adams arose and suggested that even if they proposed to censure him, it would be worth while to amend the resolution by striking out all the statements of fact, since he had not presented the petition at all: that the petition was not for the abolition, but for the continuance of slavery.

Editor's Note—This is the sixth paper in a series of articles by Thomas B. Reed. Other papers by Mr. Reed will appear in early issues of The Saturday Evening Post.

Then arose Mr. Mann, of New York, and gave Mr. Adams a discourse of the regretful sort, in which he wished to "pause and contemplate" how it was possible that a good man should behave so badly, grieving thus from day to day the judicious who desired peace and quiet only. Then he advised calmness; but Mr. Waddy Thompson declined to be calm. He thought Mr. Adams' conduct savored of levity, which only heightened the offense, and refused to be comforted except by new resolutions which read this way:

"1. Resolved, that the Hon. John Q. Adams, by an effort to present a petition from slaves, has committed a gross contempt of this House.

"2. Resolved, that the member from Massachusetts above named, by creating the impression and leaving the House under such impression, that the said petition was for the abolition of slavery when he knew it was not, has trifled with the House.

"3. Resolved, that the Hon. John Q. Adams receive the censure of the House for his conduct referred to in the preceding resolutions."

The House then adjourned, and, both bodies of the Congress being engaged in counting the Presidential votes, two days were had for reflection.

DROMGOOLE'S UNFORTUNATE PHRASE

Thus far the battle had not been on the side of the strongest battalions, so the reserves were ordered up, and after Mr. Adams had been asked to restate his view of the case, which he did in much the same fashion as before, Mr. George C. Dromgoole, of Virginia, thought to be the most skillful man in the House for that purpose, offered still another set of resolutions, declaring, however, that he preferred action on a question of this kind rather than debate. Mr. Thompson accepted the new resolution:

"That the Hon. John Quincy Adams, a member of this House, by stating in his place that he had in his possession a paper purporting to be a petition from slaves, and inquiring if it came within the meaning of a resolution heretofore adopted (as preliminary to its presentation), has given color to the idea that slaves have the right of petition and of his readiness to be their organ; and that for the same he deserves the censure of this House.

"Resolved, that the aforesaid John Q. Adams receive a censure from the Speaker in the presence of the House of Representatives."

Mr. Elmore, of South Carolina, trusted there was no intention of arguing this subject, but a united South would suppress all differences.

But there was really too much sense left in the South and differences began to appear, opening gaps too wide apart to be bridged over. Mr. Lawler, of Alabama, appealed to Mr. Adams to retract his action, his explanation not being satisfactory, and Mr. Robertson, of Virginia, after alluding to the exciting and stormy debate and characterizing the conduct of the gentleman from Massachusetts as extraordinary, declared himself opposed to the resolution because it was against the freedom of action due to a member of a legislative body. Then Mr. Alford, of Georgia, closed his line of discourse by declaring that the Southern men, so far from going home, would never "desert Washington until this fair city is a field of Waterloo, and this beautiful Potomac a river of blood."

—Mr. Patton proposed three resolutions

To this Mr. Cushing replied in a speech well remembered in our schoolboy days as one of the favorite declamations during the period when liberty seemed a blessing worth more than commerce and greater than empire. He rejoiced that he was descended from a race of king-killing Roundheads, and declared that if opinions on the side of liberty were maintained, it was because they were elemental, lying at the very bottom of the political institutions of the country, and if it were charged that they were more strongly held in New England than elsewhere, he would not deny it. "Deny it," he exclaimed, "I glory in the fact." Had Cushing lived his whole life on the level of that speech, he would have a loftier place than he won as diplomatist or lawyer.

THE OPPOSITION BEGINS TO WAVER

Cushing's declaration that the right of petition was elemental and above all laws and all constitutions was answered by French, of Kentucky, who announced his determination to vote against Adams, despite his respect for his achievements and character. To French, George Evans replied, and showed how vague all the proposed resolutions were, how little foundation they seemed to have as charges of violation either of rules or law; that if anti-slavery petitions did sometimes overstep the limits of brotherly tenderness, they had precedents, for the language had been borrowed from Virginia. Here Mr. Patton, as Evans proposed to cite proof, appealed to the chair to confine the debate, and Mr. Evans declined to continue, though the House voted that he might go on. Nobody quite dared to be responsible for a discussion of slavery itself.

The next time the matter came up, the Dromgoole resolution being still to the front, another effort was made to get the censure into some sort of shape, and Bynam, of North Carolina, tried his hand, offering as a substitute:

"Resolved, that the attempt to present any petition or memorial from any slave or slaves or free negro from any part of the Union is a contempt of the House and calculated to embroil it in a strife and confusion incompatible with the dignity of the body, and that any member guilty of the same justly subjects himself to the censure of the House.

"Resolved, that a committee be appointed to inquire into the fact whether any such attempt has been made by any member of this House, and report the same to the House as soon as practicable."

This was a frightful confession of defeat, and Adams must have hailed that flinching on the part of his enemies who so short a time ago proclaimed their certainty of two-thirds wherewith to expel him, if need be, with the grim satisfaction such a warrior has when he sees in a wavering enemy the assurance of victory.

PATTON'S ATTEMPT AT GRACEFUL RETREAT

Then Patton, of Virginia, afterward a judge of high repute, offered still another resolution, to enable his people now to get thoroughly away from the whole matter and yet leave themselves some faint self-respect. But it was of no manner of use. When Ursa Major has you in his full embrace, especially after he has been baited a few days, prayer or ribs of steel is the only hope.

But it seemed a chance, and Mr. Patton proposed these resolutions, three in number:

"Resolved, that the right of petition does not belong to the slaves of this Union; that no petition from them can be presented to this House without derogating from the rights of the slaveholding States and endangering the integrity of the Union.

"Resolved, that every member who shall hereafter present any such petition to this House ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of this House, the rights of the South and an enemy to the Union.

"Resolved, that the Hon. John Q. Adams having solemnly disclaimed a design of doing anything disrespectful to the House, in the inquiry he made of the Speaker as to the petition purporting to be from slaves, and having avowed his intention not to present the petition if the House were of the opinion that it ought not to be presented, therefore all further proceedings as to his conduct shall now cease."

Even this did not suit Mr. Patton himself, and so he abandoned the first resolution, and changed the second. Then the enemy broke and tried to flee, but even that poor grace was denied them; for when somebody moved to lay the whole matter on the table, Mr. Adams protested that they must hear him first. Then the previous question was moved, but Mr. Adams reminded the members that they had not yet heard him. Though this was the last thing on earth that they wanted to do, they could not, in the face of all the world, after badgering an old man of his high antecedents for three days, refuse him the privilege of reply. You can fancy the scene. It must have been a most uneasy crowd. No mere words could paint the faces of the actors as they each in his turn awaited their due punishment.

MR. ADAMS ON THE RIGHT OF PETITION

"The proposition," said Mr. Adams, "which I will ever maintain is that the sacred right of petition, of begging for mercy, as it does not depend upon condition, so also does it not depend upon character. It is a right which cannot be denied to the poorest, the humblest and the most wretched; and, moreover, it is a right which cannot be refused to the most vile, the most abandoned or the most infamous."

When he uttered those words there was not one man in that audience who did not know that he had spoken the fundamental, elemental truth which cements together the whole human race.

Then he depicted the mob of resolutions that had rained upon him from all quarters of the sky. "The object of all these varied resolutions," he said, "is to pass censure, either direct or implied, upon myself, for having asked a simple question of the Speaker. All these remind me of what Dame Quickly says: 'By my troth, Captain, these are very bitter words.' Yes, sir, they all contained bitter words against me."

Then he took Dromgoole on his horns. "The object of the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia was, I believe, to charge me with 'giving color to an idea.' 'Color to an idea,'" he repeated, as if communing with himself. Thereupon the House burst into wild laughter, glad of the relief from the fury of the other attacks, and the resolution of Dromgoole went the way of all the earth, and was seen no more except as Mr. Adams would from time to time repeat the words "color to an idea."

From this he passed to Waddy Thompson's threat of the Grand Jury of the District of Columbia, and in order to make the outburst which followed more impressive, he read to Mr. Thompson his own astonishing remarks from the National Intelligencer, and asked him if he had been correctly reported and still held those views. From Mr. Thompson's reply it is hard to understand whether he realized what he had been saying, for, after some vague mitigations of his words, he proclaimed that such was the law of South Carolina. Then Mr. Adams exclaimed: "Yes, sir, he would make a member of this House amenable to a grand jury! Such being the case, I would beg to invite that gentleman when he goes home to study a little the first principles of civil liberty." Those principles Mr. Adams then pointed out, and showed what would be the condition of the Legislature dominated by the appointees of the Executive in the District.

Dromgoole, of Virginia, declaring that he preferred action

MR. ADAMS' SPLENDID SPEECH

Then Henry A. Wise, afterward the famous Governor of Virginia, interrupted him to declare his entire acquiescence, and his disgust at the possibility of having not only the House and the Senate under Jackson's dictation, but every individual member of both houses also; for the Executive would appoint the marshal and the marshal would select the juries.

When he finished, Adams resumed, and returned to Waddy Thompson. "If a member of the Legislature of South Carolina is made amenable for words spoken in debate, not only to the Legislature, but also to the grand and petit jury—if that, sir, is the law of South Carolina, then I thank God I am not a citizen of South Carolina!" And there was then "great agitation;" for in those days a "State" was to be mentioned with fear and reverence. Before Adams got through, everybody was explaining and got about as much satisfaction as did Mr. Waddy Thompson himself.

For the better part of an hour Mr. Adams discussed the right of members to complete independence of action, owing nothing to anybody but the House itself, having no master but the body to which they belonged. He illustrated by scenes from English history how different a free parliament was from what it would have been under the surveillance of the juries of Westminster.

A BAD QUARTER HOUR FOR THE RESOLUTIONISTS

That must have been a lonesome hour for Mr. Thompson and his friends.

When Mr. Adams had finished with individuals, he began on the resolutions which had survived the shock. The first was not to be thought of, because, instead of enabling him to get an answer to his question still pending, it took up an imaginary Congressman and proceeded to censure him before his time, thus interfering for all time with the liberties of the member and the rights of the House, keeping men under the tension of threatened rebuke, to the great injury of their courage and devotion to duty.

As to the remaining resolution, he asked the House "as a right" not to pass it, for it put him in the position which he had never assumed, the position of having done something wrong and of having saved himself by timely disclaimer; that he had done nothing which required forgiveness, and declined to be forgiven.

"While I totally disclaim any intention of trifling with the House; while I totally disclaim any purpose of offending or provoking any of the members of this House, sir, at the same time, I disclaim not any particle of what I have done, not a single word of what I have said do I unsay; nay, I am ready to do and to say the same again to-morrow."

Then, to finish the debate and his assailants also, he reminded the House that he had his question still unanswered, and it was for asking that question that he was to be punished, yet if he was guilty of offense the Speaker must be much more guilty.

THE END OF THE THREE DAYS' BATTLE

"If I am to be indicted before the Grand Jury as a felon and an incendiary, the Speaker must be indicted along with me, for asking the advice of the House on the question, which he put to it. I only put the question to the Speaker, but the Speaker put the question to the House."

—he reminded the House that he had his question still unanswered

Then the resolutions were voted on. Both of them were defeated and the House went to other business.

I need not say that no attempt has been made, or could be thought of, to condense Mr. Adams' speech. Only a few extracts have been given, more to excite a desire to read the whole than to try to portray what he said.

Just look for a moment at the preposterousness of the three days' battle. A member of the House asks the Speaker if he can, under the rules, present a paper. The Speaker says he does not know, but will consult the House, whereupon that body bursts into oratory and resolutions for three days and never once seems to know what it is doing. Of course, the cause of the agitation, the underlying trouble which nobody quite dared to allude to, was the question of slavery. On that subject, everybody was trying to hush everybody else, and make believe that peace was assured, if only everybody could be kept quiet. But such a peace can never be assured. Whenever in a republic free discussion is refused, whether suppressed by law or by public terrorism, you may be sure that some wrong exists which must be destroyed or will destroy the republic.

In the Order of Providence

IT IS impossible for the present generation to realize the nature and extent of the wound inflicted on the Southern people of that day by the surrender of Lee's Army in 1865; and assuredly it is beyond description. No historian will ever be able to explain it or make its characteristics manifest to the modern mind. It is fortunate, perhaps, that this is so. A population can go through such an experience but once in its history. No disaster that might overtake us now could match that which marked the defeat and dissolution of the Confederate Army. And the reason lies on the surface: it is an experience that makes provision against itself. On the tender hand unused to labor a blister is succeeded by a callous, and so it is with the heart. Sensibilities cruelly wounded and torn can never again respond as sharply and as keenly to the pangs of misfortune and disappointment. One journey through the furnace of despair gives a long vacation to those qualities that are as rare and as fine as the rainbow sheen on a piece of silk—as restless and as vivid. And there is something grievous and uncomfortable in the consolation that time offers, for qualities thus consumed will hardly be missed save by those who have been witnesses to the beauty and perfection of their play, and who know their import.

The miracle of dissolution happened. The earthquake arose, shook itself, yawned and fell back into its abyss, carrying with it the whole structure and fabric of a newly formed government and the dearest hopes of those who had contributed to its upbuilding. Hundreds of men and women never recovered from the shock. Some of them pined away and died; others lived on, as it were, in a dream; while still others, cast in an adventurous mould, betook themselves into self-imposed exile.

Among these exiles was Colonel Fontaine Flournoy, who had risked his life on many fields and in divers ways in behalf of the Confederacy. Some of the undertakings in which he engaged were such as most men shrank from, but he, as his name implied, came from a family given over to valorous deeds and romantic adventures; for this name comes down from the days of chivalry, when the Knight of the Black Flower (Fleur Noire) made his nom de guerre so famous that it usurped the place of the family surname.

Taking all these things into consideration, it is small wonder that Colonel Flournoy considered himself an exile and a wanderer—a man without a country—from the moment that Lee surrendered his army. He was an officer in the Confederate Army on detached service. Two weeks before the surrender he was in New York City; a week afterward he was piloting the remnants of the Confederate Government southward, and lending active assistance in guarding the treasure which was carried along with it.

At Washington, in Wilkes County, Georgia, this treasure was divided, and an amount sufficiently large fell to Colonel Flournoy's share to enable him to carry out his purposes. He pushed on to Middle Georgia, where his home was, made provision for the wants of his wife and son, a lad of sixteen, bade them good-by, and, with General Toombs for a companion, made his way to the Florida coast. Here the two Confederates parted company. Toombs went to Europe, while Flournoy went to Cuba, and from that island found his way to South America.

His adventures in those queer Republics, seething with revolutions, rebellions and riots, were numerous enough to fill a book of romance; but it is sufficient to say that in the course of five years he returned home with a fortune considerably larger than the one which war had taken from him. He returned bent on enjoying a life of elegant ease after his turbulent career. But the best part of his vigor was spent. To sustain himself in the Civil War, and in the South American troubles, where he had seated and unseated more than one government, he had been compelled to employ the store of energy that should have been reserved for old age to draw upon. He had enjoyed the companionship of his family and his friends not more than a year when he fell a victim to a disease the seeds of which he had brought with him from the tropical swamps and jungles where his later campaigns had carried him.

It need not be said that the death of Colonel Flournoy occasioned deep grief to all who knew him. Where his personal friendship had not an opportunity to go his gentle courtesy went, and even those who had been made the object of one of his casual salutations regarded him thereafter as something more than an acquaintance. His obsequies were very imposing by reason of the multitude of people that gathered together to pay the last tribute of respect to the memory of the most notable private citizen of Middle Georgia.

So far as Colonel Flournoy's immediate neighbors were concerned, there was one disclosure following hard upon the heels of the funeral discourse (delivered with such genuine feeling and simple eloquence by Rev. Sampson White) that for a time stopped the mouth of friendly reminiscence and put curiosity on tiptoe. It had been the Colonel's wish that, after all had been said over his remains that grief could suggest or friendship devise, his last will and testament should be opened and read in the presence of his neighbors before they had dispersed. It was a whim, perhaps, but it was of a piece with the openness and candor of the man.

The duty of reading the will devolved on Judge Vardeman, a close friend of the family, and his sonorous voice rang out even more effectively than had the soft and persuasive tones of Rev. Sampson White, so much so that Mrs. Betsey Nicklin contended as long as she lived that it would have been better and more helpful in every way if the Judge had preached the sermon, leaving the preacher to read the legal document. Colonel Flournoy was very rich, and it was known beforehand that he intended to add to the endowments of various charitable institutions, and to leave legacies to a number of his friends, but the bequest which gave a fillip to curiosity and left a large field in which gossip and inquisitiveness might play was as follows:

"And remembering with constant and increasing affection the services rendered to me personally and to the sacred cause in which the Southern people had embarked by my dear friend, Lawrence McCarthy, who, from May 1, 1862, to April 30, 1865, acted as head waiter of the New York Hotel in New York City, I do hereby will, devise and bequeath to him, his heirs and assigns forever, the house and lot known as the Pearson Place and the plantation lying contiguous thereto, the said lot and contiguous plantation being fully described in the deeds marked F and G; and in addition to this bequest and devisement I do hereby make it the duty of my executors hereinafter named to pay into the hands of the aforesaid Lawrence McCarthy, or his surviving heirs if he have any, the sum of ten thousand ($10,000) dollars in cash, the same to be paid on the eve of the Christmas next ensuing after my death. And I hereby make it the duty of my son, Francis Flournoy, to seek out the aforesaid Lawrence McCarthy, or his heirs if he be dead, and I lay it upon him as a solemn charge to be diligent and zealous in all ways in carrying out the terms of this clause of my last will and testament; all incurred expenses to be paid equally out of each share of my estate save that which is herein set apart for the benefit and behoof of the said Lawrence McCarthy, his heirs and assigns."

Now, assuredly here was matter for gossip to busy itself about, for the Pearson Place was marked by one of the most elaborate and best-preserved specimens of Colonial architecture to be found "south of the Jeems River," as the saying is. The site was commanding, and, rising two and a half stories, the old structure seemed to take a certain grandeur from its surroundings. The plantation attached to it and made part of the bequest comprised not less than four hundred acres of the richest land in a county noted for the fertility of its soil.

And this historic old house and this splendid plantation were to fall into the hands of a total stranger—a man whom Rockville had never heard of, and a Yankee at that; not only a Yankee, but a hotel waiter!

Mrs. Betsey Nicklin, who was the mouthpiece of a great many people less outspoken than she, could make neither head nor tail to the devisement. She said as much to her husband when the two had returned home from the funeral.

"I've been knowin' Fountain Flournoy more'n forty year," she said, "and if anybody had 'a' up and told me that he'd wind up his business wi' sech doin's as that I'd 'a' felt like knockin' 'em down. But I'm not a bit surprised—not a bit. There never was a better man, I'll say that much; but Fountain was a man, and there never was a man that didn't have a screw loose some'rs. Some are too lazy to show it, and some die before they git a chance; but if they ain't shiftless and live long enough, they'll show a weak spot."

"Some on 'em show it when they git married," said Mr. Nicklin.

"You'd 'a' show'd it if I'd 'a' let you," responded Mrs. Betsey. "You know as well as I do, Wesley, that if it hadn't 'a' been for me you'd 'a' married old Moll Coy, and what would you 'a' looked like now?"

"Well, I ain't so mighty certain, Betsey, that I look one whit better than Martin Coy. I met 'im t'other night roamin' about in the moonlight, and whilst he wouldn't speak when spoken to, I don't know but what he looked every bit and grain as good as arry other man in the county. He had on his Sunday duds, for one thing."

"You didn't tell me about it, Wesley," Mrs. Nicklin declared with some asperity.

"You didn't ax me to," her spouse responded.

She gave him what she called a "look"; it was one of her methods of crushing her opponents. Mr. Nicklin didn't wither as he might have been expected to do. One reason was that he was a man past middle age; another reason was that he was at that moment engaged in grinding some dry tobacco cuttings between the hard palms of his strong hands to fit them for service in his pipe.

"Where did you see him, Wesley?" Mrs. Nicklin inquired. Her tone was imperative, as it always was when she desired to attract her husband's undivided attention.

"See who, Betsey? Oh—Martin Coy; why, I seed 'im comin' out'n Colonel Flournoy's front gate. 'Twas the night the Colonel died."

"You reckon he killed him? He's none too good to do it," declared Mrs. Nicklin.

Her husband turned upon her with amazement in his face.

"Why, Betsey!" he declared, "you'll let your tongue run on till you have a lie-bill took out again' you; and when that's done don't you run to me for to bail you out. No; I'll let the law take its course."

"Tipsy, topsy, toddle; dolly broke its noddle!" cried Mrs. Nicklin sarcastically. "When did I ever run to you to get me out of trouble?"

"Why, when you sent me word that you had set your cap for me," replied Mr. Nicklin promptly.

—WHO WERE SOCIALLY INCLINED, MET AT THE PEARSON PLACE

Whereupon his wife indulged in a fit of hearty laughter, remarking: "If there ever was a goose in this world, I got him when I got you."

"You've tried hard to be the gander, Betsy," said Mr. Nicklin, as he lit his pipe and began to smoke with an air of supreme contentment.

This couple seemed to be engaged in a chronic quarrel from year's end to year's end, and yet they had never had a serious misunderstanding, and were happy in each other's company.

"Well," said Mrs. Nicklin, trying hard to snap thumb and finger, "I wouldn't give that for old Martin Coy and all the lie-bills he could fetch in again' me betwixt Christmas and Christmas; but I'd give a purty to know how come Fountain Flournoy to have sech a mortal weakness for a Yankee, and a hotel waiter at that. That's what pesters me."

To tell the truth, it pestered a good many people in Middle Georgia when they heard of it; but when young Francis Flournoy, carrying out the duty laid upon him by his father's will, had found Lawrence McCarthy in Brooklyn, where he was living with his daughter Nora in very modest circumstances, and had installed this interesting family in their new home, the public mind of the neighborhood was no longer pestered about it.

The first to call was Judge Vardeman. The Judge's driver said afterward that "Marse Walton seed de yuther man walkin' 'bout un' de trees an' he went whar he wuz, an' den he fotch a yell, an' dey bofe grab one anudder 'roun' de neck, an' dar dey had it. Right at fust I 'low'd dey wuz fightin', an' I come mighty nigh hollerin' fer somebody ter run an' part um; but I soon seed dey wuz howdyin'. An' sech howdyin'! Man, suh! 'twuz ez de meetin' er two sisters arter so long a time."

And, in fact, the two men had been comrades and messmates in the earliest campaigns in the West. In following Forrest out of Fort Donelson on the night of February 15, 1862, they became separated, and never met again until Judge Vardeman, moved more by curiosity than by neighborly feelings, called to pay his respects to the new owner of the Pearson Place.

"Why, Larry!" he cried, still keeping his hand on his old comrade's shoulder, "it's all over the county that you're a hotel waiter, and I came over to see how a waiter would look as a landed proprietor. My dear friend, if you only knew how glad I am to see you after all these years!"

"There's no need to say it, Walton; I judge your feelings by my own. For my part, I can truly say that God is merciful as well as bountiful. Yonder is Nora, my little girl; she'll be glad to see her father's old friend."

He called, and Nora came running; and, whether he was influenced by his surroundings or whether his eyes told him the simple truth, Judge Vardeman thought he had never seen so charming a girl as Nora McCarthy. Her hair was glossy black, her eyes were gray or blue, as the light fell on them, and the rose tints flowed faintly or radiantly in response to her emotions. The play of her features was wonderful to see, and each movement of her body, every gesture of her white hands, rhymed to the artless grace and innocence of youth. In repose her countenance gave out those inscrutable, indescribable suggestions of old songs and old romances that are to be found in the ideal portraits painted by the great masters. Having a mind sensitive to impressions of this sort, the grave Judge caught himself sighing even as he smiled. He felt irresistibly drawn to this beautiful girl, who, although she had reached the years of young womanhood, was still a girl, in whom a dash of waywardness seemed nothing more than sprightliness. Happy are those whose light faults flutter toward beauty and graciousness!

Well, Captain Lawrence McCarthy being duly installed in his possessions, it was not long before all his neighbors had an inkling of his somewhat romantic career, of the risks he had run, and the devotion he had shown to the Confederate cause. He thoroughly enjoyed his new life, and he began at once to apply to the management of his plantation the methodical skill and unerring judgment which enabled him to manipulate men and create opportunities as the manager of the secret service of the Confederacy in New York. In short, he was conspicuously successful as a farmer because he knew how to manage men, because he had the art of inspiring them with his own tireless energy.

As he was a man who loved company and knew how to entertain his guests, his home soon became a social centre. Whatever training as a hostess his daughter Nora lacked was more than compensated for by her sweetness and simplicity. She knew how to be natural, and it is a great gift in man or woman. She had a fine voice, and performed on the harp. Hardly an evening passed that Judge Vardeman was not to be found at the Pearson Place, and his example was soon followed by the choicer spirits of the village.

At least once, and sometimes twice, a week all the men and women, as well as the boys and girls, who were socially inclined, met at the Pearson Place, and at such times the youngsters usually had a frolic. So that it happened that in all that region Captain McCarthy's house was the only one in which old-fashioned hospitality was revived and put to its finer uses. The young people had the spacious parlor and the wide dining-room in which to dance and play the innocent games that lead to love-making, while their elders had the library, or, in fine weather, the wide veranda. For amusement there was whist or cribbage, but those who once got a taste of Captain McCarthy's reminiscences, or heard one of Judge Vardeman's stories, preferred to sit where these two were conversing, or to linger within earshot.

On one occasion, Nora touched young Flournoy's coat-sleeve, remarking: "Do you want to hear something about your father?" All the young people followed the two and listened to the story that has already been told—the story of Why the Confederacy Failed.

"I RECKON YOU'RE A NEW MAN IN THESE PARTS"

"I still have the gold piece he sent me," said Nora proudly, shaking her bracelet under Flournoy's eyes. The young man thought that the arm on which the bracelet glistened was the fairest and most beautiful to be found in the world.

"For instance?" inquired the Captain.

"Fort Donelson," said the Judge. "We were both there."

"Upon my word, you are correct, Walton. Never before did an army, measurably victorious, surrender so tamely. You remember the rage of Forrest?"

"I do," replied Judge Vardeman laughing. "A part of it fell on me. I had been his courier during the day, and he came roaring to his headquarters like a wounded lion. He cried out to those who could hear him: 'Do you, and you, and you'—calling their names—'go and wake up every man in my command! And you, too, sir,' he yelled at me; 'and if you ain't quick about it I'll break me a hickory and flail the life out of you!' But there was no need to hurry. The enemy was camping out of hearing, expecting to be attacked. Forrest's whole command, and many others who had no stomach for prison life, marched out of the fort, and not a Federal was to be seen."

"I heard of the proposed surrender about daylight," said Captain McCarthy, "and with half a dozen others made my way out. I was not three-quarters of a mile away when I heard Buckner's bugler sounding a truce. Yes, my friend, you are right. Fort Donelson belongs high up in the list of portents. But for that surrender, Grant would never have been heard of again. His enemies at Washington were preparing to make the final move that would have swept him into obscurity. But when Providence arranges a program it is not for mortals to disturb it."

"That is so true," remarked Judge Vardeman gravely, "that mere words fall short of describing it."

"Yes," responded McCarthy, "it is true of the most trivial events, but it is only when the issues are large that we can put our fingers on the connecting links in this vast chain." He paused and looked forth across the fields of night in which the stars were blooming, sighed, and continued:

"I remember the occasion when but for a most trifling accident—we call such things accidents, though we have no right to—a life of inestimable value to the whole country might have been saved."

Captain McCarthy arose from his chair, walked to the farther end of the veranda, and then came slowly back, his head bent and his hands behind him. He did not resume his seat, but moved about in a small space in front of the older men in the company, while the young people were grouped in the door of the wide hallway, or sat upon the low railing that ran around the veranda.

"You never met John Omahundro?" remarked the Captain to Judge Vardeman.

"I never did, but I heard General Dabney Maury giving Forrest an account of him. Forrest's comment was that if he thought he could get Omahundro he'd take a week off and go after him."

"Well, John Omahundro has gone on the stage since the war, and now calls himself 'Texas Jack,'" said Captain McCarthy, whereat there was considerable excitement among the young folks, for some of them had seen "Texas Jack" and "Buffalo Bill" when they performed in their lurid melodrama of the Wild West in Macon. Some of the young ladies, especially, remembered "Texas Jack" as perhaps the handsomest and most dashing hero they had ever seen on the stage. They remembered, too, that he had long black hair that fell in curls about his shoulders, and the loveliest mustache possible to man; and he was tall—as tall as a grenadier.

"Well, he was a very handsome lad when I knew him. But his hair was too short to curl, and he had no mustache. In fact, the first time I saw him he was about as droll a specimen of the country cracker as I ever laid eyes on. He wore brogans of undressed leather, his copperas-colored breeches were short enough to show his woolen socks, and, as the day was warm, he carried his jeans coat on his arm—which enabled all who glanced at the droll figure to see that he had but one suspender, and that made of twine. His wool hat had seen service so long that it was as limber as a dish-rag. He was driving a rugged-looking mule to a small cart which contained fresh vegetables, a basket of eggs, and a few chickens. He was chewing a straw, and his face wore a most woebegone expression. He walked with a slight limp, and this circumstance, simple as it was, preserved the figure from exaggeration. You knew at once that here was a droll specimen of the poor white common to all parts of our common country, as familiar to Maryland, Virginia and Pennsylvania as it is to Georgia and Florida, or to Maine or Vermont."

"You saw him, then," suggested Judge Vardeman, "in his native surroundings before circumstances had combined to develop——"

"No," replied Captain McCarthy; "my first glimpse of him was in Washington City, within ten minutes' walk of the White House."

"Oh! I remember the very day!" cried Nora.

"When my duty carried me North on an errand that I knew would detain me there for many weary months, I carried my family with me—my wife and daughter—and for the time being I made my headquarters in Washington, renting a very modest house there until such moment as the plans of my superiors could be developed. Well," the Captain went on, laughing, "they never were developed, and I had to take matters into my own hands and organize a sort of secret service of my own, which I never could have done but for Omahundro.

"He offered his wares before many doors, but when he saw me he stopped his cart close to the pavement, searched in it till he found three chickens tied together by the feet. These he brought to the door, remarking, 'I reckon you're a new man in these parts. I've been tradin' an' traffickin' 'roun' here fer some time, but I ain't never saw you before. What mought your name be?' He looked at me and grinned like an imbecile.

"'My name might be almost anything, but it happens to be McCarthy,' I replied.

"'You're right certain it ain't McKarritt, ner McKinsie, ner no other kind of Mac?' he insisted; 'bekase I seen a lady down the road a piece, an' she says, says she, "Jacky," says she, "ef you see Cap'n Larry McCarthy, jest up an' leave three of your best chickens at his door."' As he said this the cracker nudged me with his thumb, made a queer noise with his mouth, and then fell into a fit of laughter.

"'What on earth do you mean?' I asked.

"'Well, I don't mean no harm; not a bit in the world,' he replied. 'I says to the lady, says I: "Is the Cap'n a married man?" an' she says, "I dunner whe'r he is or no, an' I don't keer; you just give 'im the chickens." She did that-a-way! She said them very words. I got a gal myself,' he remarked by way of reassuring me, 'an' she's a thumper.' He laughed in the silliest manner.

"Now I had, when first taking the cottage, left my address at a country shanty some miles out of the city, in accordance with instructions received at Richmond; but the gift of the chickens conveyed no information to me; it seemed more like a trap laid for me. But the cracker left the fowls, and as he went toward his wagon he paused long enough to say: 'I want you ter save the biggest string, Cap. I'll come back arter it some day.'

"Now, this was a cue. The big string turned out to be about a yard and a half of thrums—small threads loosely twisted together—and in this piece of thrums was wrapped a strip of tissue paper containing a message from one of General Stuart's couriers, an old friend of mine, saying that no satisfactory instructions could be got from Richmond, and advising me to act as I thought best. The bearer of the dispatch, the writer said, was John Omahundro, the brightest, bravest, and most trustworthy scout in the army. The statement made me laugh. I no more believed that the person who delivered me the message was John Omahundro, of whom I had heard a great deal, than I believed that I, myself, was Secretary Stanton."

"I never have believed it," remarked Nora emphatically.

"I was nothing but a greenhorn in the business then," the Captain continued, smiling at Nora, who tossed her head in affected anger, "and I thought that all such practices smelt of the cheap novel and melodrama. I had not changed my own name, and never did, and I thought at that time that my contempt for all disguises and underhand methods would never permit me to employ them; but when I had seen one or two young fellows, gallant but foolhardy, snatched out of my hands, as you may say, and sacrificed to Mr. Stanton's implacable temper, I soon lost my contempt for measures intended to insure my safety."

"That fellow Stanton was a grand rascal," remarked one of the Captain's audience.

"Oh, no! no! no!" cried Captain McCarthy deprecatingly. "You never were more mistaken in your life. I despised him heartily for many a long day, but he was honest and true. He was simply implacable; he spent and was spent in performing his duties; he was restless and violent, riding over everything and everybody that stood in his way. He knew neither friends nor foes when it came to his duties, and in like circumstances he would have hanged or imprisoned his dearest friend as promptly as he hanged an anonymous spy.

"Well, the day after I had received the message from my friend in Virginia I became aware of the fact that two men were following me. How long they had been engaged in this business before I discovered it it was impossible to say. At first I simply suspected it, and then I made assurance doubly sure by walking aimlessly about. But no matter where I went I found them not far away. They made no effort to intrude themselves upon me; they were not obnoxious, as you may say. They followed me at their ease and seemed to be in high good humor. Sometimes they would pause, as if trying to settle some disputed point, or one would seem to tell a good story at which both laughed heartily. Finally, having walked around and about for an hour, I determined to take a street car and go home.

"I had been walking in the direction of the Capitol, but the car was moving in the direction of the White House. The men who were following me waited patiently for the car, and then, as I expected they would, followed my example, and seated themselves opposite me. One was a young man of very frail appearance. His face was somewhat emaciated, and his eyes were sunken. His hair was a dirty yellow. His companion presented a striking contrast. His face was full and rosy, his hair glossy black, and his eyes brilliant with health and strength. He was six feet high, but seemed to be shorter by reason of his perfect proportions.

"I watched them narrowly, but they never once looked directly at me. I was not angry, but I was irritated. I knew my position, and it was by no means pleasant to be followed about by strangers. They soon began to converse, and I felt that every word they said was directed at me.

The yellow-haired man rolled his catlike eyes as he talked, and sometimes held them closed for a dozen seconds together, giving a terrible emphasis to his words.

"'You see, it's this way,' he said, speaking in a guarded, confidential tone: 'we know that a message came from the Rebels yesterday. We caught one of the messengers, but we didn't catch the other; we know that it had to do with three chickens; and we know it was delivered; but how? I wouldn't give a dime for the message itself, but I'd give a thousand dollars to know who brought it, and I'm going to find out.'

"'I reckon we won't have much trouble about that,' replied the other lightly.

"They kept up this sort of conversation for several minutes, and I assure you I was surprised at my self-control. In fact, I had no need to exercise any. I felt as placid and as complacent as if I had been sitting at home listening to Nora playing jigs and reels on the mouth-harp. I seemed to be taken completely out of myself. You'll hardly believe it, but the situation seemed to have a humorous aspect, and I laughed as I left the car.

"I walked straight home, closed the door after me, and called Nora. 'Nora, darling,' says I, 'two men will knock at the door presently. Show them into the parlor, and ask them to have seats; then go into the kitchen and stay with mother. Should you hear any unusual noise, pay no attention to it.' I made haste to move every chair from the parlor (we had few), leaving only a small sofa. This I placed opposite the door.

"Well, sure enough, there soon came a knock on the door. I went into my bedroom, secured my navy revolvers—a very fine pair, by the way—and as soon as Nora came back and described the men I motioned for her to go to the kitchen."

"Gentlemen, your little game of sneak-and-tag is played out"

"I sat in there," said Nora, laughing, "with my fingers in my ears for fully half an hour."

"I knew," Captain McCarthy continued, "that a desperate situation needed a desperate remedy, so I walked to the parlor door, covered the two men, and said:

"'Gentlemen, your little game of sneak-and-tag is played out. The first one that raises his hand or moves from his position will be the first to die.'

"To my surprise, they displayed no alarm; they showed no signs of apprehension. The reason was, to make a long story short, that the rosy youth was John Omahundro, while the other was Frank Tidwell, the quaintest wag I ever saw.

"You may be very sure I didn't take these gentlemen at their word until Omahundro had rehearsed the scene with the chickens almost word for word. This I had to depend on, for the rosy youngster before me bore not the slightest resemblance to the cracker who brought me the chickens.

"'Why should you play a practical joke on me?' I asked.

"'Well,' replied Tidwell, 'you had to be broke in, you know. I didn't know whether you was a stump-sucker or a thoroughbred. We can't take no chances here. If you'd 'a' flickered on that car you'd never laid eyes on us any more.' Whereupon, after searching himself, he produced an order on a Halifax bank for five hundred dollars in gold. This, as a guarantee of good faith, was appreciated."

"You were talking a while ago of a trivial accident or incident that turned out to have important relations to a larger event," suggested Judge Vardeman as the speaker paused.

"Yes, I was coming to that," responded Captain McCarthy; "I am simply trying to recall the impressions and details of a history-disturbing event. However, these impressions are merely personal.

"You have all heard of that unfortunate young man, John Wilkes Booth. Well, wherever there was a spark of sympathy for the South, there this young man was to be found. Omahundro knew him well, and it was natural that I should fall in with him. He was a very attractive man in every way. He had in him all the elements of genius, but seemed powerless to focus them.

"To say that this young man was mad would be to dispose of the problem he presents in a very unsatisfactory way. He was as mad as Hamlet was; no more, no less. In all his views and beliefs, in his designs and his hopes, he was as much a creature of fiction as any you find in books. He was so infected and unbalanced by his profession—he was an actor—that the world seemed to him to be a stage on which men and women were acting, not living, their parts. There was nothing real to him but that which is most unreal, the theatrical and the romantic. He had a great variety of charming qualities, and his mind would have been brilliant but for the characteristics which warped it.

"I soon discovered that this young man of unbalanced judgment and unbridled tongue was a person to be avoided by those who had work to do. Omahundro had already made the same discovery for himself, and he predicted that Booth would commit some act that would drag the innocent to death. For my part, I went at once to Canada, then returned to New York, and had very few opportunities after that of seeing this unfortunate young man.

"But I was in Washington on the eleventh of April, 1865, three days after the surrender of Lee, and though I was in no enviable frame of mind I had the greatest confidence in the wisdom, justice and humanity of President Lincoln. I felt, as did all who knew him, that he would do the right thing, in the right way, at the right time. Omahundro, I remember, had somewhat gloomier forebodings. He had a real love for the President, who knew the lad only as a country cracker, and relished his drolleries, which, in the main, consisted of narratives and anecdotes after Mr. Lincoln's own heart. In addition to these drolleries, Omahundro had a pretty good head for politics, as all our Southern young men have, and he thought that Mr. Lincoln would be carried away by the radical wing of his party, which Stanton, assisted by Morton and Stevens, had already nursed into life.

"Now I had some knowledge of men, and it struck me that Mr. Lincoln's excessive patience and forbearance were really the entrenchments behind which his purposes lay. I thought, I say, that while he seemed to be deferring to the judgment of others, he was engaged all the time in carrying out his own firm resolutions and unalterable plans as fast as events would justify them."

"That is the simple truth," exclaimed Judge Vardeman.

"That is the way it struck me," Captain McCarthy went on, "and I really felt better after the surrender than for some time previously. For one thing, the suspense was ended; the inevitable had come to pass. Still, I was gloomy enough.

"Well, I had arrived in Washington on Tuesday. The next Friday was Good Friday. As I was coming from morning devotions I met Omahundro, who had been waiting for me. He was nervous and excited.

"'I'll tell you what,' he declared, drawing me aside, 'we are going to have trouble, sure; that fellow Booth is getting ready to do something desperate. I tell you he's crazy. I've been talking to him, and he's wild on the subject of ridding the country of tyrants and oppressors.'

"'Pooh!' said I, 'such talk comes natural to him.'

"As it happened, we had not gone far before we met the unfortunate young man. He paused long enough to pass the time of day, and quite long enough for me to see that he was laboring under a great mental strain. His eyes shone with an unnatural lustre, and his gestures were uncertain.

"'I'll come to your room this afternoon, my friend,' he said to Omahundro, 'and take a nap. For the work that is before me I need the preparation of slumber. Aye,' he cried, with a wild gesture, 'and others will sleep! Envy not their dreams—envy not their dreams, my friend!'

"'I'll meet you there,' said Omahundro.

"Now, for three long years it had been my business to foresee possible troubles and entanglements and to provide against them, and so when I heard this young man's remark and noted his excitement I began to think of some possible difficulty into which we might be dragged. Therefore I said to Omahundro:

"'Do go to your room, lock the door, and let it be understood that you'll not be back until late to-night.'

"'Why, Cap, I want to collar that fellow and keep him there till he gets over the tantrums. It won't be hard to straighten him out. I believe he's got the jimmies.'

"'Well,' I replied, 'you can only restrain him for a few hours. His mania will renew itself, and if he sleeps in your room this afternoon you will be identified with whatever he does, especially if he commits some serious crime.'

"'I reckon that's about so,' said Omahundro.

"Nevertheless, and in spite of all this," Captain McCarthy continued, speaking gravely and with emphasis, "John Omahundro did go back to his room, and permitted this unfortunate young man to sleep there that afternoon. When Booth was sound asleep, Omahundro slipped out, locked the door, and carried the key away with him. When he returned he found that the young man had escaped by the transom.

"In the course of a few hours we were overwhelmed with the news of the President's assassination. It was a terrible blow to the South, but for some good purpose Providence permitted the event to occur. Omahundro was deeply affected by it. He felt that if he had remained in the room with the unfortunate young man, and had restrained his movements until the next day, his bloodthirstiness would have been dissipated.

"But in my opinion no earthly power could have kept the assassin in that room. He would have found some means of escape. The awful event, provided for in the mysterious order of Providence, would have come off on the moment."

At that moment Joe-Bob Griffin drew his bow across his fiddle in the dining-room, and the young people went flocking in, laughing and chattering as young people will.

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

WASHINGTON, February, 1900.

I AM beginning to find out that this many-sided Capital City is one that teems with rumors, and that gossip, nay, even babble, is coin in free circulation. More than this, I find that I am prone to give credulous ear to rumor, and that unconsciously I am impelled to augment that rumor, which I suppose may be laid upon the back of the ever-patient scapegoat, human nature. But with rumors fast flying, I ask in all seriousness how the newcomer is to discern between truth and truth-likeness? I am met wherever I go with rumor and babble and gossip, and in turn I carry them with me wherever I go, and as the prayer-book saith, "There is no health in us." I was detailing some gossip to Robert the other day and he met my babbling remarks very reprovingly.

"Have you never heard, my dear, that 'fire and sword are but slow engines of destruction in comparison with the babbler?" Almost in the same breath he added:

"That reminds me, there is a rumor about town that there is a split in the Cabinet."

And then he wondered what I was smiling about.

Why, Robert comes home with a new rumor every day: rumors about politicians, about political deals and political disaffections, and it seems to me that politicians and statesmen are as bad as a village sewing society which daily uses up yards of cotton cloth and all the reputations in the community. I asked Robert where he picks up these rumors. He said that they originate for the most part over the blazing fires in the cloak-rooms; that whenever a day's session happens to be short members gather around these fires and discuss all manner of things.

They are smiling broadly over a contest involving an item in the estimates for the Congressional Library. It seems that Librarian Putnam, than whom there is no one more sturdy and independent, has asked for an automobile at a cost of eighteen hundred dollars. Now, it is a curious fact, Robert says, that any one asking for an appropriation of a million dollars is more likely to get it unquestioned than one who asks for a trifle of eighteen hundred, and this item is not likely to go unchallenged, notwithstanding that the Librarian has taken care to explain that the object of this automobile is not his own personal comfort in locomotion, but the speedy delivery of books and pamphlets called for daily and hourly by members and Senators. This item was jocosely called to the attention of Mr. Cannon, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, when a lot of members were lounging before the cloak-room fire. "Uncle Joe," as he is familiarly called, was asked what he thought of it. He shut his eye reflectively and said dryly, he thought that "perhaps a bicycle would do just as well."

LIBRARIAN PUTNAM, THAN WHOM THERE IS NO ONE MORE STURDY AND INDEPENDENT

Mr. Beveridge, who has lately sprung into the arena a full-fledged orator, is deepening the good impression that his first speech made. He was one of the speakers at the big bankers' banquet in New York the other night, and Robert, who was there, said that he made a great hit.

There are now four recognized orators in the Senate on the Republican side. These are Mr. Lodge, Mr. Wolcott, Dr. Depew and Mr. Beveridge, and the rivalry among them ought to be good-natured, especially as they stand together on all the issues save silver.

There was a time when the Senate numbered among its most brilliant orators several on the Democratic side of the chamber. But those days are gone. There seems now to be but a single figure left, that of Mr. Daniel, of Virginia, the State that has given us so many of our great orators. He is the peer of any speaker on the floor. Of the four orators on the majority side it would be difficult to decide upon their merits, although it is said that Senator Chandler is actually selected as a referee to decide to which of them shall be awarded the palm. The idea of grave, gray-headed Mr. Chandler enacting the rôle of Paris, as it were, is inexpressibly funny, and I am afraid that the judgment of Paris could not have awakened more feeling than will this judgment of his when it is rendered. Robert says that Senator Lodge is the most quiet and dignified of the four, with a finished, clear, logical style. Senator Wolcott is more ornate, more witty and far less restrained. Senator Depew is perhaps the most polished and musical, and Mr. Beveridge, with his impetuous vocabulary, is more fiery and impassioned, and has more of the natural orator in him than any of the others. But surely there is room on the Senate floor for all these four men, for any one of them upon opening his mouth can instantly have a following as numerous and as enthusiastic as had the Pied Piper of Hamelin.

Among all this talk there is one persistent rumor that crops up again and again; it is to the effect that two members of the Cabinet are on such terms of enmity that the atmosphere of the White House on Cabinet days is extremely frigid, and that the President's diplomacy is being taxed to the utmost in trying to keep the peace. I asked Robert what this Kilkenny state of affairs was all about, but he looked inscrutable and was silent, so I suppose that another State secret is trembling in the balance. That it will finally topple over is certain, since it is on the lips of the cloak-room.

However, if the White House atmosphere is frigid on Cabinet days it was far from frigid on the occasion of the State dinner the other night, to which Robert and I were bidden along with diplomats, statesmen, generals and admirals. I was afraid that perhaps I might be overawed by the occasion, but thanks to the training I have had of late in the official world, and thanks to Jules, this dinner seemed only a glorified edition of an every-day affair. True, the magnificent bed of purple orchids which extended down the middle of the table and the equally magnificent court dresses of the Ambassadors could not be duplicated in private houses, but the dinner could have been duplicated, nay, quadrupled in point of excellence. It seems that at the last minute two of the honored guests did not arrive—Admiral and Mrs. Dewey; so a whole table full was cheated out of the satisfaction of knowing which would have taken precedence, the Admiral of the Navy or the General of the Army.

On the occasions of these State dinners the long red corridor is used as a dining-room, the old State dining-room, with its table top pieced together out of pine boards, having long ago grown inadequate for these banquets; for nowadays the President dines from seventy-five to eighty guests as against twenty-five or thirty in former times; and as these State dinners come out of the private purse of the President, there being, I am told, absolutely no fund for the White House save for repairs, they must be a heavy item of expenditure.

As I looked up and down the table, made brilliant and beautiful in every way that modern decoration can suggest, and surrounded by the highest and best in our land and by the pick of other lands, with Lord Pauncefote at the top, and, according to social gradation, with the Koreans at the bottom (they won't mind this statement, for, poor things, they would not understand it if it were shouted to them in every known language), I will confess that my Spruce City heart swelled with so much pride that the food offered me became of secondary importance.

I could not help thinking of the letter of advice which George Washington sent to John Adams concerning the etiquette that should be the rule in the President's family. After advising the utmost reserve and aloofness toward others, Washington wound up by saying: "In order to remove the appearance of too immense an inequality, the President might invite a few high officials to dinner now and then, but on such occasions the President should not remain with them long at table."

General Washington did not dream of long course dinners through which the President must remain from caviare to coffee, and all to the accompaniment of a Marine Band.

Impressed as I was by my first State dinner I was glad that I did not have to undergo it often, and, on reflection, I was more than ever pleased with Jules and my own little dinners. The dinner which he served to Senator P——, when the Senator, Robert and I personated the Graces, was perfect. It was the simplest and shortest dinner we have given. Of course I told Jules that our only guest was to be a Senator. He asked:

"Will Madame haf ze goodness to tell me ze name of Monsieur ze Senator?"

When I gave it he nodded.

"Oh, yes, I know ze taste of Monsieur; leave all to me, Madame." And I did.

"UNCLE JOE" CANNON, AS HE IS FAMILIARLY CALLED

During dinner, Senator P—— said to me:

"Do you know, Mrs. Slocum, that you have happened to serve my favorite things to-night? It is an odd coincidence."

Whether it was because of this, or because he is more gracious than he has been credited with being, or because he had had his own way so signally in the Senate that day in tabling an adversary's resolution, I do not know, but he was delightful. Never in all my life had I seen Robert come out of his shell as he did under the influence of the Senator's spell. He talked really brilliantly, and I saw for the first time a seat in the Senate taking shape before my mental vision. Their theme, principally, was the late war, and the clamor in Congress against the Administration.

"Yet," said Robert, "much has been made out of Washington's political utterances by these peace-at-any-price men, but not one of them had the courage or honesty to use one extract from one of his speeches which is this: 'The United States ought not to indulge a persuasion that, contrary to the order of human events, they will forever keep at a distance those painful appeals to arms with which the history of every nation abounds. There is a rank due to the United States among nations, which will be withheld, if not absolutely lost, by the reputation of weakness.'"

"Ah!" said the Senator, deeply interested, "that would seem momentous to-day. Where did you find that, Slocum?"

"It is to be found in Irving's Washington, in the last volume, and, as you say, is momentous. We are confronted by a condition, and these words fit this precise condition."

"Why don't you address the House, Slocum, and embody this?"

"I shall, when the occasion offers," said Robert quietly, and there was a fire in his eyes I had never seen there before.

"It is a curious thing," said the Senator musingly, "that the fate of men who oppose a war in progress, or oppose their government in the management of it, are nearly always overcome by oblivion. There was brilliant John Randolph, who never recovered from his opposition to the War of 1812."

Just here the footman brought me a card bearing Mr. de Courcelles' name, and I was compelled to leave Senator P—— and Robert to their cigars and their politics; and not a word or hint had been given about the postmastership.

Mr. de Courcelles is, as foreigners go, a good-looking man. He is blond, and is of athletic build, and he speaks English with almost no accent, but he looks absurdly young, almost a boy in fact, in spite of his length of limb. He did not seem backward about speaking plainly of his devotion to Page, after which he surprised me by adding that he had secured leave from his Government to return to France. I spoke out impulsively:

"Ah! You are running away?"

"No, Madame, not that. Heaven forbid!"

"She has perhaps refused you, then?" said I, with a feeling of sudden relief.

"No, I have not spoken. I must not, though Mademoiselle knows full well how it is with me."

"Ah! I think I begin to understand." I spoke impatiently, for I thought I knew why he must not speak. "You do not speak, Mr. de Courcelles, because of the drawback of there being no 'dowry' in the case of Mademoiselle?"

He flushed, but looked straight at me, and said quietly:

"No, that is not the reason. Mademoiselle has no dot, it is true, and as Madame knows that is one of the requirements in my country; but there being no dot would not stand, with me, in the way, nor yet would the new rule which was promulgated by my Government after the marriage of the former Ambassador. Madame knows that in consequence of that marriage a rule was made practically forbidding marriages of diplomats with foreigners except when special permission is obtained from the Government, and——"

"Oh! Your diplomatic career would come to an end?" I said, thinking that I had the reason for it all at last.

"Practically so, Madame, but not even that would deter me. I must conform, in order that my marriage should be in accord with the regulations of my country, to various formalities which happily in your country do not affect your marriages. I must have, above all, parental consent."

"But you have no father as I understand, and surely a mother's consent could not legally affect a——"

"Ah! Madame, you do not understand all our intricacies, nor could I explain. It is true that I am the head of my house, but even with that I am powerless without the consent of my mother, and it is for her consent that I am about to go to France and leave Mademoiselle without speaking any word of pledge."

"Why does your mother withhold consent?" I persisted.

The red blood mounted to his face. He dropped his monocle suddenly with a genuine gesture of distress, but he made no response, and I spoke out with curling lip:

"I understand. It is because Page has no dowry, and is a little unknown American girl, and you and your——"

"No! no! Madame, I beg of you do not say it; you in your country are so generous in your institutions I beg of you to be generous to mine, which I would have otherwise if I could. I pledge you my word that whatever prejudices and objections my mother may have, not one of them shall stand in my way for long, but I must obtain her consent or else wait a long time, and I must, of course, go to her; then I shall return and declare myself to Mademoiselle——"

"And expect that Mademoiselle will fall into your arms without further delay?"

I was unreasonable, and ungenerous and angry too, for I felt that I was fighting for my own. The effect of my words was instantaneous. He rose to his feet and his face was very white.

"I beg your pardon, Madame, if I have made a mistake in burdening you with my affairs. I have no means of knowing how Mademoiselle regards me, but I wished that some explanation should be forthcoming as to why I am leaving your country so suddenly."

There was a dignity about him that appealed to me at once. I held out my hand to him and said, half-indulgently:

"Forgive my impatience, but I love Page."

"Ah! and I love her, too," he interrupted; then he raised my hand to his lips and, looking at me coaxingly, said:

"Madame, you will be my friend; I know it, I feel it; you will take care of Mademoiselle for me until I get back. You will even say one, two, three kind little words about me to her?" And of course, womanlike, I promised.

"How long will you be absent?" I asked.

"Six weeks, and they will be as six years to me."

With a few more words he was gone, and I was left with an uncomfortable impression that there was some obstacle over and above his mother's lack of consent. I turned the whole interview over in my mind and suddenly two things flashed upon me which speedily shaped themselves into resolves. One was that I would, on the morrow, send to the State Department and ask the august powers which preside there for a copy of a recent report made by our Ambassador, Mr. Porter, concerning the status of American wives before the French law. The other resolve was that I would talk to Robert about this whole affair. Robert was almost as devoted to Page as I, for in lieu of a daughter of our own we had practically adopted Page, and, if Mr. de Courcelles should prove to be all right and Page should have set her heart on marrying him, I determined she should not go to him unprovided with a dot.

Booming the Big Show

By W. C. Coup

Edited by FORREST CRISSEY

IT MAY not be generally known to the public, but it is a fact, that nearly one-half of the entire expenditure of a circus is incurred in the work of the advance brigades. The advertising material, its distribution, express, freight and cartage, together with the salaries, transportation and living expenses of seventy-five to one hundred men, amount to vast sums of money. The largest number of men I ever used in advance of my show was seventy-five, and for this people called me crazy.

Though, of course, there is a limit to possible receipts, there is no doubt that the business secured is in proportion to the sum used in advertising, and it is almost impossible to draw the line at which judicious advertising should stop. This is demonstrated by the fact that the dressing-room tents of the present day are larger than were the entire old-time circus canvases, when the advertising was done by one man on horseback and all the paper used was carried in his saddle-bags, and the salary of any star advertiser now is as much as was required to run the entire show of years ago.

SENATOR LODGE IS THE MOST QUIET AND DIGNIFIED OF THE FOUR

I early learned, by experience, that big receipts at the ticket wagon followed big advertising expenditures. In 1880, in order to boom the "Newly United Monster Shows," I arranged some very peculiar and novel advertising features in the way of three cars especially fitted out for the use of my advance agents. The first brigade was accompanied by an enormous organ, for which a car was built, the latter being drawn through the streets by an elephant. This organ was a masterpiece of mechanism and was specially built by Professor Jukes. Its tones resembled the music of a brass band and could be heard at a great distance. This, of course, attracted the people, and the brigade would then advertise the show by a lavish distribution of handbills.

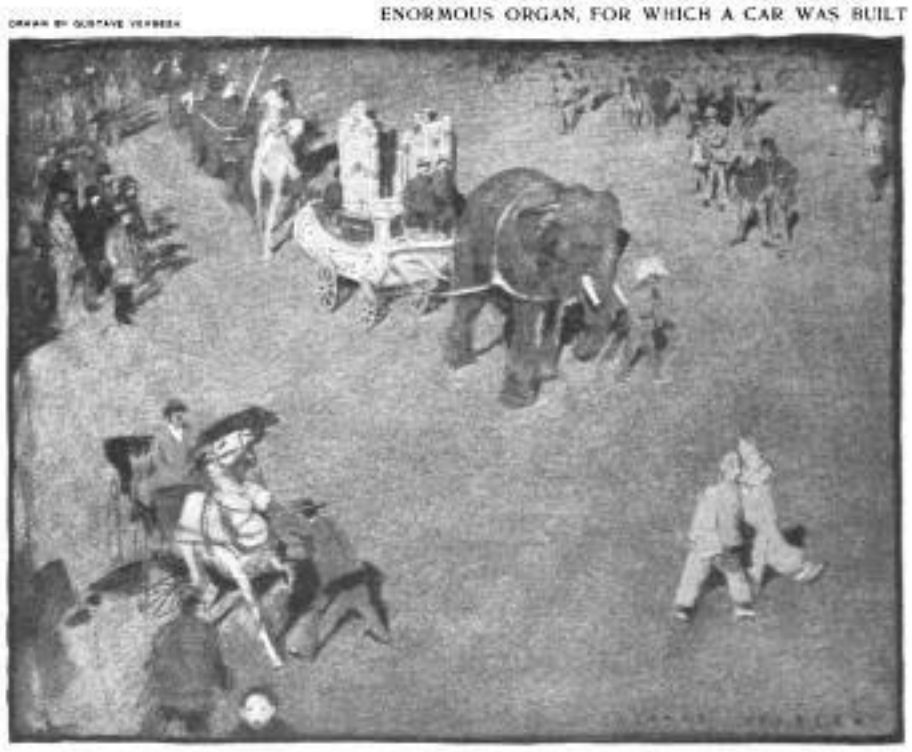
Unfortunately the elephant and the music combined to frighten many horses and I soon found myself defendant in numerous damage suits. Indeed, that single elephant seemed to frighten more horses than did the entire herd with the show.

At one place temporary quarters for the elephant were secured in a stable which could be reached only through a private alley. When we came to take possession of the barn, the owner of the alley, with several policemen, stood on guard and undertook to stop the progress of the huge animal. Their efforts, however, met with no success, for, with the most sublime indifference, the beast moved quietly forward. For this I was sued for "trespass" and "injured feelings." As the elephant was the offender, my lawyer proposed to bring him into court as the principal witness, a proposition which caused considerable amusement. As no damage had been done, the "laugh" was decidedly on the owner of the alley.

My second advertising car was fitted up with another enormous organ of far-reaching power, and attracted much attention, while my third and last advertising brigade rejoiced in the possession of an engine to which was attached a steam whistle of such power and discordant tone that it could be heard for miles. This the men would blow while going through the country. Professor Jukes had christened this diabolical invention the "Devil's Whistle," and so well did its sound fit the name that the people must have frequently thought His Satanic Majesty was near by.

As that car with its whistle would steam into a town, the inhabitants would flock as one man to see what it was that had so disturbed their peace, and thus were we enabled to advertise more thoroughly than any show before or since. I have often thought that I really deserved punishment for thus outraging the public ear.

Between these three advertising brigades I had smaller companies, accompanied by a colored brass band, which discoursed pleasant music while my bill-posters decorated the dead walls and boards. The band also gave concerts at night upon the public square and, between pieces, a good speaker would draw attention to the excellences of the coming show.



A uniformed brigade of trumpeters was also sent through the country on horseback, and a band of Jubilee Singers marched through the streets singing the praises of the "Newly United Shows." Added to these attractions were two stereopticons that pictured, from some house-top or window, the main features of the show. This, together with perhaps the most liberal newspaper advertising that ever had been done, made the whole advance work as near absolute perfection in show advertising as possible.

One of the picturesque features with the advance show was Gilmore's "Jubilee Anvil Chorus." The anvils were made of wood with a piece of toned steel fastened at the top in a manner which secured a volume and resonance of tone that could be heard much farther than that of an ordinary anvil. At intervals, to strengthen the chorus, cannon were fired off. This, though a great novelty, caused some dissatisfaction, especially amid crowded surroundings. My excuse was that the chorus was a free feature furnished by my friend Gilmore, and that, as it cost the public nothing, the latter should be satisfied. Never before nor since was a country so startled and excited over the coming of a show.

A great circus uses large quantities of advertising paper—so much, in fact, that it is difficult to keep track of it. True, the superintendent of the advertising car gives each man so many "sheets" in the morning and the man at night hands in a statement which is supposed to show where and how he has placed the paper. These brigades are followed by "watchers," or, as the railroad men term them, "spotters," who look carefully over the ground. But the impossibility of detecting all crooked work may be readily understood when I say that from eight to twelve wagons containing bill-posters and paper start out on country routes in as many different directions, so the "spotter," not being ubiquitous, cannot follow every trail. One of my "spotters," however, did once ascertain that a party of my men had driven into the country and dozed comfortably in the shade all day, had not put up any paper and had not fed the hired horses, although they did not forget to charge for the "feeds." The horses were thus made to suffer and the men pocketed the money which should have gone for oats. Of course my superintendent discharged the entire brigade, although, when the season is well under way, it is very difficult to obtain skilled bill-posters, for it is quite a difficult craft and experts are in good demand.

The reader, however, can easily see what a great loss such doings entail on a show, considering the cost of the paper at the printer's, the freight or expressage, the cartage, and the money paid the men for putting up the sheets. The printing bills of a first-class show are enormous. My lithograph bill alone, the last successful season of my show, amounted to

THE FIRST BRIGADE WAS ACCOMPANIED BY AN ENORMOUS ORGAN, FOR WHICH A CAR WAS BUILT

$40,000, and this was before the days of extensive lithographing. I believe I ordered the first three-sheet lithograph ever made, and also the first ten-sheet lithograph. This was considered a piece of foolishness; but when I ordered a hundred-sheet bill and first used it in Brooklyn it was considered such a curiosity that show people visited the City of Churches for the express purpose of looking at this advertising marvel. How things have changed! The Barnum and one or two other shows now use nothing but lithographs and many of their bills are beautiful works of art, some of them being copies of really great pictures.

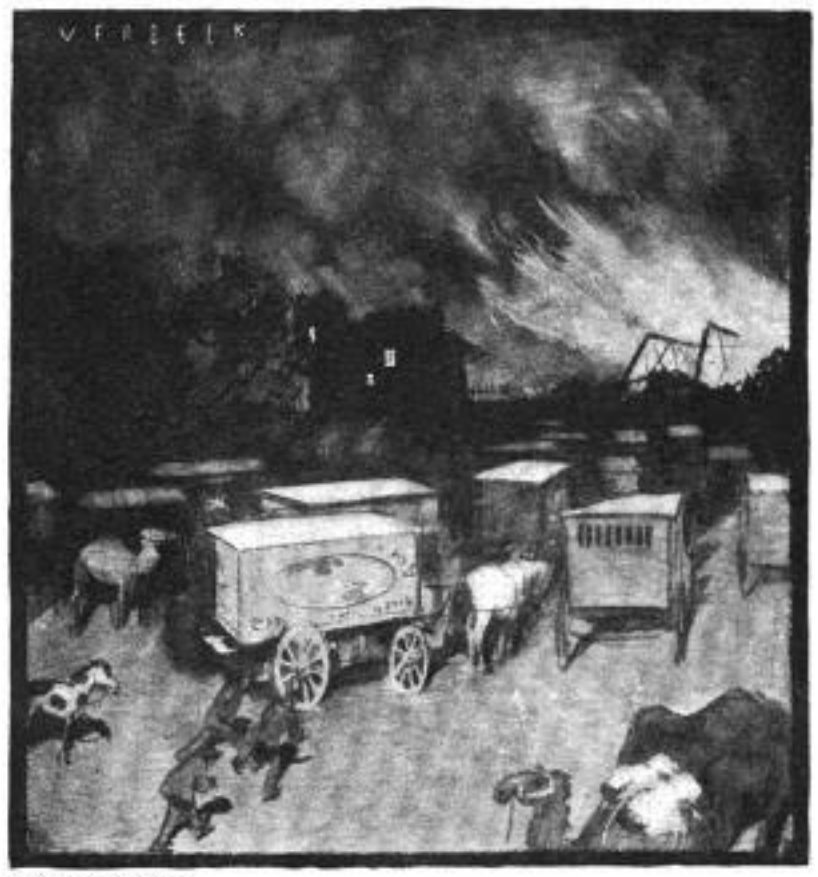
I can remember when one-sheet lithographs cost one dollar each, and for several years later they could not be bought for less than fifty to seventy-five cents apiece. They can be had now in large quantities for about five cents or less the sheet. As shows nowadays frequently use hundreds of sheets in a day, imagine what would be their cost at the price paid in the pioneer show period.

The circus of the present day is judged by the quality of its paper. One season I arranged with a publisher to use a folded quarter sheet, three sides of which advertised our show and the fourth side contained the first chapter of a story about to be published in his magazine. These were furnished to us in enormous quantities and our agents distributed them. In Boston we had four four-horse wagons full and these followed our parade. The men tossed the folders high in the air and the wind carried them in all directions. While this style of advertising surprised the people, it was soon stopped, and properly, too, by city ordinance. I think circus people would be better off if ordinances were passed wholly prohibiting bill posting; but unfortunately such a movement would go far toward breaking up a profitable industry, since many of the bill posters are rich men, some making as much as $25,000 a year and a few fully $50,000. I believe Mr. Seth B. Howes, the veteran circus manager, was the first one to order a billboard made or paste paper on the outside. Previous to this all bills were hung or fastened up with tacks.

There was always a sharp rivalry between the advance brigades of opposition shows, and many are the tricks which they play upon each other. Perhaps the most serious and daring trick played on me was when the agent of an opposition show actually went to the railroad office and ordered a carload of my paper, which was on the sidetrack there waiting for our man, to be shipped to California. Believing him to be representing me, the freight agent did as requested, and my advance brigade was delayed until a fresh carload could be sent on from New York, which could be done in less time than it would have taken to have brought the original carload back from San Francisco. After accomplishing this contemptible trick the fellow escaped and, although I had Pinkerton men closely on his trail, I was never able to get service on him. Of course the scamp's employers were legally responsible; but in those days we never thought of bringing suit in cases of that kind, although I was strongly tempted to do so in one place, where an opposition show had covered my dates with their own and had greatly damaged us by misleading the people.

Of the many other sharp tricks played on me by opposition shows, one of the best, or worst, was that of equipping genteel-appearing men with sample cases, and sending them in advance of my show in the rôle of commercial salesmen. These men would step into prominent stores and, after a short business chat, incidentally mention my name and then impart the information that my show had disbanded and gone to pieces. This, of course, would set the whole town talking and the news would soon spread over the entire county, thus doing me irreparable harm.

The general public has very little idea of the extent to which opposition tactics are carried by the representatives of circuses and menageries. The rivalry between two shows often costs thousands of dollars and is sometimes kept up by the agents long after the proprietors have become reconciled. Once we became involved in one of these contests and the opposition, in order to harass us, actually had four of our men arrested in different States on a charge of libel. The Indiana libel laws were very severe, and in each instance we were compelled to give a heavy bond for the release of our man.



That year the train of a rival outfit ran off the track, and one of the proprietors, in the course of time, became my agent. One day, in a confidential chat, he alluded to the mishap, and told me that at the time it occurred he fully intended accusing us of having had the switches turned, thus causing the disaster. To that end he had even gone to the length of swearing out warrants for our arrest. They knew that we were perfectly innocent, but their object was to gain notoriety and sympathy. At the last moment, it is to be presumed, their better natures asserted themselves; at all events, they weakened.

Another party in opposition warfare copied our money orders. Orders of this kind were given by our agents and paid by our treasurer on arrival of the show. They were given for services rendered or goods bought, and covered the expenses of livery teams, distributing bills, flour, feed, advance brigade supplies, newspaper advertising, etc. They were made out something after this style:

> "On presentation of this order and ten issues of —— Newspaper, containing advertisements of the Coup Show to exhibit at —— on the —— day of —— pay Mr. —— $—— amount due him.
> "(Signed) —— ——
> "Agent."

These orders were extensively used by the opposition for some time before we discovered it. Its object, of course, was to make the newspaper proprietors and the public think they were advertising the Coup show, while of course their own dates would be inserted instead of ours.

At a certain place in Ohio a bridge was burned in advance of us and entailed the loss of our next "stand," or date. We could not safely accuse any of our competitors of this contemptible and incendiary trick; but we knew they were driven to desperation and were capable of resorting to any such outrage.

DRAWN BY GUSTAVE VERBEEK

AT A CERTAIN PLACE IN OHIO A BRIDGE WAS BURNED IN ADVANCE OF US AND ENTAILED THE LOSS OF OUR NEXT "STAND," OR DATE

There were agents so utterly unscrupulous as to receive pay from opposition shows for disclosing to them information that should have been jealously guarded, even betraying the advance route. I knew one agent who was an expert telegraph operator and able to take messages by sound. He would scrape acquaintance with the regular operator and pass his spare time in the telegraph office secretly taking our messages as the latter were being sent over the wire, the local operator being ignorant of the loafer's telegraphic skill.

These opposition fights greatly benefited the local bill posters and were frequently urged on by them. Sometimes a show would send a brigade over the country at night, placing its own dates on the paper of its rival, thus getting all the advantages of the first show's paper. Sometimes the indolence and laziness of my own men have annoyed me greatly. I am reminded that, while my advance brigade was billing Texas, one of my agents became utterly disgusted with the sleepiness of his men. They were mainly of corpulent build and their captain actually sent me this message:

> "Waco, Texas, July, 1881.
> "W. C. Coup:
> "Sturtevant House, New York City.
> "There is one more shade tree in Texas; send another fat man to sit under it."

On numerous occasions I have had to pay dearly as a result of the sharp practices of unscrupulous people, and it is a well-known fact that a circus man has to deal with a great many of this class. Our advance agent always engaged the lots on which we were to exhibit, and he did so at Austin, Texas, renting the necessary ground at a most exorbitant figure. As usual, he gave an order on the company which was to be paid immediately on our arrival. But the owner, or pretended owner, inserted a clause in the agreement that the lots were to be used if still in possession of the signer. Immediately on our arrival the bill was presented, and as promptly paid. Imagine my surprise when, as the show opened at night, another bill was presented for $150. It seems that this sharper had made a fraudulent sale of one of the centre lots on purpose to swindle me. Of course I paid it, under protest, in order to enable the performance to proceed, as, anticipating a refusal on my part, they had illegally attached some valuable ring stock.

Some years ago when George Peck was struggling with Peck's Sun, long before it had been recognized as a "leading comic paper," I visited Milwaukee with my show. My invariable instructions to my agents were to advertise in every paper, but especially to place an extra advertisement in all young papers struggling for recognition, provided, of course, that they had merit. For some reason, or through oversight, George Peck's Sun had been entirely forgotten. Nevertheless, I found on reaching Milwaukee that Peck had, on several occasions, good-humoredly alluded in his columns to my coming, and had not "roasted" me, as many other editors so slighted would have done. Accordingly I sent him a check which would have more than paid for the advertisement he should have had but did not get. To my surprise he returned the check, saying I owed him nothing. I declined to receive it and once more sent it to him, telling him not to come any of his "funny business over me," and to reserve his jokes for his paper. This brought him around to my hotel, and I was delighted to become acquainted with one of the cleverest men I have ever met. Later he became Governor of his State.

As an example of the courteous treatment I have invariably received at the hands of the newspaper editors I cannot refrain from giving the following incident which occurred when the show was in North Carolina. In a town in that State one paper, through an oversight, had been skipped altogether in the distribution of the advertising. When the second brigade of the advertising army arrived in town, it found that the issue of this paper had already been mailed to its subscribers. Nothing daunted, however, this agent arranged with the publishers for a special issue which, teeming with praises of the Coup show, was issued and mailed to all subscribers. As a result, excellent houses greeted us when we exhibited in the place.

The rivalry between the great shows extended to the newspaper advertising as well as bill-posting department. I remember that once, at Pittsburg, the opposition was very strong, and I had as press agent a brother of the man who held the same position in the employ of my rival. They were both excellent newspaper men and thoroughly understood their business. We would take whole columns in the newspapers, and my men with the show would telegraph to the papers at Pittsburg after this manner:

> "Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania.
> "The W. C. Coup show did a tremendous business here to-day; the largest and best show ever seen here."

These telegrams would be used to head our other notices in the Pittsburg papers, and whole columns would follow, setting forth the merits of the show. With more solid indorsements these telegrams so worried my agent's brother that he was at a loss to know how to overcome them. He finally hit upon a novel and dashing plan. After our columns had been set up in the various papers, he would then engage the adjoining columns. In this space, in display type, he denounced our telegrams as bogus, stating that he had seen his own brother write them at the hotel. This announcement completely took the wind out of our sails.

Many amusing things of this sort occurred in the war of opposition, but others of a more serious nature would, of course, come up. Although August is not considered a good show month of the year in New England, we once did a tremendous business there in dog days. Business was especially large in Bridgeport, Connecticut, the home of the "greatest showman on earth." At this town the standard and respectable newspapers united in giving great praise to the show; but one obscure little sheet did me the honor to differ from the entire American press on this score. Mr. Barnum did not visit the show. In the heat of opposition, some of my agents devised a punning lithograph which represented a chicken coop and depicted me sitting complacently thereon, smoking a cigar, while Mr. Barnum and some other showmen were represented as confined in the coop beneath me. This cartoon was, I considered, too severe, and I ordered it to be suppressed and all copies burned. Some man, however, got hold of a quantity of them and thought it a good joke to distribute a lot of them in Bridgeport. Although I had tried to prevent this violence to the feelings of the great showman, the joke worked well and thousands attended the show from which Mr. Barnum absented himself.

To illustrate the rapid and extensive growth of the circus business I will relate the following: A very few years ago there was an old gentleman living at Delavan, Wisconsin, at the age of ninety-four. In his youth he was a daring trapeze performer and at one time owned, in partnership with a man named Sam Stickney, a circus as large as were most circuses of that day. This old gentleman, Mr. Buckley, visited my show and, in course of conversation, asked what my expenses were. I told him about $3000 a day; at this he smiled and related how, on one occasion, he had been buying some horses for his show, when his partner, Stickney, came to him and said: "Look here, Buckley, we've got to quit buying horses, or the first thing we know our expenses will be fifty dollars a day, and you know we can't afford that."

The Big Pension Building in Washington

Just about one year hence the largest hall in Washington will be occupied by an army of decorators. They will twine its noble columns with thousands of yards of bunting, and thousands of flags will be hung on wall and ceiling. Myriads of electric lights will turn the vast space into a scene of indescribable brilliancy.

During the day of the Fourth of March a President will be inaugurated, and that night the society, diplomacy and citizenship of the world will gaze upon a scene that has few equals in public functions. There will be the new heroes of the latest war—men wearing more medals and larger titles because of our difficulties with a foreign nation. All this will take place in the great Pension Building, which outwardly looks like an enormous barn built of brick.

For several days prior to all this festivity workmen will be removing thousands of cases containing records that tell of suffering and sacrifice, of wives made widows, of mothers bereft of children, of young men crippled for life, and all of those innumerable tragedies which attend war. It is a contrast which comes home to us every four years, and in some respects it is like holding a great dance upon the graves of heroes. But this age is nothing if not practical, and the Pension Building is the only structure in Washington which can come within the reasonable requirements of an inaugural ball, to which admission may be gained by any one of respectable character who has the money to pay for the ticket.

The Size of the Nation's Pension Bill

The people of the United States are now paying more money for pensions than any other single item in the total of Government expenses. The amount is almost $140,000,000 every year. After the close of the war the entire sum was less than $21,000,000. In the thirty-odd years it has increased nearly sevenfold, and as these lines are being written the information comes from Washington that applications for pensions from the war with Spain will exceed fifty per cent. of the entire forces engaged in that comparatively safe conflict. Nothing touches the people so quickly as taxation, and thus the pension question has a direct bearing upon every citizen. There are bitter words on both sides, but it may be well to remember that each party to the controversy has its rights.

The first view of the pension question is pitiful in the extreme. There are at present upon the pension rolls of the Government about 990,000 names. They are distributed all over the world. Even on St. Helena there is a man who draws $144 a year from the treasury of the United States. In Ireland there are 415 veterans who annually get over $60,000 from this country. In far away Siam there are two others. In every continent are American pensioners.

Among the States Ohio naturally leads, receiving a total of over $15,000,000 a year, distributed among 105,000 pensioners, Pennsylvania coming next, New York third, Indiana fourth, and so on down the list. Among all these the total of nearly $140,000,000 is distributed. In order that it may be done with the best facility, there are eighteen agencies extending all the way from Augusta, Maine, to San Francisco. Go to any of these places and see the men and women who draw Government bounty, and though there will be many exceptions, the people who form the mass of the crowd are maimed of limb, are bent by disease, or have some sign to show that they have suffered. It is a spectacle that moves one profoundly, and it is repeated as regularly as pay day comes around.

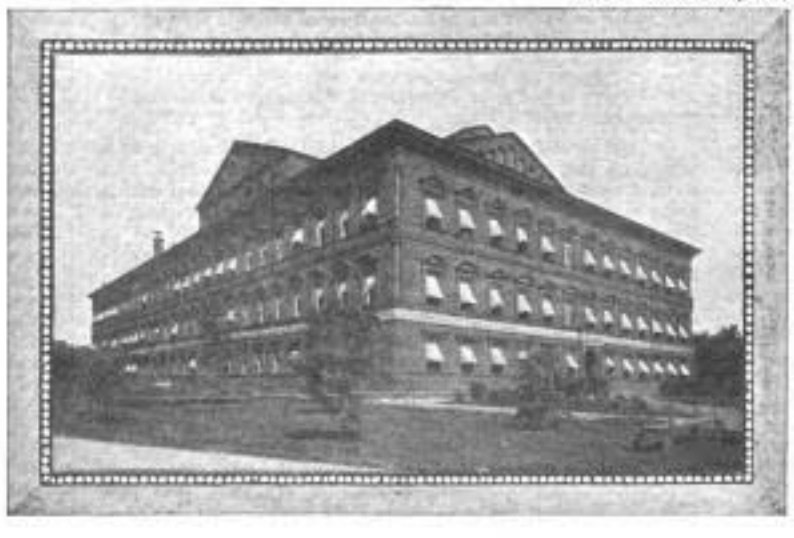
This country has seldom been niggardly in any of its dealings, and it is particularly liberal in its treatment of those who serve it. It pays the highest salaries of any nation in the world, and when its soldiers fall or suffer while working in its behalf it is glad to support them in their misfortunes. Public sentiment all over the land wants the real soldier to be generously aided. But in cases of this kind there are numerous scoundrels who will take advantage of a people's liberality, and there have probably been more attempts at fraud, more rascality, and more unblushing effrontery in connection with pensions than in any other experience of our Government.

For instance: Congressmen will introduce bills providing that every man who served in the army should have a pension, and that every slave who was liberated should receive money from the United States Treasury. Such vicious action simply provides opportunities for thieves. The bill to pension ex-slaves led to one of the widest schemes of petty larceny this country has ever known. The rascals formed associations, sent agents through the South to organize local clubs or societies, collecting initiation fees and dues. "These impostors," says the Commissioner of Pensions, "have reaped a rich harvest from those who can least afford the loss, and while they are unquestionably guilty of obtaining money under false pretences, there is no Federal law under which a stop can be put to it."

Eighteen Thousand Pension Attorneys in the United States

During the last fiscal year 24,662 pension attorneys were disqualified, the great majority of these being taken off the list by the revision of the roster, but it is interesting to notice that the causes which led to disbarment and suspension numbered twenty-eight, including making false certificates, collecting illegal fees, collusion, bribery, false affidavits, conspiracy and blackmail. After the removal of this large number there still remained over 18,000 pension attorneys in the United States. Many of these are estimable men who serve their clients conscientiously and whose services are valuable to the Government as well as to the pensioners, but there are hundreds who will do anything in order to get a fee. It is not necessary to go into the question of the interesting frauds on the pension lists, but it is admitted that the Government loses literally millions of dollars every year—money that does no good, because it goes to those who do not deserve it and who use it badly. This is a double crime, because it robs the deserving who are in the majority on the pension list.

The Official Figures of Pension Growth



The following figures are supplied by the Commissioner of Pensions at Washington. They show the amount of money that has been paid annually to pensioners of the Army and Navy since the close of the Civil War, and the number of pensioners each year:

Year	Army	Navy	Pensioners
1866	$15,158,398.64	$891,951.24	126,722
1867	20,552,028.47	231,841.22	155,474

1892	135,964,611.76	3,479,535.35	876,068
1893	153,045,460.94	3,861,177.00	966,012
1894	136,495,065.61	3,490,370.96	969,544
1895	136,156,808.35	3,650,980.43	970,524
1896	134,632,375.88	3,582,999.10	970,678
1897	139,313,914.64	3,615,802.71	976,014
1898	140,934,348.71	3,727,531.09	993,714
1899	134,631,258.68	3,663,794.27	991,519
.....	$2,338,559,870.58	$51,351,104.16	.....

To the amount paid out for pensions, as shown in the table, should be added the pension expenses. Since 1866 the Government has paid over $15,000,000 for fees of examining surgeons; over $12,000,000 for maintaining pension agencies and general disbursement expenses, and over $52,000,000 for salaries and the maintenance of the Pension Bureau. The total of the pension bill since 1866 to the close of the last fiscal year was almost $2,470,000,000.

PENSION BUREAU, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Shall the Laws be Made Easier

The present questions that concern the Pension Bureau are whether the laws shall be made more strict or easier. The Grand Army of the Republic, of which Colonel Albert D. Shaw is Commander-in-Chief, gave serious attention to the matter at its last encampment. It was very generally published that the veterans would adopt bitter resolutions against the Commissioner of Pensions, H. Clay Evans, on the ground that he was interpreting laws too rigidly and was hindering the granting of pensions. The fight was made largely in the executive session, but part of it took place in the open meeting and the pension attorneys attacked the Commissioner with considerable vigor. The result of the work was a series of resolutions which asked for a return to the old rule under which 400,000 names were added to the pension roll; also that the present rule against allowing a pension to a widow with an income of $96 a year be changed so that the limitation might be increased to $250 a year. President McKinley favors this. Committees were appointed and the matter reached Congress. There have been hearings from all sides of the controversy, and the present attention seems to be in the direction of a revision of all the pension laws. The laws are so mixed up now that the pension question is largely a matter of interpretation. It may be that the present Congress will place it all in the hands of a committee, in which event the present laws will be gone over and harmonized, and newer and more intelligible statutes will be recommended to Congress at its next session.

An entertaining proof of the liberality of interpretation in the Pension Office is found in a recent report of the Commissioner of Pensions, who, in commenting upon the act of June 27, 1890, in which the basis of ratings is incapacity to labor joined with incapacity to earn a support, says:

"The Department's interpretation of the law has been that under said act pension is provided only in cases when incapacity to labor joins with incapacity to earn a support. I am free to say that the practice has never been to inquire into the capacity of the claimant to earn a support. The prosperous have been pensioned alike, on application, with the less fortunate, plainly on showing disabilities or disease, without any reference to the claimant's wealth or capacity to earn a support."

Not Much Prospect of a Decrease

There have been many interesting estimates as to when our Pension Bill would begin to decrease. Garfield announced that the high-water mark had been reached twenty years ago, when the total was about forty per cent. of the present figures. Since that time there have been annual announcements that the maximum was in sight. But the trouble is that the laws and interpretations are constantly changing the bases for estimates. For instance: For the fiscal year 1899, though there were 2195 fewer pensioners than in 1898, the amount of money paid out was $649,496 more, for the simple reason that there had been an average annual increase in the value of all the pensions. In the table the total for 1898 is larger, because it contained nearly $7,000,000 of pensions belonging to 1897.

There are to-day on the pension list several widows and daughters of Revolutionary soldiers, nearly 2000 widows of the soldiers of the War of 1812, between 5000 and 6000 survivors and widows of the Indian wars, and over 17,000 survivors and widows of the Mexican War.

But the fact which has a peculiarly interesting and important bearing upon any calculation we might make about the future of the pension laws is that the average annual value of the pensions granted under the war with Spain is higher than that for any war in the history of the country. With this liberality to the survivors of the war in which few were killed, there must, of course, be a larger generosity toward the veterans of the Civil War, who will be able to wield a powerful political pressure in their demands.

MISS OTIE CHEW

Why Miss Chew's Father Protested

A new star in the American musical world is Miss Otie Chew, a young and pretty English girl who enjoys a high position in Europe as a violin virtuoso. Miss Chew tells a pleasant story about her early training. Her father was a musical enthusiast, and to stimulate ambition promised her one day sixpence for every new tune or piece she would master.

Though but six years old, she had a keen business sense and immediately devoted herself to very short compositions, chiefly popular songs and dances. At the end of a month her father protested:

"I take it all back," he said; "I must either compromise or become bankrupt. Hereafter instead of sixpence apiece I will allow you sixpence a day."

The Congressman's Misplaced Compliment

Dr. James Walker, a well-known physician of San Francisco, in discussing the necessity of tact in political life, tells the following incident:

"We had a candidate, one year, for reelection, a Congressman. It was a very close fight and everything depended upon holding all our voters together. The campaign was to end with a mass meeting, where the candidate was to be the chief speaker. The committee had discovered that the enemy had made a slight inroad upon some of our Irish voters, and warned the speakers to be extremely careful in all of their references to the Emerald Isle and its people. The Congressman, when spoken to, drew himself up proudly and said:

"'Leave it to my discretion, gentlemen. I will not offend them. I will charm them.'

"And he did.

"On the closing night he said, almost at the beginning of his oration: 'I am glad to see so many here to-night who come from the little green island beyond the sea, the land of Tom Moore and Father Prouty, of romance and of verse. Americans can never be too grateful to the Irish race for what it has performed in the New World. The names of Patrick Henry and Generals Montgomery and Sheridan will go ringing down through the corridors of time. And America has tried often to express her gratitude. When the great famine threatened death to Ireland, she sent provisions by the shipload across the sea, and here in this, our city, where American ingenuity has invented the street sweeper which does the work of fifty Irishmen, who formerly performed this task, we have kindly and appropriately called it the steam paddy.'

"There was a shout, a yell, a crash, and the meeting was broken up forever. I believe that the infuriated Milesians chased the candidate a mile."

Mrs. Dewey's Ready Wit

The wife of the Admiral of the Navy is noted for her brightness at repartee. At the time of her engagement to the hero of Manila Bay she was much annoyed at the publicity given to her every movement, and very sensitive to criticism. An editor of one of the Washington papers called to her over the telephone one day in regard to a photograph that had been sent to him to use in a descriptive article.

"It is so poor," explained the editor, who was an old friend of Mrs. Dewey's, "that I dislike to use it. Are you sure you know which one I refer to?"

"Oh, yes," said Mrs. Dewey, "that's all right."

"But I don't think it is all right," said the editor. "Don't you want justice done you?"

"No," replied Mrs. Dewey, "I only hope for mercy."

Professor Brown, the New Government Astronomer

Professor Simon J. Brown, the new Astronomical Director of the Naval Observatory, defines luck as the faculty of being prepared to embrace every opportunity that presents itself. He has no patience with scientific men who are constantly invoking political influence. No temptations have ever induced him to resort to this aid, and he has risen to his high office entirely through merit, confidence in himself and fearlessness of those high in authority.

Professor Brown's career has been most successful. He grew up in the little town of Hammondsport, New York, at a time when the martial element dominated the country. A sword and General's epaulets represented, at that period, the Ultima Thule of his ambitions, and, unknown to his family, he applied to the member of Congress from his district for a cadetship at West Point.

"I have some one already in view for the place, a personal friend," responded the Congressman sharply to the ambitious lad.

"But you have no right," argued Brown, "you have no right to bestow this appointment upon a personal friend. It is a public trust. You owe it to the people to give it to the most competent person you can find, a boy who will make the most out of the position, who will best serve his country."

The Congressman listened attentively to the boy's earnest argument and finally promised that he would give the cadetship to the most successful candidate in a competitive examination. The promise was not kept, but the politician redeemed himself by naming young Brown to a cadetship at Annapolis on the completion of his first year at Cornell, whither he had gone to study civil engineering. A naval career did not appeal to his tastes, however, and a few years after his examination Midshipman Brown applied for a professorship of mathematics in the Navy.

"But you have no political indorsements," said the Secretary of the Navy, when Mr. Brown presented his papers.

"No," responded the young officer, "I have none. I had a few letters of that character but have withdrawn them. They were perfunctory, the people who wrote them did not know me, and their praise amounts to nothing. If I cannot get the appointment upon my own merits and upon my record I do not want it."

The Secretary argued, but the young man was obdurate. No amount of persuasion would induce him to change his mind, and he was ultimately appointed through no influence except that of his own excellent work at the Naval Academy, at Cornell, and in the Coast and Geodetic Survey, where he held an important commission for a while.

Like most men of his profession Professor Brown is not given to joking, but occasionally he indulges in a bit of humor. On one occasion a colleague came into his office and, finding the Professor standing, said:

"Is it possible you work that way? I cannot stand standing."

"That's peculiar," replied Professor Brown quickly; "now, do you know, I cannot stand sitting!"

How a Physician Helped Mansfield to Fame

On the morning of January 10, 1883, Richard Mansfield, the actor, woke up in New York probably a trifle nervous, because he was to appear in a new part that night, and certainly unknown so far as the public was concerned. The next morning he awoke to find himself famous. As Baron Chevrial in A Parisian Romance, produced by Mr. A. M. Palmer at the Union Square Theatre, he had taken to himself the chief honors of the production, and had made a comparatively unimportant rôle the principal part in the play. The morning newspapers gave full columns to the review, and Mr. Mansfield's name was starred in the headlines, as it has been almost ever since in his own playbills.

"Mr. Mansfield," said Mr. Palmer the other day, "had been playing the part of the Chancellor in Gilbert and Sullivan's comic opera, Iolanthe, and met with an accident in Baltimore which caused him to leave the road. He returned to New York and I engaged him for the Union Square Stock Company. When I accepted A Parisian Romance, I cast Mr. J. H. Stoddart, who played old-man parts, for the rôle. But he declined it, and I asked Mr. Mansfield if he thought he could play it.

"'I'll try,' he said, and he set to work at once. One day at a rehearsal I noticed a stranger in the front of the house. I asked Mr. Mansfield who he was. He said that he was his physician, who had been helping him study the part. The Baron, you know, is stricken with paralysis on the stage, which deadens one side of his body. The night of the first performance Mr. Mansfield made the greatest hit of the play, and his success and that of the play was at once assured."

MISS LEONORA JACKSON

Miss Jackson's Left-Handed Compliment

The career of a successful musician is full of happy incidents and adventures. Miss Leonora Jackson, the American violin virtuoso, is no exception to the rule. She was a favorite pupil under Joachim, who predicted for her the triumphs she has had.

In England she was, to use English Court language, commanded to appear before the Queen. She was overjoyed at the invitation, but knowing of the Monarch's thorough knowledge of the great performers of the world, went in fear and trembling. She had herself properly instructed in Court etiquette, but even when pronounced perfect by her teacher, she was nevertheless certain that she would commit some breach of Court rules. To her surprise, nothing of the sort occurred. She was applauded by every one, from the Queen down, and when she left took with her a jewel set in rubies, diamonds and sapphires as a compliment to her nationality and herself.

Her favorite reminiscence concerns the great New England poet-humorist, Oliver Wendell Holmes. There was quite an attachment between the two, he admiring her musical genius, and she his intellectuality and achievements. Whenever she could she visited the doctor and played to him his favorite pieces or her own compositions. On one occasion he told her that at one time he had a yearning to be a violinist himself, and that he had devoted many hours to master the difficult instrument, but he added:

"While I had the requisite talent, my dear, I had overlooked the fact that all my fingers were thumbs, which, as you know, is very good for writing, but the worst possible thing for fiddling."

Among her treasures is a copy of Over the Teacups, which he gave her at the time. On the flyleaf is the simple inscription:

"To Miss Leonora Jackson.—With the kind regards and best wishes of her listening and admiring friend, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Boston, January 4, 1894."

Miss Jackson is quick at repartee. At a crowded reception given in the dressing-room of a well-known public hall where she was to play, in honor of her return from Europe, one of her admirers waxed eloquent, thus:

"You have done more for the Stars and Stripes abroad than our arms did in the war with Spain."

"I am very much obliged to you," was the quick response, "but I really did not know my execution was as deadly as all that."

A Story of Oom Paul's Postmaster

When Isaac Van Alphen, the Postmaster-General of the Transvaal and a warm friend of "Oom Paul," was in this country in attendance on the Postal Congress, he had an amusing experience which he still likes to refer to. Walking arm in arm with a friend near the Pennsylvania station in Baltimore one day, the distinguished foreigner was approached by a policeman, who announced that Van Alphen had been ordered to appear before the coroner to act as a juror.

"By what authority do you ask this?"

"By the authority of the State of Maryland."

"I acknowledge no such authority," said Van Alphen, the humor of the situation breaking upon him.

"You acknowledge no such authority?" repeated the policeman with amazement. "What do you mean?"

"Well," announced Mr. Van Alphen nonchalantly, "I am a resident of Pretoria in the South African Republic, and I don't acknowledge the authority of the State of Maryland in this instance."

"Pretoria, South African Republic!" echoed the policeman, puzzled for a moment, but finally he begged Mr. Van Alphen's pardon and walked away saying, audibly, "Well, you're about the whitest 'coon' I ever saw."

Three MEN on Four Wheels

By Jerome K. Jerome

Copyright, 1899, by Jerome K. Jerome. Copyright in Great Britain

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS: The three men—Harris, George and the author—are on a bicycle tour through Germany. A tandem and a safety are the mounts.

In the Toils of German Law

ALL three of us, by some means or another, managed between Nuremburg and the Black Forest to get into trouble. Harris led off at Stuttgart by insulting an official. Stuttgart is a charming town, clean and bright; a smaller Dresden. It has the additional attraction of containing little that one need go out of one's way to see: a medium-sized picture gallery, a small museum of antiquities, and half a palace, and you are through with the entire thing and can enjoy yourself. Harris did not know it was an official he was insulting. He took it for a fireman (it looked like a fireman), and he called it a "dummer Esel."

In Germany you are not permitted to call an official a "silly ass," but undoubtedly this particular man was one. What had happened was this: Harris in the Stadtgarten, anxious to get out, and seeing a gate open before him, had stepped over a wire into the street. Harris maintains he never saw it, but undoubtedly there was hanging to the wire a notice, "Durchgang Verboten!" The man, who was standing just outside the gate, stopped Harris and pointed out to him this notice. Harris thanked him and passed on. The man came after him and explained that treatment of the matter in such offhand way could not be allowed; what was necessary to put the business right was that Harris should step back over the wire into the garden. Harris pointed out to the man that the notice said "going through forbidden," and that, therefore, by reentering the garden that way he would be infringing the law a second time. The man saw this for himself, and suggested that to get over the difficulty Harris should go back into the garden by the proper entrance, which was around the corner, and come out again by the same gate. Then it was that Harris called the man a silly ass. That delayed us a day and cost Harris forty marks.

I followed suit at Carlsruhe by stealing a bicycle. I did not mean to steal the bicycle; I was merely trying to be useful. The train was on the point of starting when I noticed, as I thought, Harris' bicycle still in the goods van. No one was about to help me. I jumped into the van and hauled it out only just in time. Wheeling it down the platform in triumph, I came across Harris' bicycle standing against a wall behind some milk cans. The bicycle I had secured was not Harris', but some other man's.

It was an awkward situation. In England I should have gone to the station master and explained my mistake. But in Germany they are not content with your explaining a little matter of this sort to one man; they take you around and get you to explain it to about half a dozen, and if any one of the half-dozen happens not to be handy, or not to have time just then to listen to you, they have a habit of leaving you over for the night to finish your explanation the next morning. I thought I would just put the thing out of sight, and then, without making any fuss or show, take a short walk. I found a woodshed which seemed just the very place, and was wheeling the bicycle into it when, unfortunately, a red-hatted railway official, with the airs of a retired Field Marshal, caught sight of me and came up. He said:

"What are you doing with that bicycle?"

I said: "I am going to put it in this woodshed out of the way." I tried to convey by my tone that I was performing a kind and thoughtful action for which the railway officials ought to thank me; but he was unresponsive.

"Is it your bicycle?" he said.

"Well, not exactly," I replied.

"Whose is it?" he asked quite sharply.

"I can't tell you," I answered. "I don't know whose bicycle it is."

"Where did you get it from?" was his next question. There was a suspiciousness about his tone that was almost insulting.

"I got it," I answered with as much calm dignity as at the moment I could assume, "out of the train. The fact is," I continued frankly, "I have made a mistake."

He did not allow me time to finish. He merely said he thought so, too, and blew a whistle.

Recollection of the subsequent proceedings is not, so far as I am concerned, amusing. By a miracle of good luck—they say Providence watches over certain of us—the incident happened in Carlsruhe, where I possess a German friend, an official of some importance. Upon what would have been my fate had the station not been Carlsruhe, or had my friend been from home, I do not care to dwell; as it was, I got off, as the saying is, by the skin of my teeth. I should like to add that I left Carlsruhe without a stain upon my character, but that would not be the truth. My going scot free is regarded in police circles there to this day as a grave miscarriage of justice.

But all lesser sin sinks into insignificance beside the lawlessness of George. The bicycle incident had thrown us all into confusion, with the result that we lost George altogether. It transpired subsequently that he was waiting for us outside the police court; but this at the time we did not know. We thought maybe he had gone on to Baden by himself and, anxious to get away from Carlsruhe, and not perhaps thinking out things too clearly, we jumped into the next train that came up and proceeded thither. When George, tired of waiting, returned to the station he found us gone, and he found his luggage gone. Harris had his ticket, I was acting as banker to the party, so that he had in his pocket only some small change. Excusing himself upon these grounds, he thereupon commenced deliberately a career of crime that, reading it later as set forth baldly in the official summons, made the hair of Harris and myself almost to stand on end.

German traveling, it may be explained, is somewhat complicated. You buy a ticket at the station you start from for the place you want to go to. You might think this would enable you to get there, but it does not. When your train comes up you attempt to swarm into it, but the guard magnificently waves you away. Where are your credentials? You show him your ticket. He explains to you that by itself that is of no service whatever; you have only taken the first step toward traveling; you must go back to the booking office and get in addition what is called a "schnellzug" ticket. With this you return, thinking your troubles over. You are allowed to get in; so far so good. But you must not sit down anywhere, and you must not stand still, and you must not wander about. You must take another ticket, this time what is called a "platz" ticket, which entitles you to a place for a certain distance.

The man stopped Harris

What a man could do who persisted in taking nothing but the one ticket I have often wondered. Would he be entitled to run behind the train on the six-foot way? Or could he stick a label on himself and get into the goods van? Again, what would be done with the man who, having taken his schnellzug ticket, obstinately refused or had not the money to take a platz ticket; would they let him lie in the umbrella rack, or allow him to hang himself out of window?

To return to George, he had just sufficient money to take a third-class, slow-train ticket to Baden, and that was all. To avoid the inquisitiveness of the guard, he waited till the train was moving and then jumped in.

That was his first sin: (a) Entering a train in motion; (b) after being warned not to do so by an official.

Second sin: (a) Traveling in train of superior class to that for which ticket was held. (b) Refusing to pay difference when demanded by an official. (George says he did not "refuse"; he simply told the man he had not got it.)

Third sin: (a) Traveling in carriage of superior class to that for which ticket was held. (b) Refusing to pay difference when demanded by an official. (Again George disputes the accuracy of the report. He turned his pockets out, and offered the man all he had, which was about eightpence in German money. He offered to go into a third class, but there was no third class. He offered to go into the goods van, but they would not hear of it.)

Opening the window, he bombarded the spot

Fourth sin: (a) Occupying seat and not paying for same. (b) Loitering about corridor. (As they would not let him sit down without paying, and as he could not pay, it was difficult to see what else he could do.)

But explanations are held as no excuse in Germany; and his journey from Carlsruhe to Baden was one of the most expensive perhaps on record.

Reflecting upon the ease and frequency with which one gets into trouble here in Germany, one is led to the conclusion that this country would come as a boon and a blessing to the average young Englishman. To the medical student, to the eater of dinners at the Temple, to the subaltern on leave, life in London is a wearisome proceeding. The healthy Briton takes his pleasure lawlessly or it is no pleasure to him. Nothing that he may do affords him any genuine satisfaction. To be in trouble of some sort is his only idea of bliss. Now, England affords him small opportunity in this respect; to get himself into a scrape requires a good deal of persistence on the part of the young Englishman.

I spoke on this subject one day with our senior churchwarden. It was the morning of the tenth of November, and we were both of us glancing somewhat anxiously through the police reports. The usual batch of young men had been summoned for creating the usual disturbance the night before at the Criterion. My friend, the churchwarden, has boys of his own, and a nephew of mine, upon whom I am keeping a fatherly eye, is by a fond mother supposed to be in London for the sole purpose of studying engineering. No name we knew happened, by fortunate chance, to be in the list of those detained in custody, and, relieved, we fell to moralizing upon the folly and depravity of youth.

"It is very remarkable," said my friend, the churchwarden, "how the Criterion retains its position in this respect. It was just so when I was young; the evening always wound up with a row at the Criterion."

"So meaningless," I remarked.

"So monotonous," he replied. "You have no idea," he continued, a dreamy expression stealing over his furrowed face, "how unutterably tired one can become of the walk from Piccadilly Circus to the Vine Street Police Court. Yet, what else was there for us to do? Simply nothing. Sometimes we would put out a street lamp and a man would come around and light it again. If one insulted a policeman he simply took no notice. He did not even know he was being insulted; or if he did he seemed not to care. You could fight a Covent Garden porter if you fancied yourself at that sort of thing. Generally speaking, the porter got the best of it; and when he did it cost you five shillings, and when he did not the price was half a sovereign. I could never see much excitement in that particular sport. I tried driving a hansom cab once; that has always been regarded as the acme of modern Tom-and-Jerryism. I stole it late one night from outside a public-house in Dean Street, and the first thing that happened to me was that I was hailed in Golden Square by an old lady surrounded by three children.

two of them crying and the third one asleep. Before I could get away she had shot the children into the cab, taken my number, paid me, so she said, a shilling over the legal fare, and directed me to an address beyond what she called North Kensington. As a matter of fact, the place turned out to be the other side of Willesden. The horse was tired, and the journey took us well over two hours. It was the slowest lark I ever remember being concerned in. I tried once or twice to persuade the children to let me take them back to the old lady; but every time I opened the trap door to speak to them, the youngest one, the boy, started screaming, and when I offered other drivers to transfer the job to them, most of them replied in the words of a song popular about that period: 'Oh, George, Don't You Think You're Going Just a Bit Too Far?' One man offered to take home to my wife any last message I might be thinking of, while another promised to organize a party to come and dig me out in the spring.

"When I had mounted the dickey I had imagined myself driving a peppery old Colonel to some lonesome and cabless region, half a dozen miles from where he wanted to go, and there leaving him upon the curbstone to swear. About that there might have been good sport, or there might not, according to the circumstances, and the Colonel. The idea of a trip to an outlying suburb in charge of a nursery full of helpless infants had never occurred to me."

"No," concluded my friend, the churchwarden, with a sigh, "London affords but limited opportunity to the lover of the illegal."

Now, in Germany, on the other hand, trouble is to be had for the asking. There are many things in Germany that you must not do that are quite easy to do. To any young Englishman yearning to get himself into a scrape, and finding himself hampered in his own country, I should advise a single ticket to Germany; a return, lasting as it does only two months, might prove a waste.

In the Police Guide of the Fatherland he will find set forth a list of the things the doing of which will bring to him interest and excitement. In Germany you must not hang your bed out of window. He might begin with that. By waving his bed out of window he could get into trouble before he had had his breakfast. At home he might hang himself out of window and nobody would mind much, provided he did not obstruct anybody's ancient lights or break away and injure any passer underneath.

In Germany you must not wear fancy dress in the streets. A Highlander of my acquaintance, who came to pass the winter in Dresden, spent the first week of his residence there in arguing this question with the Saxon Government. They asked him what he was doing in those clothes. He was not an amiable man. He answered he was wearing them. They asked him why he was wearing them. He replied to keep himself warm. They told him frankly that they did not believe him, and sent him back to his lodgings in a closed landau. The personal testimony of the English Minister was necessary to assure the authorities that the Highland garb was the customary dress of many respectable, law-abiding British subjects. They accepted the statement, as diplomatically bound, but retain their private opinion to this day. The English tourist they have grown accustomed to. But a Leicestershire gentleman, invited to hunt with some German officers, on appearing outside his hotel was promptly marched off, horse and all, to explain his frivolity at the police court.

Another thing you must not do in the streets of German towns is to feed horses, mules or donkeys, whether your own or those belonging to other people. If a passion seizes you to feed somebody else's horse, you must make an appointment with the animal, and the meal must take place in some properly authorized place. You must not break glass or china in the street, nor, in fact, in any public resort whatever, and if you do you must pick up all the pieces. What you are to do with the pieces when you have gathered them together I cannot say. The only thing I know for certain is that you are not permitted to throw them anywhere, to leave them anywhere, or apparently to part with them in any way whatever. Presumably you are expected to carry them about with you until you die, and then be buried with them. Or, maybe, you are allowed to swallow them.

In German streets you must not shoot with a cross-bow. The German law-maker does not content himself with the misdeeds of the average man: the crimes one feels one wants to do, but must not; he worries himself imagining all the things a wandering maniac might do. In Germany there is no law against a man standing on his head in the middle of the road; the idea has not occurred to them. One of these days a German statesman, visiting a circus and seeing acrobats, will reflect upon this omission. Then he will straightway set to work and frame a clause forbidding people from standing on their heads in the middle of the road, and fixing a fine. This is the charm of German law: misdemeanor in Germany has its fixed price. You are not kept awake all night, as in England, wondering whether you will get off with a caution, be fined forty shillings or, catching the magistrate in an unhappy moment for yourself, get seven days. You know exactly what your fun is going to cost you. You can spread out your money on the table, open your Police Guide, and plan out your evening to a fifty-pfennig piece. For a really cheap evening I would recommend walking on the wrong side of the pavement after being cautioned not to do so. I calculate that by choosing your district and keeping to the quiet side-streets you could walk for a whole evening on the wrong side of the pavement at a cost of little over three marks.

In German towns you must not ramble about after dark "in droves." I am not quite sure how many constitute a "drove," and no official to whom I have spoken on this subject has felt himself competent to fix the exact number. I once put it to a German friend who was starting to the theatre with his wife, his mother-in-law, five children of his own, his sister and her fiancé, and two nieces, if he did not think he was running a risk. He did not take my suggestion as a joke. He cast an eye over the group.

"Oh, I don't think so," he said; "you see, we are all one family."

"The paragraph says nothing about its being a family drove or not," I replied. "It simply says 'drove.' I do not mean it in any uncomplimentary sense; but, speaking etymologically, I am inclined personally to regard your collection as a 'drove.' Whether the police will take the same view or not remains to be seen. I am merely warning you."

My friend was inclined to pooh-pooh my fears, but, his wife thinking it better not to run any risk of having the party broken up at the very beginning of the evening, they divided, arranging to meet again in the theatre lobby.

DRAWN BY HARRISON FISHER

"WHERE DID YOU GET IT FROM?"

Another passion you must restrain in Germany is that prompting you to throw things out of window. Cats are no excuse. During the first week of my residence in Germany I was awakened incessantly by cats. One night I got mad. I collected a small arsenal: two or three pieces of coal, a few hard pears, a couple of candle ends, an odd egg I found on the kitchen-table, an empty soda-water bottle and a few articles of that sort, and, opening the window, bombarded the spot from where the noise appeared to come. I do not suppose I hit anything; I never knew a man who did hit a cat, even when he could see it, except, maybe, by accident when aiming at something else. I have known crack shots, winners of Queen's prizes—that sort of men—shoot with shot-guns at cats fifty yards away and never hit a hair. I have often thought that instead of bull's-eyes, running deer and that rubbish, the really superior marksman would be he who could boast that he had shot the cat.

But, anyhow, they moved off; maybe the egg annoyed them. I had noticed when I picked it up that it did not look like a good egg, and I went back to bed again, thinking the incident closed. Ten minutes afterward there came a violent ringing. Putting on my dressing-gown, I went down to the gate. A policeman was standing there. He had all the things I had been throwing out of the window in a little heap in front of him, all except the egg; he had evidently been collecting them. He said:

"Are these things yours?"

I said: "They were mine, but personally I have done with them. Anybody can have them—you can have them."

He ignored my offer. He said:

"You threw these things out of window?"

"You are right," I admitted; "I did."

"Why did you throw them out of window?" he asked. A German policeman has his code of questions arranged for him; he never varies them, and he never omits one.

"I threw them out of the window at some cats," I answered.

"What cats?" he asked.

It was the sort of question a German policeman would ask. I replied with as much sarcasm as I could put into my accent that I was ashamed to say I could not tell him what cats. I explained that personally they were strangers to me; but I offered, if the police would call all the cats in his district together, to come around and see if I could recognize them by their yawl.

The German policeman does not understand a joke, which is, perhaps, on the whole, just as well, for I believe there is a heavy fine for joking with any German uniform; they call it "treating an official with contumely." He merely replied that it was not the duty of the police to help me recognize the cats; their duty was merely to fine me for throwing things out of window.

I asked what a man was supposed to do in Germany when wakened night after night by cats, and he explained that I could lodge an information against the owner of the cat, when the police would proceed to caution him, and, if necessary, order the cat to be destroyed; who was going to destroy the cat, and what the cat would be doing during the process, he did not explain.

I asked him how he proposed I should discover the owner of the cat. He thought for a while and then suggested that I might follow it home. I did not feel inclined to argue with him any more after that; I should only have said things that would have made the matter worse. As it was, that night's sport cost me twelve marks, and not a single one of the six German officials who interviewed me on the subject could see anything ridiculous in the proceedings from beginning to end.

But in Germany most human faults and follies sink into insignificance beside the enormity of walking on the grass. Nowhere, and under no circumstances, may you at any time in Germany walk upon the grass. Grass in Germany is quite a fetich. To put your foot on German grass would be as great a sacrilege as to dance a hornpipe on a Mohammedan's praying-mat. The very dogs respect the German grass; no German dog would dream of putting a paw upon it. If you see a dog scampering across the grass in Germany you may know for certain that it is the dog of some unholy foreigner. In England, when we want to keep dogs out of places we put up wire netting, six feet high, supported by buttresses, and defended on the top by spikes. In Germany they put a notice-board in the middle of the place: "Hunds verboten," and a dog that has German blood in its veins looks at that notice-board and walks away. In a German park I have seen a gardener step gingerly with felt boots on to a grass plot, and removing therefrom a beetle, place it gravely but firmly on the gravel, which done he stood sternly watching that beetle to see that it did not try to get back on to the grass; and the beetle, looking utterly ashamed of itself, walked hurriedly down the gutter and turned up the first path marked "Way out."

In German parks separate roads are devoted to the different orders of the community, and no one person, at peril of his liberty and fortune, may go upon another person's road. There are special paths for "wheel-riders," and special paths for "foot-goers," avenues for "horse-riders," roads for people in light vehicles, and roads for people in heavy vehicles; ways for children and for "alone ladies." That no particular route has yet been set aside for bald-headed men or "new women" has always struck me as an omission.

In the Grosse Garten, in Dresden, I once came across an old lady standing helpless and bewildered in the centre of seven tracks. Each was guarded by a threatening notice warning everybody off it but the person for whom it was intended.

"I am sorry to trouble you," said the old lady, on learning I could speak English and read German, "but would you mind telling me what I am and where I have to go?"

I inspected her carefully. I came to the conclusion that she was a "grown-up" and a "foot-goer," and pointed out her path. She looked at it and seemed disappointed.

"But I don't want to go down there," she said; "mayn't I go this way?"

"Great Heavens, no, madam!" I replied. "That path is reserved for children."

"But I wouldn't do them any harm," said the old lady with a smile. She did not look the sort of old lady who would have done them any harm.

"Madam," I replied, "if it rested with me I would trust you down that path, though my own first-born were at the other end; but I can only inform you of the laws of this country. For you, a full-grown woman, to venture down that path is to go to certain fine, if not imprisonment. There is your path marked plainly, 'Nur für Fussgänger,' and if you will follow my advice you will hasten down it; you are not allowed to stand here and hesitate."

"It doesn't lead a bit in the direction I want to go," said the old lady.

"It leads in the direction you ought to want to go," I replied, and we parted.

The British Darius and His War

MOST of us feel that in the end England will thrash the Boers because her resources are incomparably greater than theirs. Nevertheless, history records some remarkable cases in which victory was not to the strong. There is an extremely curious and suggestive parallel between the present situation and what was going on in the world exactly twenty-four hundred years ago. At that time Persia was the Great Britain of the world. She had made a royal province out of India. She had "civilized" Egypt with Persian government and she had undertaken the "White Man's Burden" with respect to Scythia and the wild countries north of European Greece. Besides, she governed all Asia Minor, which was then the centre of civilization.

About 500 B. C. a great man was in charge of the Persian Empire. His name was Darius. He was as ambitious and energetic as the young Emperor William, and he had as much ability as Bismarck. He was probably more able than any statesman in England to-day, abler even than Joseph Chamberlain.

At this time there were several little pocket governments in the Greek peninsula which annoyed Darius. One of them was Attica and another was Sparta. The whole of them would have been lost in one of Darius' colonies. He doubtless thought of them as England thought of the Boers twenty years ago; that is, he gave them no particular thought at all. But these little republics began to annoy him by blocking his policy of annexing the Greek states, which Darius regarded as their manifest and happy destiny.

Deciding to put an end to this kind of thing, he sent a large force of men and of ships to "benevolently assimilate" Greece. There was a hitch in the proceedings, however, at Marathon and all the Persians who could went back to Persia, but a great many needed the services of Greek undertakers. In a general way this episode might be called Darius' "Majuba Hill." It should have been a warning to him.

Then an outbreak in Egypt occupied his attention for a time.

The Kitchener whom he sent to straighten out the Soudan at this time was Achæmenes. There was likewise a disturbance in Babylon, but that was promptly settled, and then Darius began to arrange for completing the "liberation" of Greece. It seems odd to us, but he really thought he was conferring a blessing on the Greeks by undertaking the management of their affairs. He died in 485 B. C., before his preparations were finished, but his son Xerxes held the same liberal views as did his parent and as Mr. Joseph Chamberlain holds.

Xerxes, however, differed from Mr. Chamberlain in having a better idea of what he was "up against." Instead of sending a hundred thousand men to Greece, as did England to South Africa, he sent a million, and he sent besides twelve hundred ships of war. His troops and his ships were not armed with rapid-fire guns, but neither were the Greeks. Relatively the Persians were as well armed and equipped as the English are to-day, perhaps better, for Darius had been the head of the Persian War Office himself, and he knew more about such things than Lord Wolseley.

Everybody in Persia said, "We shall finish the job this time and then we shall own the whole world." No one thought of the Greeks winning. There were more fighting men in the Persian army than there were men, women and children in the two Greek states which bore the brunt of the Persian attack. Attica had less than a half million of inhabitants at this time and only about one in five were Athenians. The rest were slaves and "metics," which was the Greek name for "outlanders." The outlanders in Attica were worse off than those in the Transvaal. They had no civil rights at all, and could never get any except by special act of the legislature. Under Persian rule, of course, they would be liberated and put upon the same plane as the Athenians. Twenty thousand fighting men was an outside figure for the force which Athens could muster, and Sparta was in about the same position. These figures are curiously similar to the estimates of the Boer strength before the recent war began.

After preparing for nearly ten years Persia began her expedition. Xerxes, instead of being the Honorary Colonel of yeomanry regiments and staying at home like Albert Edward, went along with his army, wherein he probably was not so helpful to his country as the Prince of Wales has been.

With his million men he reached a place called Thermopylæ in the spring of 480 B. C. Here he won a sort of "Modder River" victory. There was a pass in the hills and behind a breastwork were three hundred Spartans and some allies. Think of it! Xerxes could kill three hundred soldiers every day for five years, including Sundays, and still have nearly half a million left.

Well, Xerxes got up on a hill to see his men cut up the first sample of Greeks who were foolish enough not to run away, and he waited there all day. In the end the "position was taken," but Xerxes' best troops lay in piles all around the wall. Still, he was confident of his resources.

The next event of importance was a sea fight. A thousand of Xerxes' ships fought with three hundred and sixty-six Greek ships at Salamis. Xerxes watched that battle, too, and saw two hundred of his vessels destroyed and the rest "fall back" as fast as possible. He went home then and left his Lord Roberts, whose name was Mardonius, with three hundred thousand men, all he had left, to finish the job. At Platæa, Mardonius met an allied Greek force one-third the size of his army, and was routed. Xerxes then gave up the benevolent assimilation of Greece and the liberation of the outlanders at Athens.

Whatever may have been the reasons for the failure of the Persians, it is a fact that their resources were greater as compared with the resources of the Greeks than are the resources of the English as compared with the Boers. They had just completed an empire as Great Britain has done, only it was a bigger and richer empire. It would seem to follow that resources are not everything in cases where small but determined states protest against the spread of civilization as conducted by statesmen of the school of Darius and Joseph Chamberlain.

Possibly it was 1900 the English meant when they said that they would eat their Christmas dinner in Pretoria.

The Patriot at the Polls

THE report of the legislative committee appointed to investigate the administration of the municipal affairs of the city of Greater New York mentions the evils it has found, laments their existence, and says that there is no legislative remedy for them—that the remedy is in the hands of the people who elect the administrative officials.

Taking up the report with this conclusion, that a government whose legislation is perfect may be rendered defective by maladministration, the student of political science will seek to determine the limiting point in our approach toward a perfect administration, the final limitation to good government. In the end he will find that the approach toward perfect government corresponds to the approach toward perfection in human nature.

Human nature is weak and to that extent is government defective. The voter will continue, for ages to come, to be influenced by personality. He will continue to vote for the demagogue who shakes his hand, sends him a turkey at Thanksgiving and attends the funerals of his relatives, in preference to the reformer who stands aloof and says, "Vote for me because I am honest." Then, too, the voter will continue to be a creature of habit, tending to vote as he voted last year and the year before. He will tend to vote in this way in spite of the fact that reform literature tells him he is being robbed by the officials he is helping to elect.

Then, too, human weakness will continue down through the ages to play pranks with the men elected to administer the affairs of government. A man may be elected with the best of intentions and still fall far short of giving a good administration. A man does not know himself till he is tried. A situation that seemed perfectly plain before election suddenly becomes complicated when the official faces it with power to act. Now he sees two sides to every question where before he had seen but one. Then, too, temptation comes in so subtle a manner that it does not seem temptation.

It is in no sense true that every man has his price, if we define price as money. But the statement will be much less questionable if we let price mean all sorts of influences, financial and other. One official will sell out for a certain number of banknotes. Another, who would resent with a blow the offer of a million dollars, will be bound hard and fast by a little kindness, such as an invitation to sail in a private yacht or the offer of a political job to a poor relative.

So our conclusions will in the end be that the limitations of good government correspond to the limitations of human nature. Where human nature is weak, government is weak. We may cry for more legislation; we may exhort our fellows to go to the polls—it is our duty to do so, for we can thus improve the government—but if we expect perfection to be attained we shall be disappointed. If ever attained it will be ages hence when humanity has evolved into perfection and the millennium is at hand. Meanwhile the weaknesses in government will continue to be just as great as those in human nature.

The Curse of Wings

ONE of the things which were beyond the understanding of the old Hebrew writer, a bird's way in the air, is still somewhat too complex, or possibly too subtly simple, for the explanatory capacity of modern science. Even the tireless inventive genius so long applied to the dream of making a practical flying machine has been expended in vain upon the problem which every day is solved by the hawk. But what if some master should filch the avian secret and so confer upon man the boon of flight? Would it be a blessing?

Let us not say "Yes" all at once. Better think the question down to bed-rock before we base future civilization upon the tricksy ways of wind and wings. Unquestionably the sensation of flying free and far is a delightful one; we have all experienced it in a dream, when rising airily we floated away at will. Aerial paths are supremely inviting; they seem to lead so far, and into almost unimaginable mysteries beyond horizons and horizons succeeding one another in blue remoteness and astral splendors. But let us take the poet's vision of flight as true beyond discussion, and then turn and soberly look into the pessimistic end of the subject; for wings have propelled dragons, as well as angels.

With the ability to fly as high, as far and as fast as the birds, men could commit crimes of every description without fear of detection or capture. What would a burglar have to trouble him if at nightfall he could rise and wing away a hundred miles to the safe he meant to crack, do his work, pocket his wad of bills, and then fly five hundred miles or more in another direction, keeping far aloft all the while, to alight where he pleased? I imagine the midnight murderer, with wings as swift as a wild pigeon's on his shoulders. He slays his victim in cold blood, and when the sun rises he is washing the awful stain from his hands in some lonely mountain stream three or four hundred miles away. Of course the detectives and police would also have wings, but of what avail when the culprit would leave no track?

And the armies of nations would soar aloft to swarm hither and yonder in the blue sky above the countries marked for destruction. Down from heaven they would swoop to ravage and plunder, to burn cities and to bear away the prizes of war. The anarchist with his poke of dynamite bombs would hover over the centres of law and government, letting fall his explosive arguments against the roofs of political temples, and then fan himself away among the stars, quite cheerful in absolute freedom from all danger, dread or restraint, a broad-pinioned arch-vulture, the tireless enemy of mankind, doing his will to a surfeit.

You may go on and fill out the dismal picture, and when it is finished hang it over against the poet's sketch of winged bliss. Look from one canvas to the other, and then pray fervently that not until men have become angels shall they be given the wings of a bird.

—MAURICE THOMPSON.

Love can find a way, but it would rather have an automobile.

Machine-Made Charity

NO SYMPATHY, no benevolence is practical or does much good unless it is real, personal and unaffected. Most of the good that is done to the poor, the outcast and the criminal is done by personal contact.

The real good which reaches and blesses the unfortunate comes from Christly and neighborly ministration. If one has not the power of putting himself in sympathy with such classes, he had, as a rule, better let them alone. Not every man, nor every society of men, that essays to provide for the poor, to instruct the ignorant, and to help the helpless understands the business. The tonic power of heartfelt sympathy, like many a balsam of the mountain and many an herb of the valley, is unknown in the market-places of philanthropy. The Samaritan attends to the wounds of his patient before he leaves him at the inn; but most charitable organizations think that they have discharged their full duty in footing the bills, and forget that there are certain rare spiritual tonics that refresh and strengthen the heartsick.

The age is machine-loving. Everything is done by rule and contrivance. There are all sorts of cunning machines for the simplest processes. So in the department of ethics, there are religious and social machines without number. "Has any man, or any society of men," says Carlyle, "a piece of spiritual work to do, they can in nowise proceed at once, and with the mere natural organs, but must first call a public meeting, appoint committees, issue prospectuses, eat a public dinner; in a word, construct or borrow machinery wherewith to do it." The rugged old Scotchman rightly intimates that such methods are unnatural. And for us, the question is serious and pertinent, whether in our love for the mechanical we are not losing sight of the personal element.

The Master entered into natural and personal relations with every human being that made a claim on His sympathy. His heart overflowed with the "enthusiasm of humanity." Only as something of that enthusiasm takes possession of us, and a new force is generated in our lives, can we make a lasting impression on the problem.

Americans in Paris

THE Princes, Archdukes and Royalties who come up to Paris for the Exposition will be the guests of the city—of Philadelphia.

The way this came about is not uninteresting. France, in these republican days, has no State palaces for the accommodation of guests. The Louvre is tenanted only by pictures, statues and ghosts. In the old Luxembourg the old Senators drowse, and President Loubet and his official family more than fill the Élysée. And so it is necessary to rent a private mansion for the princely visitors of 1900. It was not easy to find just what was wanted—a palace completely isolated and in a good situation, well arranged, large, and capable of being made sumptuous. At last the Government decided upon the house that formerly belonged to Dr. Thomas Evans, the American dentist who died about three years ago. Doctor Evans hammered a huge fortune out of the teeth of the rich Parisians and of the Royalties of Europe. He left his money to various institutions. One of his heirs was the City of Philadelphia, and it will collect the rental for the "Hotel des Princes." It would please the good dentist, I am sure, could he know to what good uses his mansion will be put. He was a bit of a Royalist himself, as befits one who pulled the august teeth of Kings. He it was who arranged for the Empress Eugénie's escape from Paris when the Second Empire went down under its load of imperial crime and folly. Old and rich, the dentist built this palace in the Avenue du Bois de Boulogne, lived there a number of years, and died.

CROWN-FILLINGS AND CROWNED HEADS

THE "Hotel Evans," as it is called, does not, of course, rival the palace which Anna Gould, the Countess of Castellane, has erected near by, and the other marble extravagances of the day; still, it would hold its own even in Fifth Avenue. It stands in the centre of a wooded garden—almost a park. The vestibule is very handsome, with its arcades and columns. The salons and halls are large, and there are numerous chambers. The woodwork, the carvings and decorations are all in good taste, luxurious, but simple. The furniture will be supplied by the State. In the garden there are two pavilions. In one of these the house-officers and outdoor servants will be lodged; the other will be the headquarters of the guard-of-honor.

If Mayor Ashbridge, of Philadelphia, comes to Paris this year I am quite sure the guard will turn out—in his honor and that of the once famous dentist.

Doctor Evans, by the way, was a very fine example of the sort of an American who makes his way in the world. He came to Europe when the dentist was still under suspicion of being a charlatan, before the craft was disassociated from the traveling band-wagon, the juggler and the barber. He not only revolutionized the business—and opened the way for the thousands of American dentists that have since come to Europe—but he forced the rather amazed Kings and courtiers to take him at his own value. He went to their palaces to fill their teeth, and they, in return, came to his palace to eat his dinners. When they lost their crown-fillings they sent for him. When they lost their crowns—and were afraid of losing their heads—they sent for him again. And in each case he was the man for the emergency.

"I am a good American," he told Alphonse Daudet once, "a democrat on principle, but I have a little of the monarchic temperament."

He would have enjoyed the notion of Philadelphia housing Princes in his mansion—but what a fin de siècle comedy it is!

AN ARGUMENT FOR VEGETARIAN DIET

THE new year has unleashed a pack of fiscal reports, statistics and all that. For example:

Last year American women bought hats and artificial flowers in Paris to the amount of $7,200,000. That is a very pretty figure. The English women bought only $4,000,000 worth, and Germany scarce $600,000 worth. The same official report discloses the melancholy fact that most of the false hair sold in France is for the American market.

Here is another report—a sort of whirligig that brings in its revenges: Last year 14,840 horses, 257 asses and forty mules were eaten in Paris. The Americans here go about looking at each other furtively, a dreadful suspicion in every heart; for there have been many breakfasts and dinners—and queer dishes—and then, one never knows. Of course it is not so much the horses; one may be a hippophagist on principle; but those other beasts——

HOW IT FEELS TO BE A PERIWINKLE

AN INGENIOUS American, I believe, discovered the subtle pleasure there is in "shooting the chutes." A modification, or rather a development of his idea, is one of the attractions of the "midway" of the Exposition. It was Laurence Sterne (was it not?) who remarked that they do some things better in France. Now the Palace of the Sea is to the antique chute what the latest hippomobile is to the ox-carts of the Philistines. In the first place, you are inclosed in a diving-bell—a frail glass bulb fastened to a steel cable—and you descend not only through tumbling foam, but down a long chute of green water, where all sorts of queer sea things flutter at you. And, that the eurythm of Nature may not be disturbed, along the walls of the chute M. Marcel Moisson has painted grewsome submarine plants, and swimming monsters with eyes that look like—and perhaps are—electric lights. It is very thrilling, and you can't quite make up your mind whether the journey is too short or too long. While you are debating the question you are shot out into a sunlit lake—extracted from the glass bulb like a periwinkle from its shell—deposited at a café table and asked what you wish to order.

A SUGGESTION FROM THE JAVANESE CENSUS

IT WAS the same afternoon that the Baron Van Asbek asked me to visit the exhibit of the Dutch Indies. I shall not tell you about the Tjandi Sari, that most famous and most ancient temple of Java, which has been put up here by the Seine—still it is a marvelous piece of architecture, covered with sculpture that recalls the laughing beauties of the Renaissance. And marvelous, too, are the frescoes on the wall of the terrace, which tell the life of Buddha from birth to death. Nine centuries old, these paintings! When they were made we of the Western world were still barbarians. But I am not going to talk art or antiquity; have no fear. I bring you (from Sumatra) a new idea, which should reform our cities one and all. Around the temple has been built a native village modeled on those of the plateau of Padang. The houses are gay and barbarous, and very picturesque. The main point is that no two are alike. They are symbols, these houses, speaking a language plainer than Javanese. Here is one which announces, by its high mansarde, that it belongs to the oldest son of a noble family; the square door of another is the sign that a merchant lives there; the little house with a balcony and flowers is the home of a dancing-girl or player. Delightfully simple, is it not?

A MODEST BREAKFAST—CHEAP, BUT CLEAN

MR. JULIAN RALPH, in the account he has written of his adventures, journalistic and quotidian, in France, omitted one little incident that did much to condemn him to public admiration. Mr. Ralph does not like Paris very much, for although every one talks French here, no one talks it quite as he does, and that is annoying. He was strolling along the Boulevard in rather a lonely mood when two of the newspaper correspondents came up; by a sort of premeditated hazard they came at the luncheon hour. Mr. Ralph greeted them like brothers. "You don't know how much good it does me to get a chance to talk English," he said. "Why, do you know what I did to-day?" They didn't know. "I got shaved three times this morning at the barber-shop in the Grand Hotel—because the barber could say, 'Yizzir; thankee, zir.'"

They were strolling down the Boulevard des Italiens.

"Come and have a chop with me," said Mr. Ralph in his usual cheery way. "I noticed a little restaurant near here—quiet, modest, cheap-looking little place—but by the looks of it I am pretty sure we can get things clean, anyway. And of course we don't want much."

Mr. Ralph led the way into the "cheap little place, but clean." His friends raised their eyebrows, but they were too polite to say anything. They had their chops, with preface of oysters, fish and other good things, and a codicil of salad, cheese and fruit.

"Now, I suppose thousands of people walk past this place every day," said Mr. Ralph, "and never dream of coming in; they'd rather go to some gaudy restaurant and waste money on mere style. I like things plain and simple and homelike. Garsong, the bill, si vous plait!"

When the bill came it was Mr. Ralph who raised his eyebrows; it was—but never mind; Mr. Ralph's clean little place was the Café Anglais, the most expensive restaurant in Paris. I dare say that now, while he is eating camp fodder in the Transvaal, he'd like to face that luncheon again—bill and all.

ONE SPARKLE FROM THE COMET'S TAIL

SENATOR DEPEW left a trail of anecdotes behind him when last he went away from Paris. I have not heard many of them because I do not go to houses where people repeat Senator Depew's anecdotes. However, the following remark is passed about as authentic; indeed, you may see for yourself that the Senator's name, trade-mark and address are blown into the bottle. He said: "The Parisians are full of pretense. They are always trying to pull the wool over your eyes. Why, I know a man here who spends hundreds of thousands a year trying to make people believe he has a fortune."

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

The articles containing the reasons for the successes and failures of young men, written by eminent men and containing much valuable information and direction, have elements in common which cause a tone of sameness—they are written from the same point of view—that is, by men who have succeeded; also, the writers, almost without exception, have risen from the ranks or below.

Aside from the difference in individuality—which, after all, is the man—from the time of his birth to the day when the world discovers him, and by virtue of that discovery makes of him what it calls the successful man, every person is affected more or less, according to the strength of his individuality, by his environment, which is not always of his own choosing.

In all the causes of failure which have been enumerated, there is one, the influence of one's surroundings and responsibilities, which has not appeared. Speaking from personal observation, three-fourths of all the failures of those whose inclination is toward the right instead of toward the wrong is attributable directly to this cause.

One who is born of lowly parents, whose family demands nothing from him, who has no place to sustain from the time he first begins to apprehend his surroundings, with all his disadvantages has at least the privilege of creating his own responsibilities. The other has his responsibilities largely made for him and thrust upon him much as is his name—without his consent or the right of choice.

The man who is honorable and upright under all circumstances—has the will power, in spite of temptations, to refrain from gambling, dissipation, loose and irregular habits, time-serving and idleness, to say nothing of actual dishonesty—should receive the full measure of credit which is his due. On the other hand, however, many a man who finally failed has withstood more temptation before failure came than many another has met with throughout a long and successful career.

The world demands from those who are in it that they sustain the position to which they have been born and bred. Not to sustain it means dropping out of one's environment. When this occurs the individual may continue to exist; he ceases to live. If he has sufficient courage he may give up his environment and try by years of effort to win it back. This requires a greater degree of moral heroism than most possess, and the average man will go down trying to sustain his position rather than face this situation. To try to sustain himself, even against almost impossible odds, is his plan and desire; the alternative means years of hardship, if not actual want and suffering, to those dependent upon him; and who can say how many have wrested success from seeming certain failure under these circumstances. It is the failures one hears of, not the patient, daily plodder who is the kind and loving husband and father, the grandest success that thousands of years of civilization have produced, the class who are the backbone and sinew of every civilized country to-day, and still the one whom we never hear spoken of in the same breath with success.

ANDREW COLVIN.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Being a young man, and having failed as often as one person could between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five years, I consider myself to be something of an authority on the subject, and one whose experience should not be lightly disregarded.

In the first place, what is failure? To a laborer it might seem that his son was successful if he became an accountant, though he were a poor one; while a merchant prince would think his son had failed when he proved himself unable to conduct business affairs successfully, though he might be an expert accountant. No doubt the reason that the authors of the very excellent papers which have appeared in the POST have dwelt principally upon failure to reach and keep positions of great importance is because they occupy such places. However, he who earns a good living, keeps a good conscience and enjoys good health has not failed, be his station in life what it may; and if we consider this to be success, we have established an ideal which is not only attainable by most people, but which will inspire greater effort as well. Certainly no one could expect the mass of the people to engage in a strenuous competition to attain greatness. There is room for comparatively few great men, and even if it were possible to cause every individual to make it a life aim to become one of them, such effort would in most cases be useless, not to say foolish.

The ideal for young men ought not to be that he who does not do the best of any fails, but that he who does not do the best he can. In justice to the young men of to-day be it said that the latter is more often taken as a guiding principle than the former.

CHESTER L. CHAMBERS.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

In Mr. Woollen's communication anent the Why Young Men Fail articles he says: "Young men are not devoted to their work because they are not in love with it."

This is very obvious, of course. A person cannot relish a noxious dish. Some at our ten-cent "museums" swallow soap and masticate bits of glass, dance upon pointed nails, etc., but they are well paid for their feats, which serve to draw the glittering shekels into the coffers of their employers.

Now it is worth reflection that an employer rewards his subordinates in cold, hard cash and is entitled to his "money's worth," as the vulgar phrase has it. When he believes he is not getting an amount of work to balance his pecuniary outlay, away goes the servant.

It is scarcely the employer's business to lead the young man to devotion to his duties: the day of sympathetic employers is long past. Yet again the young man craves a decent compensation for his work. If he thinks he is underpaid he strikes for a "raise." The employer's demands often seem inordinate to him, and it frequently happens that they are. Of course, this may have very little to do with the question at issue, the reason for so many failures and so few successes.

The GRIP of HONOR

By Cyrus Townsend Brady

AUTHOR OF FOR LOVE OF COUNTRY, FOR THE FREEDOM OF THE SEA, ETC.

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS: Captain Paul Jones, of the U. S. S. Ranger, while cruising off the English coast, overtook the British trading vessel Maidstone, which foundered in her attempt to escape him. Elizabeth Howard, a young Englishwoman, the ward of Admiral Westbrooke, and her maid, the only survivors of the wreck, were rescued by Lieutenant Barry O'Neill, of the Ranger.

Fourth Chapter

THREE days later the Ranger, under all plain sail, was slowly ploughing along off the English coast near the mouth of the Mersey. The whaleboat, manned by six of the smartest seamen, armed with cutlass and pistol, and dressed in their best clothes, old Price being coxswain again, was just being made ready. The ship was presently hove to, and a side ladder was dropped overboard at the gangway, where Miss Elizabeth Howard and her maid were standing waiting for the lowering of the whaleboat. Around it the officers of the deck speedily congregated.

They were a sorrowful lot of men, these impressionable sailors, for O'Neill was not alone in his captivity. True to his promise, Captain Jones had shifted his course and was about to land his fair passenger. He had chosen to put her ashore upon a rocky beach four or five miles from a fort at Birkenhead which guarded the mouth of the river. It was a risky performance at best, but he trusted to the known speed of the Ranger and his own seamanship to effect his escape in case the ship should be discovered and pursued in force.

Once on shore it would not be a difficult matter for the lady and her maid to procure a conveyance to take them to the city a little farther inland. The melancholy duty of landing the two women had been allotted by special request to the First Lieutenant, much to the disgust of the various midshipmen, who conceived that the matter of taking charge of boats appertained more properly to one of their number.

The ship had been hove to, the accommodation ladder shipped, the whaleboat was lying at the gangway, and the three passengers at once took their places in the stern.

"See Miss Howard safely landed, Mr. O'Neill," called the solicitous Captain over the rail, "and assure yourself as far as possible of her ability to reach the town without harm, and then return at once. In any event, do not leave the beach. We will watch you, sir."

"Aye, aye, sir," answered O'Neill. "Shove off; out oars; give way!" and the little boat at once shot away from the side and, under the impetus given by the skillful men, darted toward the not distant shore.

Miss Howard should have been radiantly happy at leaving the Ranger, and in her proximity to Liverpool, where she was about to meet not only her friends, but one who was destined to be something more—Major Edward Coventry, a gallant and distinguished young officer, the son and heir of her guardian, Lord Westbrooke, to whom for many years—from infancy, in fact—she had been betrothed. But an unaccountable tinge of sadness hovered over her lovely face, though she strove to conceal it under an affectation of lightness and gayety.

As for O'Neill, he made no effort whatever to hide his misery. The impressionable young Irishman had fallen deeply in love with Elizabeth Howard. He had fallen in love a thousand times before, but not in this way, and the heart which had withstood the successful assaults of the beauties of the Court of France had succumbed at the first sight of this beautiful English girl. In that hour in the boat when he lay with his head upon her knee, when he had looked up at her, Heaven had opened before his gaze, and to his disordered fancy she had seemed an angel.

With the daring of his race he had not hesitated to tell the girl of his passion, though it was stale news to her, for there is nothing a woman discovers more quickly and more certainly than the feelings of a man who loves her. That she had laughed at his ardor had not in the least deterred him from persisting in his attentions, which she had not found unwelcome.

It was not a long row to the land, and as they approached the rugged coast the young Lieutenant eagerly scanned the shore for a landing-place. Steering around a little promontory which hid them from the Ranger, he discovered a stretch of sandy beach under its lee, and the boat was sent in its direction until her keel grated on the soft sand. It was a lonely spot, a little stretch of sand ending inland and, on one side, in precipitous rocks over which a wandering pathway straggled to the heights above. The other end of the beach gave entrance, through a little pass in the rocks, to a country road which wandered about inland, losing itself among the trees a mile or so away. On the rocky promontory back of and at one end of the beach there was a small lighthouse, and several miles from the beach in the other direction, at the end of the road, probably, was a castle or fort. The flag floating lazily from the staff indicated that it was garrisoned.

Springing lightly from the boat, O'Neill stepped recklessly into the water alongside. Miss Howard arose to her feet and looked anxiously about her.

"Allow me," said O'Neill, and then, without waiting for permission, he lifted her gently in his arms and carried her to the shore. "Would that all the earth were water, and that I might carry you forever," he whispered as he put her down.

"You would not like Heaven, then?" she replied, jesting.

"I find my present experience of it delightful, madam; but why do you ask that?" he questioned anxiously.

"Because there, we are told, will be 'no more sea'!" she answered.

Price now stepped up to him for his orders, necessarily interrupting the conversation.

"Price," he said to that intrepid old sailor, "you may go back to the boat and shove off, and keep her under the lee of that little point until I call you. Keep a sharp lookout, too."

"Aye, aye, sir," said the old seaman, turning to fulfill the command.

"Now I suppose the time has come for me to say good-by to Lieutenant O'Neill," resumed Elizabeth.

"Oh, not yet, Miss Howard; I cannot leave you here alone until I know that you are safe."

"As you will, sir," she replied; "but as I happen to see several horsemen coming down the road yonder, I imagine you will not be detained from your ship a very long time. Let us go forward to meet them; perhaps they can give us some assistance."

The horsemen, evidently an officer and two orderlies, who were galloping toward the beach, at this moment noticed the boat party, and probably the Ranger itself. They reined in their horses at once, and the officer apparently gave some directions to one of the others, for he saluted, turned his horse about in the road and galloped rapidly back in the direction of the castle. The officer then trotted hastily forward, followed by the remaining man. Reaching the vicinity of the little group, he dismounted, and handing the bridle to the soldier, he came forward fearlessly, with one hand on his sword, the other holding a pistol. He was a young and handsome man in a new and brilliant scarlet uniform.

"Would that all the earth were water, and that I might carry you forever," he whispered

"LADY ELIZABETH! you here!" he exclaimed, stopping short in great surprise when he was near enough to recognize them. "What is the meaning of this?" He stood a moment and then came nearer. "Who is this person?" he demanded. Elizabeth started violently.

"Major Coventry!" she cried.

"Are you a 'Lady,' madam?" asked O'Neill in equal surprise, addressing the astonished girl.

"For what else do you take her, sir?" interrupted the officer, bristling with indignation

"Faith, sir, I would take her 'for better or worse,' an' I could," replied the Irishman, smiling.

"Unfortunately for you, that is a privilege I propose to exercise myself," returned the Englishman sternly.

"The world will doubtless share my regret, sir," said the Irishman audaciously, a great pang in his heart at this unlooked-for news.

"Now I wish to know who you are and how you come here and what you are doing —an explanation, sir," asked the officer.

"I am not accustomed to give explanations save to those who have the right to demand them," replied O'Neill.

"I almost wish I could," she replied sharply, gathering courage; "you remind me of it too constantly for it to be pleasant, and at no time so inopportunely as at the present."

The Englishman, in great astonishment and perturbation, opened his mouth to speak, but he was interrupted by the quicker Irishman.

"Why so, Mistress Howard?"

"Lady Elizabeth, if you please, sir," corrected Coventry.

"Lady Elizabeth, then; I thank you, sir, for the reminder," answered O'Neill suavely. "Your friends on the Ranger are all interested in your welfare, and I am sure they are

"Stop!" cried O'Neill, stepping forward with his hand upon his sword. "You shall neither swear before a lady, nor shall you in this scandalous manner disparage the ship of which I have the honor to be the First Lieutenant, nor asperse the character of her Captain. Withdraw your words or you shall answer to me with that which hangs by your side."

"And if I refuse?"

"I will strike them down your throat with my hand."

"S'death, sir! How dare you, a beggarly adventurer, talk thus to me—an officer, a Major in the army of His Gracious Majesty —a Coventry, a Westbrooke!"

"If you were an angel from Heaven it would make no difference to me, for I would have you know, sir, that I am of as good a house as—aye, a better than—your own, a descendant of Kings——"

"An Irishman, I infer?" said Coventry, sneering.

"You are correct, sir, and my people have been chieftains for thirty generations."

"Ah, in Ireland?"

TWO SWORDS FLASHED IN THE AIR SIMULTANEOUSLY, AND RANG AGAINST EACH OTHER WITH DEADLY PURPOSE A MOMENT AFTER

"I have two rights, sir," said the officer.

"They are?"

"First, I am betrothed to this young lady," said the soldier. "Second, this," laying his hand upon his sword.

"This gentleman," answered the girl faintly, turning to O'Neill and pointing to the British officer, "is Major Edward Coventry, the son of my guardian."

"And your betrothed, Elizabeth; you forget that," added Coventry.

glad in my person to meet with and congratulate the fortunate gentleman who aspires to your hand."

"Will you tell me or not, Lady Elizabeth, who this person is, and how you came here?" said Coventry impatiently.

"This is a Lieutenant of the American Continental ship Ranger, Captain John Paul Jones——"

"The —— murdering pirate!" exclaimed Coventry hotly.

"We have you, or rather he has," responded the Irishman.

"Withdraw, I beg of you, Elizabeth. This matter must be settled," said Coventry.

"I will not, I tell you," persisted the girl resolutely. "If you fight you will fight through me."

"We are doing that now," said O'Neill savagely. "Will you withdraw, madam?"

"I repeat it, I will not; and I wish to remind you that I do not like your tone.

"If you were an angel from Heaven it would make no difference to me, for I would have you know, sir, that I am of as good a house as—aye, a better than—your own, a descendant of Kings——"

"An Irishman, I infer?" said Coventry, sneering.

"You are correct, sir, and my people have been chieftains for thirty generations."

"Ah, in Ireland?"

The manner of the question made it another insult, but O'Neill restrained himself under the provocation and said:

"Where else, sir, and where better? As for me, I am temporarily an officer of yonder ship, the Ranger, flying the flag of the American Republic; but I am a Lieutenant in the Navy of His Maiesty, Louis XVI. My father is a Marshal of France. Will you draw now?" he cried, stepping forward impetuously.

"A brilliant array of title, surely; pity it lacks other confirmation than your word. I scarcely comprehend the catalogue," replied Coventry coldly.

"I shall endeavor to enlighten you as to my credibility with this," said O'Neill, drawing his sword. "Now will you fight or not?"

"And if I persist in my refusal?" asked Coventry, who was playing for time.

"In that juncture I shall be under the painful necessity of killing you in the presence of your betrothed; so draw, my dear sir, if not for honor, for life!"

"Stop!" cried Elizabeth, springing between their swords; "he saved my life at the risk of his own and treated me with the most distinguished courtesy."

"I wish that he had exhibited some of it here," interrupted Coventry.

"I have but followed your own example," retorted O'Neill.

"Will you hear me, Edward? They are not pirates——"

"I call them so," said Coventry stubbornly.

"Enough, Lady Elizabeth," said O'Neill, taking his share in the conversation again; "two lovers are sometimes an embarrassment of riches. This seems to be one of the times. If you will stand aside I trust that a few moments will rid you of one or the other of them."

"I will not go," said the girl defiantly; "you shall not fight; you have nothing to quarrel about."

Concerning
New York City

On January 1, 1900, the population of New York was 3,595,936—second only to London—and the assessed valuation of its real property amounted to $3,479,352,029, or in round numbers, upwards of three and a half billions of dollars—more than any other spot of the same area in the world.

This immense population is increasing at the average rate of 100,000 per annum—all of whom must be accommodated with dwellings, either within the city limits or within less than an hour's transportation from the business centres—and many of whom must be accommodated with offices or stores in which to transact their business as well.

Investments in New York Realty, particularly some of those portions which are yet unimproved, are absolutely safe, because they represent a tangible security which is not influenced in any way by commercial fluctuations. All titles are guaranteed by Trust Companies as solid as the Bank of England financially.

For these and other reasons, it must be clear to any thinking person that an investment in New York Real Estate is safer and more likely to yield a larger profit than any other proposition before the public to-day—safer by far than any stock, which may become worthless from the effect of one day's panic upon the stock exchange—safer than mining property, which takes years to develop and in the majority of cases never realizes the value of surface indications—safer than "Miller" or other "Syndicates," which offer big premiums for a few weeks and end in bankruptcy for all concerned.

I control parcels of property within the city limits—30 minutes from Herald Square, the centre of New York—which will increase in value with every step in metropolitan development. Parties who have unemployed capital may secure—for sums ranging from $200.00 upwards—desirable parcels, the titles of which are guaranteed by the Title Guarantee & Trust Company of New York. This opportunity is one that does not often occur, and is being considered by conservative investors.

To those interested in the subject of such investment, I will gladly send maps, illustrations, statistics and descriptive matter, which may be easily verified, either through their own legal adviser or banker, in any portion of the country, or by personal examination of the property itself. You are not on the deck of your ship now, sir."

"Oh, am I not? Boat ahoy, there! Price!" cried O'Neill, waving his hand. A few strokes brought the whaleboat to the shore again. The crew were eager to take a hand in the fray. "Coxswain, come here," ordered the officer.

"Aye, aye, sir," replied the sailor, and while the other two stood wondering, the veteran seaman rolled up to them and saluted his Lieutenant with a sea scrape. "Want us to take a hand in this yere little scrimmage, yer honor?"

"No. Take this lady and her maid to that clump of rocks yonder."

"You monster!" cried Elizabeth, stamping her foot on the sand; "you are a pirate, after all."

"As you say, madam. Stop, sir!" said O'Neill to Coventry, who made a move to approach the sailor; "my man will do no harm to Her Ladyship, and you have other matters to attend to, unless you wish to shelter yourself behind a woman's petticoats."

Coventry had been playing for more time, but this was more than he could stand. "I think you have said enough, sir, and if you are ready," he said, "we will talk in another fashion."

"At your service," returned the Irishman composedly. Two swords flashed in the air simultaneously, and rang against each other with deadly purpose a moment after. Both men were masters of the weapon.

Finally, after one especially vicious thrust by Coventry, whose foot slipped a little, a clever parry, followed by a dashing riposte en quarte, which was met and returned with less skill than usual, O'Neill, with a graceful turn of the wrist, whirled the Englishman's sword from his hand. It flew up into the air and fell clanging on the rocks some distance away.

"Strike, sir!" cried Coventry, with one quick glance toward Lady Elizabeth, who stood perfectly motionless, looking on in terror. She would have run forward had it not been for old Price.

"Sir Englishman, pick up your sword," said O'Neill, lowering his point.

"Sir Irishman," answered the other, bowing, "men may call you pirates——"

"Not with impunity, sir."

"That I grant you. I was about to add, that whatever they call you, you fight like a gentleman. Will you permit me, though I do not know your name, to call you friend?"

"I shall esteem myself honored, sir. My name is O'Neill—Barry O'Neill, First Lieutenant of the United States ship Ranger."

"I shall remember it. You have not only saved the life of Lady Elizabeth Howard, but now you have given me my own. Now, sir, if you would be advised by me, withdraw while you may do so."

At this moment a number of red-coated soldiers clambered down the path in the rocks

Sixth Chapter

AT THIS moment a number of red-coated soldiers clambered down the path in the rocks, while a squad of cavalry came galloping upon the beach by the road at the other end and, at once dismounting, advanced up the strand. The seamen in the boat, in obedience to a wave of O'Neill's hand, swept her into the shore, jumped out and moved toward him, drawing their cutlasses and handling their pistols threateningly. Though they were greatly outnumbered they would not give up without a struggle. Now it was Coventry's opportunity.

"I shall not be able to indulge your desire for the loss of your life," he said, stepping back and picking up his sword, "but I fear that duty compels me to deprive you of your liberty. You are, by your own statements, a rebel against His Majesty. It is my duty as Commander of this post and a loyal servant of the King to apprehend you."

"I am twice captured, then, it seems," said the Lieutenant, looking at Elizabeth, who had come forward as soon as old Price, who had left her, had sprung to his officer's side. As the girl drew near to him and Major Coventry turned away his head a second, to give an order, the Irishman said to her:

"Why did you not call out to save your lover a moment since?"

"It was not necessary," she answered, looking at him with tearful eyes. "I knew what you would do."

"Thank you," he whispered gratefully; "this word, and you, I shall remember."

"And I shall never forget——"

"Come, sir," said Coventry dryly, turning at this moment, having finished his dispositions, "I think you overstep the privileges of a parole, and if you will have your men lay down their arms we will go up to the castle. I have sent for a carriage for you, Elizabeth, and it will be here shortly."

"Do you know," said O'Neill, "that I have a mind to say to you that I might as well die right here as at any place else, and I do not think I shall go to that castle after all? There are seven of us here——"

"Close in there!" sharply shouted Coventry to his soldiers. "Make ready!"

"Handle your pistols, men!" cried the other, whipping out his own, but again Elizabeth interfered in the fray. She ran between the American seamen and the English soldiers with outstretched hands.

"Stop!" she cried, "there must be no further fighting here. This gentleman came here to set me free. My life is his——"

"I give it back to you," cried O'Neill.

"And yours, Major Coventry, was his also," she added reproachfully. "This must go no further——"

"And it shall not, madam," cried a deep, clear voice.

And one of the cutters of the Ranger, filled to the gunwales with heavily armed men, and with a swivel in the bow and a man standing over it with a lighted match in his hand, came sweeping around the headland and dashed in toward the shore. It was under the command of Jones himself.

"I am sorry to interrupt a tête-à-tête, gentlemen," he cried.

"You are beaten again, Major Coventry; the odds are in our favor now," said O'Neill calmly. "Throw down your arms instantly, you dogs!" he shouted to the English soldiers. "Back! Out of the way, Miss Howard."

He sprang to her side and lifted her out of the line of fire.

The jealous Coventry noticed two things—he did not release her, nor did she struggle to get away.

"Stand by!" shouted Jones to the marines in his boat and to the gunners forward.

"Stop! for Heaven's sake, stop, Captain Jones!" cried Elizabeth. "Withhold your fire. They will retire. There must be no bloodshed. You promised to set me free and in safety ashore, and leave me there. Go, I entreat you!"

"Steady, lads, steady!" cried Jones, stepping out of the boat. "And you, sir," to the English officer, "will you withdraw quietly—taking your lady with you, of course—if we engage to do the same? You are outnumbered, and we can cut you to pieces. Take the word of an older fighter; your honor will be safe, sir."

"You are right, sir; 'tis best, I suppose," assented Coventry, resigning himself the more gracefully to the inevitable as he could then receive his love again. "Come, Lady Elizabeth."

"Now, why didn't you protest when I was captured?" said O'Neill, releasing her waist but still holding her hand.

"Could it be because I wanted you to be with me?" she whispered.

"God bless you for that, and good-by," he said, bowing over her hand; "a year, give me a year——" And he turned and walked away.

"Sir," said Coventry, laying aside his sword and walking down to where Jones stood upon the sand, "we have been misinformed concerning you. Whatever your political or personal affiliations may be, I am glad to recognize in you gentlemen of merit and distinction. I trust to be able to repay the obligation you have laid upon me and my betrothed on some future occasion. We are friends?"

"Sir," replied Jones, "I love a gallant foe. I shall remember you. I thank you for your courtesy."

"And I as well," added O'Neill.

"Elizabeth," said Coventry magnanimously, "can you not bid your friends good-by?"

"I shall ever remember Captain John Paul Jones," began Lady Elizabeth, stepping forward and giving the little Captain her hand to kiss; "and I shall never forget Lieutenant O'Neill."

"Will you wait one year for him?" he whispered, as he bowed low over her hand.

"Come and see," she answered.

The BITER Bitten

By John Arthur Barry

"THAT'S the Jeanne d'Arc," remarked the Captain to me as the ensign fluttered for the third time down the signal halyards in salute to a big white steamer with a yellow funnel, and showing the French tricolor, that was passing us about half a mile away. "She made her number," he continued, "but there was no necessity. I'd know her as far as I could see her. In fact, for a very short time I commanded her."

"Why," I replied, "I thought you disliked steam and would never have anything to do with it?"

"Hate the whole business," said the skipper, "but I had to take charge of the Jeanne. Nor was she, so to speak, a steamer when I found her. You see, she's brig-rigged, and shows quite a decent lot of canvas. I was only second then, and if the Lord hadn't put it into my head to do what I did I expect I'd be second still, or even before the stick again, instead of a master at four-and-twenty." And Captain Hammond glanced with evident pride at his fine clipper, the Carisbrook Castle, as she tore along before the strong northeast trades.

"Few things would please me better than to hear that yarn," I said presently, "and the more so because the steamer's name seems curiously familiar to me. Wasn't she seized and sold by the British Government for smuggling, or something of the kind—I forget now?"

"Not quite that," replied the Captain smiling; "it was worse than smuggling.

"Appropriately enough," he went on, drawing a deck chair alongside mine, "we're not far off the spot where the affair happened. I was second of a fine lump of a ship called the Princess Royal at the time. We'd caught the trades light—hardly enough of 'em, in fact, to keep the sails full and the ship with steerage way on her. The night was black as a dog's mouth, and when I turned out to take the middle watch I had to feel each step like a blind man—not a thing could I see, alow or aloft. The old man had turned in; apparently we had all the black world of sea to ourselves. Four bells had just struck. The wind had died completely away, and the sails were knocking and banging sixpences out of the owner's pocket as the ship rolled to the heavy swell. 'Lay aft, here, the watch!' I shouted, glad of something to do, 'and clew up the crowjack and mainsail!' Then, groping about, I found the mizzenstaysail halyards and let them go. I could hear the men all around me swearing softly as they fumbled at the rail amongst the gear. Suddenly, as I felt for the sheet to cast it off the bitts, an awful shock sent me flying across the poop. There was a cruel noise of crashing and rending and tearing, mingled with loud shouts and cries, filling the darkness full of terror and dismay, whilst the Princess reeled and went over nearly on to her beam ends.

"'Lord help us! Mr. Hammond, what's this?' I heard the Captain shout as I rose bewildered to my feet. The next moment he and all of us were answered with a completeness that turned us into staring statues as a blue light burst out for'ard and showed us a great white-painted steamer with her jibboom broken short off and hanging over a pair of tall, sharp clipper bows that stuck half way through the unfortunate Princess just abaft the break of the forecastle. She was brig-rigged but with no sail set. A single lofty funnel rose straight out of her amidships, and the faces of her men looked ghastly in the flare as with frantic gestures they shrieked and chattered at us in a very babel of discord. Then all at once the flare was extinguished, leaving the darkness blacker than ever.

"'Ready with the boats, there!' shouted our Captain; 'she'll stand by us as soon as she gets clear. Mr. Hammond, lower away the port lifeboat at once, whilst the mate and myself see to provisioning the others. Hail the steamer, somebody, and ask if they're much damaged. Confound them, I don't believe they've got a light showing anywhere!' To our hail no answer was returned. There was a silence broken only by the thumping of her screw going full speed astern, and a loud rushing noise for'ard as of water falling over a rock.

"By this time lights were flashing about our decks, and a couple of boats—the lifeboat and a large thirty-foot whaler off the skids—were over the side. Not till then did we pause to draw breath. During our work we had felt the steamer go free of us. But now, as we stared around, we could see no sign of her. Not a voice was to be heard, no glimmer of light caught our straining gaze. All was silent.

"'Surely the brute hasn't left us!' exclaimed the Captain.

"'The bloody Dago's cleared safe enough, sir,' replied a seaman standing near the skipper. 'I heard the thump o' her screw far away to port yonder,' and he spat in disgust as he swung his lamp over the black water swirling and foaming into the ship's belly. Already she was down by the head to such a degree as made a steeply inclined plane from for'ard aft, and it was very evident that at any moment the partition—only a thin one of two-inch planking—might succumb to the enormous pressure and flood the body of the hold. Indeed, it was probably only the fact of the cargo being stowed against it that had kept it in its place so long and given us a chance to save our lives. There were thirty-five of us all told when the roll was called for the last time. And one man, an ordinary seaman named Barlow, was missing—not to be found anywhere. The mate took one of the lifeboats with ten, the skipper another with the same number, and I took the whaler with fifteen. It was about eight bells (four o'clock) in the morning watch, and darker than ever as we got into the boats and lay off from the ship, on a rounding, smooth-backed

He proved to be the Captain swell that looked mighty big to us now. And we amused ourselves by firing rockets in case the steamer might still be hanging about. Of course, as a few argued, she possibly was desperately hurt herself, or even sunk. But the general idea favored deliberate desertion.

"At last came the dawn, showing us our ship bows under to the foot of the foremast. As yet the bulkhead was holding. Not a sign of the destroying steamer was to be seen anywhere around the horizon.

"'She may live for hours yet,' remarked the skipper. 'Some of us had better get on board and send over more provisions. We can carry them easily.'

"Scarcely were the words out of his mouth when the Princess pointed her already lofty stern still higher, until, indeed, it was almost up and down, hung there for about ten minutes, and then disappeared head first.

"'May the Lord send the same luck to the Dago afore he's time to get his boats out!' exclaimed a sailor. And that was the requiem of the poor Princess Royal.

"The Cape Verdes being the nearest land, it was determined to make for them, keeping the while in company, if possible. But that night it came up thick and squally, and the other two boats, being both faster and lighter than mine, were out of sight when morning broke, with the squalls settled into a stormy northwest gale. Finding it impossible to make way against this, I decided to run for the South American coast. But our whaler soon let us know about that; her sails were rods too small for her heavy body, and repeatedly the waves overtook and swamped us. So, seeing nothing else for it, I presently hove her to with a sea-anchor made out of gratings and oars. And to this she rode fairly well. But most of our provisions were soaked, and one keg of water was spoiled.

Most of my crowd were British, I'm happy to say, and amongst them were two little nippers of apprentices, who ought to have been in their beds at school that night instead of in a howling gale in the North Atlantic. They were perhaps about thirteen, certainly no older, but plucky! Why, those kids—brothers, they were—were worth millions to me all through that bad time. There were some Germans amongst the crowd who, after a while, lost their backbones and for very little would have chucked up the sponge, but the nippers simply wouldn't let 'em, for they got amongst 'em and chaffed and joked, ay, and once or twice swore at 'em, till for very shame's sake the chaps stiffened up.

"However, in these latitudes weather like that doesn't last, as a rule, and by midday we were flopping about on a big, greasy swell in a hot sun and without wind enough to fill a silk glove. And a curious lot we looked, I'll swear—salt-encrusted, blear-eyed, haggard and stiff-jointed. Some of the men were in a heap, fast asleep like the youngsters, who, dead beat at last, and no wonder, had snugged into each other's arms and lay against my legs where I sat in the stern sheets. Putting a coat over the poor little beggars, I got up and with the help of those yet awake hauled in our anchor, finding, to our great delight, that our mainsail had caught against it. This we set to a bit of a breeze springing up late in the afternoon.

"Still——"

At this moment the wind all at once took one of those strengthenings so common at sea, squealing viciously through the upper rigging and sending the Castle over till her lee rail showed like a black streak through the roaring foam, whilst over the weather one bucketfuls of water splashed, making great wet blotches here and there along the length of the white main-deck as it ran down into the gurgling scuppers.

"I think, Mr. Cargill," remarked the Captain to the very youthful second officer, who for some minutes I had noticed staring doubtfully aloft, "that we'll take those skysails off her. The wind seems to be breezing up a bit.

"Well," continued the Captain as we lingered over our coffee, "that evening we saw a steamer coming straight for us, and you may judge that the sight was a pleasant one, and with what joyous feelings we watched the gray trail of smoke pouring away from her funnel. As she drew nearer we made her out a white-painted, brig-rigged boat, with a great, tall, yellow stack amidships. She had only her fore and aft canvas set, and was making about ten knots.

"All at once one of the nippers squeaked, 'Mr. Hammond, sir, isn't that the steamer that ran us down?'

"'If it ain't,' growled a seaman, staring hard, 'it's 'er bloomin' double!'

"'Looks to me, too,' said another, 'as if that there jibboom o' hers wasn't never the spar as was meant to fit that bowsprit. An' see, she's got a bran' new stick of a fore-t'gallan' mast. Oh, it's 'er as sure as the Lord made little happles!'

"'If I cud only get a glimp o' 'er bows I'd be certainter,' remarked yet another, 'for I seen her name for a second.'

"'What was it, my man?' I asked.

"'Jeanne, sir,' replied he; 'only I fancy there was somethin' more arter it as I didn't get time to catch afore the light was dowsed.'

"Another quarter of an hour and the steamer was abreast of where we lay tumbling about with our sail down, and the small ensign with which each of the Princess' boats was provided fluttering from the halyards, union reversed—a signal of distress and appeal to men that use the sea in every one of their languages. Also, though it seemed unnecessary, we stood up and shouted strongly and all together. But she hoisted no colors—took not the least notice, although now only three hundred yards away and with a crowd of men staring over the rail at us. From the lofty bridge came a glitter of gold-laced uniforms. A bell was ringing somewhere about her—probably for dinner. Suddenly one of my men sat down heavily and laughed and swore in a breath. 'What did I tell yer?' said he, pointing. 'Twig the murderin' cow's bow!'

"And as we stared we saw, sure enough, that a piece of canvas had been spread over the spot where her name should have been; whilst presently, as she stolidly thumped ahead, giving no sign whatever, we perceived a similar curtain hanging over her stern. Evidently it was no use making any further appeals—just as well to save our breath. All the same, it was bitter to watch her going off like that.

"For a time the miserable business took the stiffening out of all of us, and we did nothing but stare incredulously after the brute as she made off, half expecting to see her suddenly back her engines and round on her heel toward us.

"But when thoroughly satisfied that there was no hope, the men recovered themselves and swore viciously, cursing all foreigners under the general names of Dutchmen and Dagoes. Some maintained she was French, others that she was German. The man who said her name was Jeanne with more to follow got into trouble by giving an opinion that after all she might be English.

"'I suppose now, my lad,' I said, 'you couldn't remember how it was spelled?'

"'The fust letter was J,' says he, thinking hard, 'the second was a He, an' then comes an A, an' then a Hen, an' then a He or a Hen again—I ain't sure. Big brass uns, they was, a foot long a'most, but I only caught 'em like in the corner o' my heye. And there was a He to bend hup with. An' if that don't spell Jeanne, I'd like to know what does?' he concluded triumphantly.

"That night it fell calm, and, being very tired, I had dropped off to sleep, when one of the nippers awoke me. 'There's a funny noise out there, Mr. Hammond,' says he, pointing into the darkness.

"Listening intently, I heard the sounds, too—curious knocking noises as if there was an iron ship in drydock somewhere in the ocean with a lot of riveters busy about her.

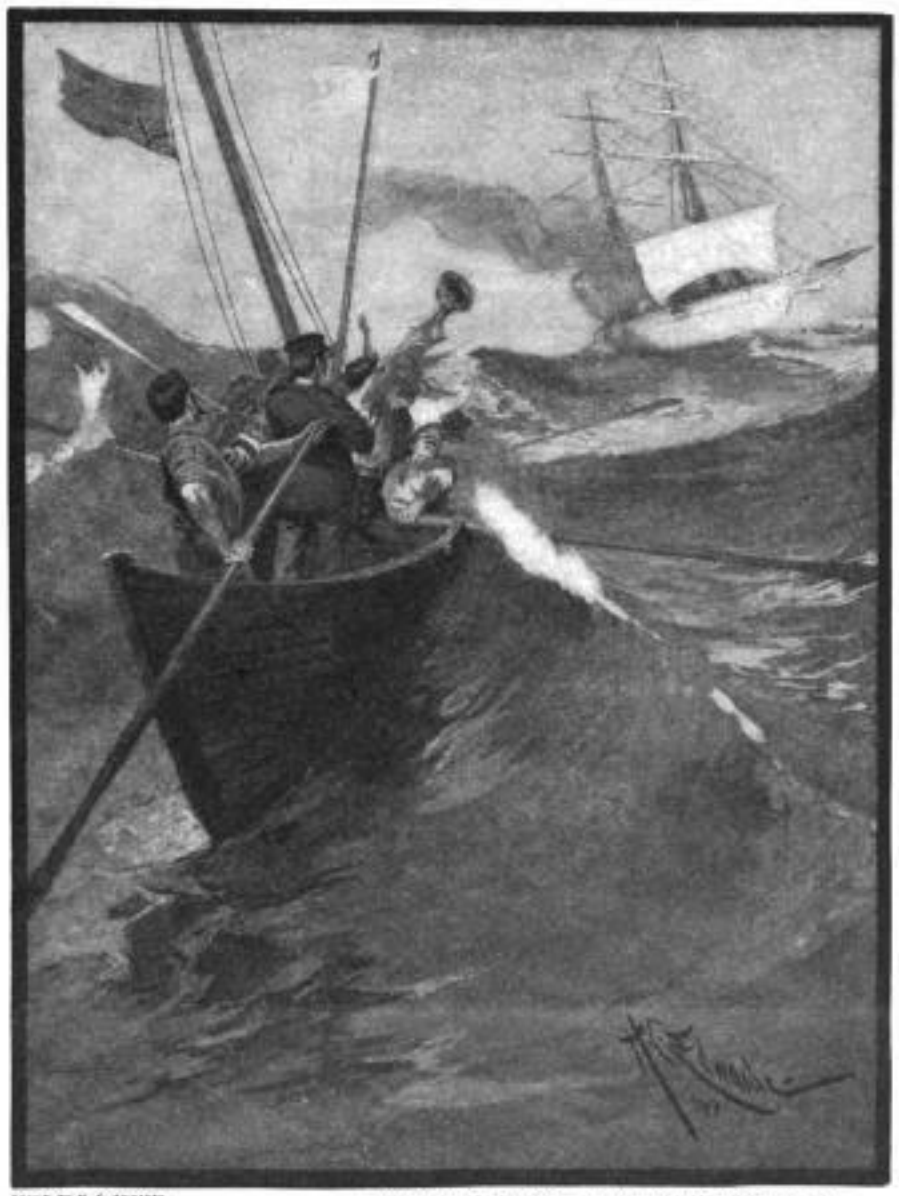
"Presently some of the men also noticed it, and I could hear them muttering to each other. Others were certain they caught a glimpse of lights now and again.

"Getting four oars out, we pulled slowly in the direction, until after a couple of hours we were encouraged by both lights and noises becoming quite distinct and plain to sight and hearing. A ship, without a doubt! Strangely enough, no one of us shouted. There seemed something uncanny in the business. Then all at once a voice muttered, 'It's a steamer! See them lights up on the bridge! An' I can make out her smoke-stack now.'

"'It's the steamer, by Heaven!' exclaimed another, voicing the possibility that had already occurred to me as soon as I'd made out the rig, along with a wild scheme that at the same moment flashed through my brain. 'Steady, lads, steady,' I whispered. 'It's her, all right. Some of the machinery's gone wrong and they're trying to mend it. What d'ye say, all of you? Are you game to try and seize her? She'll never take us on board. Suppose we take her and sail her to England, and let an English jury judge between us?'

"At this there ran through the boat a sort of stifled hum there was no mistaking the meaning of.

"Well," continued Hammond, laughing a little, "it was a mad scheme, of course. But after you've been four days and nights in an open boat, burnt and salted, half-starved, and, into the bargain, horribly riled, you're apt to take risks that otherwise you wouldn't give a second thought to. There were no plans. We were to stick together as much as possible, the men arming themselves with belaying-pins and I putting my revolver much in evidence. But what we chiefly trusted to was the hope of being able to catch most of the hands below and keep them there, for by this time I knew enough to be sure that she'd lost her propeller, and that her people, having a spare one on board, were busy shifting cargo from aft for'ard so as to raise the stern sufficiently to get it fitted. Indeed, already she was down by the head like a pig, and as we swung noiselessly under her bows the martingale gear was within easy reach.



"'Let me go first, sir,' whispered one of the blessed youngsters—that's the chap walking the poop now; his brother is second of the Compton Castle—' and I'll sneak around and see how matters are and come back and tell you.' And almost without waiting for an answer the little imp had swung himself up and disappeared in the darkness. Presently we felt a rope's end drop into the boat, and we knew he must have, at any rate, found the fo'c's'le head clear. But it seemed weeks before he slipped into the midst of us as suddenly as he'd gone. 'Splendid, sir,' he gasped; 'I wasn't on the bridge, but there's not a soul on deck—all busy below. They're French, I know, because I learned it at school, and they're talking and gabbling like anything. There's two alleyways, one on each side of the engine-room. The fore and main hatches are off, and they're dragging cargo for'ard. I peeped into the fo'c's'le, but it's empty. So was the side where the firemen live.'

"'Good boy!' I said; 'if this lark doesn't turn out a linnet you've done yourself a fine turn.'

"Ten minutes afterward the whole lot of us stood on the fo'c's'le. And to show the lads that business was meant, I asked the last one as he came up for his knife, and cutting the rope we had used for a painter I threw it overboard and told them what I had done.

"Four to each hatchway and the rest to the engine-room were the only orders. Quite sufficient; for by this time the men knew exactly what they had to do—knew, too, that there was no backing out.

"Dropping some at each hatch, I took my gang noiselessly into the alleyway. There I gave a long, shrill note on my whistle—the signal agreed upon. Then, in a trice, we had the engine-room skylights down and bolted, and the doors secured with handspikes we had taken from a rackful close by on the quarter-deck. But below they never heeded, hammering and talking away with a great noise of tongues and iron.

"'Fore and main hatches on, sir,' reported one of the kids, dancing along the alleyway. 'Bars fast and a man at each! The Frenchies are singing out blue murder down below, sir. Oh, Mr. Hammond, look out!'

"Turning as the youngster shrieked sharp and clear, I saw a stout, middle-aged man in gold-braided coat and cap covering me with a pistol. He was well within the light from the engine-room, and I noticed how pale his fat, round cheeks were, and how the gray imperial on his chin kept wagging time to his shaking hand. In a second I whipped out my revolver and, pointing it at him, roared fiercely:

"'Puttez up votre mangs or vous êtes dead man!' And at that, without more ado, he threw his arms out straight and held them there till the youngster, now choking with laughter, took his pistol from him and found it empty. He proved to be the Captain.

"All along the alleyways were small cabins, and from one of these for some time I had noticed a persistent knocking and thumping. Finding it locked, one of the fellows mounted a box and looked over the grating and hailed the occupant.

"'By the Lord, sir!' he exclaimed presently, 'if it ain't Jimmy Barlow!' (the missing ordinary seaman). Well, we'd no sooner got him out and heard his story of how he had made a jump into the Frenchman's rigging from the fo'c's'le head of the Princess, where he had been on the lookout, than another surprise was sprung on us. 'Some boats not very far off hailing of us, sir,' a man reported, 'an' blessed if I don't believe as it's the skipper an' mate's lot!' he added jubilantly.

"The dawn was just breaking as I ran for'ard and stared away to port toward the dim shapes just discernible on the nearly calm sea. 'Ship ahoy! a-h-o-o-y!' they shouted as their oars took the water frantically, and presently with heartfelt delight I was welcoming my astonished shipmates on board the French cargo boat Jeanne d'Arc, of Marseilles, homeward bound from Colombo and Bahia, to the sound of a British cheer.

And then we stood by whilst the Frenchmen swarmed up through the fore hatchway

"Like ourselves, they had had a bad time in the boats and were only too glad to get out of them. Still we were in a predicament. Below, the Frenchmen were thundering with might and main at hatches and skylights. We didn't want to smother them, unfeeling brutes though they'd proved themselves. Then, again, if we let them up they'd be almost certain to try and get their ship back.

"'Hanged if I know what to do,' exclaimed my old skipper, half laughing and cocking his eye at the bridge, where the French Captain stood staring at us very sulkily. 'Cook, forage about meanwhile and find us something to eat. Masthead those yards again, boys, and get the boats inboard, and as I can talk the lingo a bit I'll go up yonder and have a yarn with the President of this noisy Republic and give him my opinion of him and his ship.'

"I don't know what passed between the pair, but after a while they came down together, the Frenchman very silent and subdued and our skipper looking pleased and determined. 'Search the ship for arms, Hammond,' said the latter as he passed me, 'and then off hatches and let the beggars up. There's a couple of rifles and some revolvers in this fellow's cabin. There may be more.'

"We found enough to arm half a dozen of our chaps. And then we stood by whilst the Frenchmen swarmed up through the fore hatchway, an exhausted, perspiring, dirty, astonished crowd that we drove into the fo'c's'le and locked there, with a sentry at the door. The engineers and deck officers were shut up in a sort of big messroom aft. Idlers—cooks, stewards and boys—we kept to their duties. Then, turning to, we worked like niggers at trimming cargo to get her on an even keel again. They'd got their spare propeller out, but we had no use for that kind of thing. She was square and lofty, and although we knew nothing about steam, we did about canvas. And presently, catching a strong southerly, we made the Jeanne snort after a fashion that caused Johnny France to turn up the whites of his eyes.

"Mind you, though, it was an anxious time all round. We didn't quite know how the law would look at the business; and then we had to watch our prisoners closely.

"Barlow was our sheet-anchor, though. He could swear that when he boarded the Jeanne she hadn't a solitary light showing; could swear, also, to the way in which, directly she got clear, she steamed off at full speed. Then, when the Frenchmen, having to stop shortly afterward for twenty-four hours because of heated bearings—which delay accounted for our meeting her so strangely when she should have been miles away—sighted our boat they hustled him below into a spare berth, but not before he had recognized us and seen them placing the canvas blinds over her name. You may imagine what care we took of Jimmy till we dropped anchor and ran up the police flag.

"Then the fun began in earnest. I've heard since that we were nearly being the cause of war between Great Britain and France. But I hardly believe that. Luckily for us, perhaps, ours was a very rich firm, and they backed us for all they were worth in the battle between French and English Lloyds, their respective Governments and the insurance offices. And at last we won. And it took the Jeanne's cargo—3000 tons of tea, cinchona, cocoanut oil, cinnamon and plumbago—to pay the piper. A year afterward I got my ship and a present of £500 from the firm.

"That's the yarn.

"Mr. Cargill, I think you may as well take the fore and mizzen royals off her. It's looking a bit black to wind'ard."

The Greatest Needs of American Golf

BETTER GROUNDS, SAYS JOHN REID, JR.

TO WRITE on the Greatest Need of Golf in America requires that a man should pronounce at once what is this need. Now there are many needs, not all great, but some of them are of so much importance that I am not going to choose between them. I am convinced that two great needs of our game of golf are: first, economy in the game—relating to the expense of club houses and their accessories; second, good golf courses, where a good player has a merited advantage over a player not quite his equal.

JOHN REID, JR.

OUR CLUBS ARE TOO EXPENSIVE

We need to have the game played on a much cheaper basis as far as club houses and so forth are concerned. Twenty-five dollars should cover a member's annual dues in order not to restrict the game to the moneyed class, which does not of necessity embrace the best players. A comparison of some English clubs with our representative clubs will bring this point out.

I happened to be at the Royal St. George Golf Club, at Sandwich, last summer. This course is one of the very best in Great Britain, and is where the championship was held in 1896. I was especially struck with the comfort and homeliness of the club house, which is a very plain but well-arranged house. There were two servants in the house, a man, who was the janitor, and his wife, who did the cooking. The man acted as waiter during meals, and looked after things generally at other times. At lunch time the table is set with several different cold meats and one hot dish. Knives and forks are found at the end of the table, also plates; every one helps himself—without any rush or scramble—and talks with his neighbor over the game, or arranges a match to follow the after-luncheon smoke. If any drinks are wanted a slight call will bring them in a moment. These same conditions will be found at all the best courses in Great Britain, except that one more man may be found on busy days.

B. S. HORNE

The average lunch time in any of our representative clubs is characterized by a rush of French and German waiters—an element totally foreign to golf—and a menu written in some foreign tongue. There is a constant fault-finding because you are not waited upon at once. The foods are too rich, and the whole meal resembles too much our model restaurants to be comfortable and homelike.

The English luncheon costs about 36 cents, while ours costs from 75 cents to $1.50. In this country we have large social clubs to support, and consequently large retinues of servants. These expenses necessitate an annual subscription of from $50 to $175 the year from each member. This amount is expected from a member of a club in America as representative as Prestwick, St. Andrew's, Sandwich and Muirfield are of Great Britain.

PENALIZE BAD PLAY AND MINIMIZE LUCK

We have no real golf "links" in this country as yet, but we have some very good golfing ground. Now, if we cannot have good golf links, we can at least lay out our courses so that they will be good golf courses and not toys. In my opinion, a hole should be one, two, three or four good shots from the tee, and the bunkers should be placed to catch poor shots from the tee, second shot or approach. No one should be able to make a foozle and then stand an almost even chance of winning the hole. Take, for example, a hole of 220 yards. This is a most unfair hole, because a good player cannot reach it on his drive, but can get there easily in two—in fact, gets so near it in one that he feels as though his approach were almost thrown away. A poor player, playing this same hole, may miss his drive and still have a very good chance at the hole with a good or even indifferent iron shot. Holes of this sort are heart-breaking to a good player, and they give his opponent too much of a chance to "make up." Were this hole 175 yards or 300 yards, then there would be no chance for a lucky second on the part of the poor player. In the first instance, the good player would reach the green, and in the second instance he would have to make two nice shots to be there. Clearly, then, there should not be many of these "drive-and-a-mashy" holes.

The bunkers should be very carefully placed so as to punish poor shots. Too many of our bunkers are placed in very questionable places—some so near the hole that a long shot carrying over will not stay on the green, and some so far from the tee that a good drive gets in them. A shot of 150 yards straight on from the tee should never be penalized.

These seem to me to be the most urgent needs of the game just now; but there are many others which I hope will straighten themselves out as we begin to play the game more in the spirit of the rules than by the letter. JOHN REID, JR.,

Captain St. Andrew's Golf Club, Yonkers, New York.

REV. S. H. DAVIS SAYS THE PUBLIC SHOULD LEARN THE HEALTHFUL VALUE OF GOLF

One of the greatest needs of golf in America is that our professional and business men shall come to recognize its value as the most healthful of outdoor exercises.

Busy men say they have not the leisure for the sport. The fact is, that they confine themselves too closely to business, and are like the mechanic who will not take time to oil his machinery. Presently the machinery will break down or become worn out and much valuable time will be lost for repairs. Let the business or professional man recognize the value of golf as a promoter of good health, sound sleep, stronger muscles, steadier nerves and clearer brain, and the success and permanency of the game in this country is assured.

S. H. DAVIS,

President of the Weekapaug Golf Club, of Weekapaug, Rhode Island.

President of the Riverside Golf Club, of Westerly, Rhode Island.

B. S. HORNE WANTS THE BUNKERS BETTER PLACED

The first step that should be made toward the betterment of golf in America is the proper laying out of the course. A great many courses are necessarily short, but even this great fault is not so glaring if proper care and thought is given to the placing of bunkers to punish poor play and to reward good play. On a long course this is not so evident, as the result of poor play there means loss of distance, with practically the loss of a stroke, but on a short course a miss from the tee means only a long iron shot or brassy to be equal to the player having made two perfect strokes, unless the greens are protected by sand pits or cops. This would eliminate, on short courses, much of the so-called luck which now prevails in what promises to be the greatest of all American games. B. S. HORNE.

JAMES G. AVERELL

JAMES G. AVERELL WOULD ENCOURAGE A MORE SPORTSMANLIKE SPIRIT

In America I think we are apt to care too much about winning in our sports, and this seems especially true in golf. Tournaments are often spoiled by disputes which lead to misunderstanding and ill feeling.

Of course there have been many meetings in which there has been none of this, but most of us, I think, have seen it at times.

Till we can play more for the sake of the game and less for the sake of winning I am sure golf will not take the place that it should in American sports. JAMES G. AVERELL.

Claverly Hall, Cambridge, Massachusetts.

MR. CARNEGIE TAKES A DRIVE AT THE DUFFERS

My opinion of the Greatest Need of Golf in America is to punish our poor shots more severely. M. C. CARNEGIE.

Fernandina, Florida.

WALTER J. TRAVERS WANTS TIME TO GROW TRADITIONS AND GOOD GRASS

What is the Greatest Need of Golf in America? Time, I should say—time to allow the courses to mature and the players to grow up with them. Incidentally, a more genial climate might also be desired. There is little doubt that great extremes of heat and cold are not conducive to the fine, natural links which are to be met with in such numbers in Great Britain. In respect to soil constituents we have a few links in this country, but for one such there are a hundred courses—and the elements are not over kind to either.

To maintain these in good condition involves a heavy expense in cutting the grass and watering the greens. The latter means that each green has to be piped and watered freely during the summer months.

The progress which has been made in developing our principal courses has been very marked since the inception of the game. It is said that it takes a generation to make a lawn. This being the case, there is certainly a very encouraging prospect for those courses which have only been laid out within the last five years—many, in fact, within the past two or three years.

M. C. CARNEGIE

While we can hardly hope to rival the best British links, yet much may be done to bring our courses up to a high state of excellence. Time and careful, intelligent attention will work wonders. The putting greens should first claim the most loving care. The going through the green may not be all that could be desired, but this will be largely overlooked if the greens are in good shape, into which they can be brought with proper handling.

Much, of course, depends upon the character of the soil and the location of the greens in their treatment. As a general thing, a mistake is made by employing the same methods as for a lawn, particularly in the use of fertilizers. A putting green is, or should be, something wholly different. What is wanted is a thick mat of fine, short grass. Where on a lawn there are, say, a hundred blades of grass to a square foot, on a green there should be at least three times the same number of blades in the same space. You want a lot of little blades instead of a comparatively few big blades. The soil enrichers will certainly furnish the latter; sand will help to produce the former.

HOW TO GET GOOD GREENS

Examine closely some of the very best greens we have—for instance, those at Meadow Brook and Garden City, and the eighth at Westchester—and it will be found that they are all of the same family and owe their fine quality entirely to an underlying stratum of sand with a comparatively thin coating of an alluvial loam. The rich, succulent grass is lacking—the soil could not support it, but the great desideratum is present in the shape of a beautiful web of a fine silklike yet very strong and durable character of grass that makes the ideal green. This kind of grass—generally Rhode Island Bent, Red Top or Creasted Dog's Tail—makes a splendid root bed, and the blades differ from those usually met with on inland courses in that they seem to be deficient in moisture, being very much smaller and finer and more tenacious, consequently standing wear better.

CHESTER GRISWOLD, JR.

It will be found that greens of this nature closely resemble the best on the other side, and the lesson to be derived is to approximate as closely as possible the soil conditions existent. This may be arrived at by covering the greens in winter of nine-tenths of ordinary inland courses with fine, white sea sand. The snows and rains of winter will leave very little trace, the sand being washed into and incorporated with the soil. During the early spring and fall a thin coating may also be applied, but this is not advisable in summer.

This sand treatment, with a liberal supply of some of the seeds mentioned, or others, will in time effect a wonderful transformation to coarse greens that may look beyond redemption, and will materially improve those which are now good, especially if accompanied by nightly watering during the summer. The application of sand, moreover, has a marked tendency to make it untenable for those nuisances—earth worms. Good greens go hand in hand with good golf.

WALTER J. TRAVIS.

BETTER LAID-OUT COURSES, SAYS CHESTER GRISWOLD, JR.

The two following points could well stand improvement:

First: Better kept and better laid-out courses.

Second: An almost entire doing away with the too handsome prizes that are from time to time offered by the majority of our leading clubs.

Comparison of the British methods with ours will, I think, explain why the game has a higher standing there than here. One need only compare British links, beautifully kept by competent and civil greens-keepers and professionals, with the generally poor turf and the all too lax discipline maintained on nearly all of our own courses.

The first of my "needs" will thus prove itself, although it might be well to give an instance: At one prominent club the professional makes a practice of wearing knickerbockers and of addressing the club members as if in the performance of his duties he were bestowing a favor. On the other side of the Atlantic such conduct would cause his instant discharge as detrimental to the best interests of the club.

PRIZES SHOULD BE INEXPENSIVE

The second "need" requires but a word of explanation. Every one knows that when any sport reaches a point (I do not mean to say that we have reached such a point in golf, and I trust we never shall) when it is necessary to give prizes that are valuable in a money sense in order to induce a decent-sized field to enter, then that particular sport has degenerated into a mere "mug-hunters'" circuit and had better die out.

In order to obviate the slight tendency in this direction, as shown by the fact that there are a few men who never enter except for expensive prizes, I should like to see a number of our leading clubs agree to give only suitable medals of but slight money value as prizes. By this means the leaning toward a downhill path would be promptly checked, and golf would be maintained in its proper sphere as a gentleman's game, where it is not what you win but how you win that counts.

CHESTER GRISWOLD, JR.,
President Intercollegiate Golf Association.
New York City.

H. C. CHATFIELD-TAYLOR THINKS MANY COURSES PUNISH GOOD PLAYING

The greatest need of golf in America at the present time is for better golf courses. I do not think there are more than four or five first-class courses in the United States—that is, courses that are up to championship form.

A great many courses would be vastly improved by a change in the length of holes and a rearrangement of the bunkers. Holes should be of three kinds, viz.: those where the green can be reached by a drive or iron shot; second, those where the green can be reached by drive and iron shot; third, those requiring a drive and brassy and an iron shot. Many courses in this country have many holes ranging in length from 200 to 250 yards. This length of hole seems to me wrong—that is, it is too long to reach the green with a drive, and yet if the drive is missed the green can be reached on the second shot without punishment. I have also seen courses where the bunkers were so badly placed as to reward poor playing and punish good playing.

H. C. CHATFIELD-TAYLOR

I think the game has developed so far in this country that courses should be laid out for first-class players alone, and not for second and third class players.

WHAT to READ

A Sheaf of Recent Verse *

IN ECHOES OF GREEK IDYLS Mr. Lloyd Mifflin gives us further proof of his ability to handle the sonnet as can very few contemporary verse-writers—an accomplishment fully shown in his two previous volumes. He also furnishes the large class made up of those who wish their classic literature filtered through the medium of the mother tongue some exceedingly graceful, happy renderings of three representative Greek idyllic singers—Bion, Moschus and the less known Bacchylides, the contemporary rival of Pindar in the ode, whose work only survives in fragments.

Mr. Mifflin, in pouring his translations of these old-world poets into the sonnet mould, does a somewhat unconventional, even daring, thing—for we are most familiar with versions which use more varied measures, this being true in especial of the ode, whose enthusiastic, rapid movement seems hardly caught within the placid confines of the Italian form. Indeed, a charge of monotony may, I think, be fairly brought against this too exclusive use of the sonnet for the purposes of translation. But certainly the result, looking to particular poems, is delightful. Take the favorite Moschus elegy, The Lament for Bion, for example: for plaintive melody and successful picture-making it is beautiful, and the work as a whole is sure to gain attention for its art, its ideality, and the interest it awakens as a new experiment in form.

Mrs. Moulton's Lyrics †

MRS. MOULTON'S pleasant lyric touch has become familiar in several volumes of verse, and another, embodying her more recent poems, will be welcomed. For the present book At the Wind's Will is the felicitous title, suggested by a line from Rossetti, whose influence, as well as that of the blind poet, Philip Bourke Marston, is perceptible in the Boston singer's work. To the latter, especially, she has stood in close relations of devoted friendship, and has edited his song for American readers.

The contents are made up of lyrics, sonnets and translations. The former deal for the most part with the bitter-sweet of love or the quieter harmonies of friendships. Nature, too, is charmingly reflected and often used allegorically, rich summer and bleak midwinter expressing the heyday and wane of humanity's master passion. Many of the poems are in sonnet form—in the manipulation of which Mrs. Moulton has long been skilled—and some of the very best things are found in this division. The renderings of French Rondels and Rondeaux are well done and enjoyable, this being particularly true of that exquisite bit, La Vie, which will be recalled by readers of Trilby.

Mrs. Moulton's note is sweet with a certain sadness which, delicate and unobtrusive, rather adds to the effect. Though there is neither strong individuality of expression nor great thought range, yet the quality of her verse is genuine, since it has tunefulness and sincerity.

A Poet's Holiday *

THE good of a holiday, not only for the one enjoying it, but (in the case of a poet) for the world as well, is illustrated in Mr. Bliss Carman's latest volume of verse, A Winter's Holiday—a tiny book which stands for "infinite riches in a little room." Mr. Carman has made the Bahaman trip of late, and of the seven poems making up the collection, five directly reflect this warm, many-colored experience. The two other pieces, December in Scituate and Winter at Tortoise Shell, depict in sharp contrast yet with equal charm New England winter scenes indoors and out. They show that this poet's remarkable gift for nature-description is as much in evidence when dealing with winter's monochromes as when moved by all the vibrancy and bloom of the full summer tide. The human element, too, the quiet touch of fun, are in these Northern pieces to vitalize the picture.

But perhaps the full Carman quality comes out best in the poems chanting his mid-sea life, his joy of the Bahaman approach; his joy again in White Nassau, with its quaint, clean streets, its picturesque peddlers and gay-plumaged birds. He fairly revels in this world of color, light, fragrance and song: and all through the descriptions is that subtle imagination and lure of music which, at their best, stamp Carman as to the manner born and set him quite apart from hissong-fellows. There is an unextinguishable idealism in all his work; the loveliness of it is not coarsely appealing; there is no blatant drawing of attention. But the elements of high poetry are always there. As an example of the way external objects are used imaginatively, take the stanza beginning and read on for two pages. The beautiful dreams that make men more than brutes have seldom been expressed with more truth and tenderness. Take the wonderfully poetic sketching of the flying fishes,

"Never yet was painter, poet Born content with things that are,"

"Fragile people of the sea Whom their heart's great aspiration for a moment had set free," for another representative passage. And read In Bay Street to see how Mr. Carman characteristically lifts a homely human theme by the idealistic touch.

Small as the book is, it contains some of the maturest and best work Mr. Carman has printed. No lovelier, truer, more distinctive verse is being written in our day than that embodied in the successive volumes of this Canadian singer. —Richard Burton.

HONOLULU HARBOR

Chances for Young Men
1. In the Hawaiian Islands
By Frank G. Carpenter

THE Hawaiian Islands are of their own kind. They are not like the Philippines, Puerto Rico, or any other colonial or territorial part of the United States. Their social, financial and material conditions are peculiar to themselves, and they can be appreciated only by one upon the ground.

They are among the richest islands of the globe and have already more rich men to the number of their Anglo-Saxon population than any part of the United States; but they are not a Klondike where gold can be picked up in the streams and the gullies. They have the most fertile of soils, but the supply of land is limited, and that still belonging to the Government is subject to many restrictions. They have a business which last year showed exports amounting to more than $15,000,000—almost double the value of the imports—but the business is of its own kind, so that the investor should study its character before he attempts to venture to compete with the capitalists who now have it well in hand. With all this, there are opportunities here well worth consideration, opportunities in which a limited number of our young men may realize the El Dorado of their hopes.

A BIRD'S-EYE GLANCE AT THE WHOLE HAWAIIAN GROUP

First, let us take a look at the country. It is not a large one. All told, the islands have not as much land as the State of Massachusetts, although the larger and only inhabited ones are scattered over the ocean for a distance as wide as that between Boston and Washington. The whole group, east and west, is wider than from New York to the Mississippi River, but the most of the western islands are barren rocks, some of which are mere dots on the surface of the Pacific. Some have not been prospected and others are said to contain valuable guano and phosphate deposits. Upon one, for instance, millions of sea birds roost every night, laying so many eggs that the Japanese laborers who are kept there gather them in wheel-barrows and carts, just as our farmers load potatoes and apples.

The Hawaiian Islands that we know, however, consist of the eight larger islands at the eastern end of the group. These are situated just about as far from San Francisco as Chicago is east of that city, and farther away from any Australian or Asiatic port than the distance from New York to London. The inhabited islands are not close to one another, some of them being a hundred miles and more away from Honolulu, with tempestuous seas between and only weekly passenger service of small steamers.

The inhabited islands range in size from Hawaii, which is almost as large as the State of Connecticut, to Kahoolawe, which is only about half as large as the District of Columbia. Oahu, the island on which Honolulu is situated, contains 600 square miles, while Kauai, the Garden Island of the group, has only 500 square miles, being 22 miles wide and 25 miles long.

The general character of all the islands is the same: they are wildly rugged, each being made up of one or more mountains, seamed with valleys and gorges, some of which are more than a thousand feet deep. Between the mountains lie rolling plains, and in many places at their feet there is a narrow plain sloping out to the sea. The plains, valleys and lower parts of the mountain sides contain the only lands suited to cultivation. They are covered with decomposed lava, often to the depth of twenty or thirty feet, furnishing a soil which produces rich crops of sugar, coffee, and all sorts of vegetables and tropical fruits. Some parts of the islands, on the other hand, are rocky and barren; still other portions are extremely ragged, being composed of extinct craters, while some are so high that upon them nothing can grow. In coming from San Francisco to Honolulu you are struck with the barren look of the islands. That part of Oahu which you first see is as bare as the Death Valley of California. It is composed of ragged craters long since burnt out, the sides of which are seamed and gullied by the lava flows of days gone by.

THE METROPOLITAN ADVANTAGES OF HONOLULU

As you go farther on you see other hills covered with a fuzz of emerald green and, rounding Diamond Head, come to low mountains covered with green. Palm trees with quivering branches wave you a welcome, and the houses of Honolulu look out at you through a forest of palms and other tropical trees as you come to anchor. Farther down the coast with your glass you can see the pale green of rich sugar plantations, and as you land and walk through the wide streets you find yourself in a very botanical garden of tropical plants and trees and beautiful flowers.

You may have expected to find a new country and may look for the ragged features of a frontier town in the city of Honolulu. If so, you will be disappointed. Honolulu has only 30,000 people, but in wealth and business it compares favorably with any town of five times the population in the United States. Its residences in many cases have large grounds about them, with lawns as velvety as those of England, beautiful trees and well-cared-for walks and drives. The town, in fact, has many rich men, and it is one of long-established businesses and families. It was in existence before San Francisco had a place upon the map.

The Honolulu of to-day has all the aspects of a modern American city. The signs over the best stores are in English and their proprietors have English names. The stores are of all kinds, with large stocks of goods and fine plate-glass show windows. Telephone wires run through all the streets, and you learn that more than a thousand telephones are in use. The streets and houses are lighted at night by electricity, and there is a system of waterworks and other modern improvements. The city has excellent public schools. Attendance is so vigorously compelled in city limits and throughout the islands that it is said it would almost require a search warrant to find a native Hawaiian or a white who cannot read and write. There are colleges of various kinds, numerous churches, a theatre which will seat more than a thousand people, a Young Men's Christian Association which has a well-equipped gymnasium and school, twenty miles of macadamized streets, an excellent public bicycle track, a half dozen or more large banks, three of which are savings banks, a stock exchange, a safe deposit company, and, in fact, every kind of modern business institution.

PASSAGE MONEY AND LIVING RATES FOR THE ISLANDS

At present everything that goes from and comes to the islands must pass through Honolulu, and it will always be one of the chief cities, if not the chief city, of the region. The only place that can ever hope to compete with it is the town of Hilo on the Island of Hawaii, but this has now a population of only 5000 and will need some millions of dollars expended on its harbor before it can be a landing place for the larger steamers. Honolulu will always be the seat of government and probably always the business and financial centre of the islands. It has, however, but a small harbor, which is taxed to its utmost with the shipping which calls here on its way to and from Australia, China and Japan, and the United States.

CUTTING THE SUGAR CANE

The young man who comes to the Sandwich Islands will first land at Honolulu. His passage from San Francisco to that point will cost him seventy-five dollars first cabin, or twenty-five dollars steerage, but the latter quarters on the ships are chiefly taken up with Chinese passengers and the accommodations are not at all comfortable. He will probably stop at Honolulu until he can look about him and get some idea of the chances. He will find that he is in a high-priced town and that his board will cost him as much, or more, than it did at home. If he goes to a hotel he will pay from two to five dollars the day, or if he rents a room he will be charged from six to twenty dollars the month, and his meals will cost him from four to six dollars the week. If he has a family and attempts to keep house his rent will be high, and he will find provisions more expensive than in the United States. His butter will cost him from forty to fifty cents the pound; eggs from thirty to fifty cents the dozen; flour two dollars and a half the hundred; beef about fifteen cents the pound, and other things in proportion. Even fruits and vegetables will be about one-third higher than at home, and the general extravagance of the people about him will be such that he will be tempted to spend more freely than at home. The average living expenses are, it is estimated, about one-third higher in Honolulu than they are in the United States.

If the young man is without capital he will have to rely on the labor market for his chances of a start; if he has a little money he may perhaps be able to engage in cooperative sugar planting; or if he has five thousand dollars or more there are opportunities for him to buy or lease Government lands and engage in raising coffee. The chief industry of the islands is sugar, but this, as I shall show further on, is one requiring large capital and expensive machinery. The best of the Americans here do not advise men to come to the islands unless they have at least five or ten thousand dollars, but others tell me there are opportunities for young men who are willing to work in almost every line.

WHAT YOU CAN EARN WITH YOUR HANDS, AND HOW

Let us first look at the labor market. It seems to me to be fairly well supplied. The sugar plantations are operated with Chinese and Japanese labor, there being 21,000 Asiatics on the sugar estates alone. In other branches of common labor there are from 20,000 to 30,000 more Chinese and Japanese and about 15,000 Portuguese, making a total of more than 60,000 of these classes of laborers in a population which is, all told, not more than 110,000. Taking out the natives, who in round numbers are about 40,000, there are 10,000 left, of whom perhaps 4000 are Americans. In Honolulu itself there are, I am told, not more than 4000 whites.

The young man from the States will come hoping to get a job in Honolulu or on one of the plantations as overseer or bookkeeper or engineer; he can hardly hope to take the places of the Chinese or Japanese. The demand for overseers is of course limited, and the man should not expect to get a position much more readily than he would at home. He will find, however, that wages are higher, both in Honolulu and in the country, than in the United States. The following are the sums paid for the different classes of work named: overseers and foremen on the plantations receive from $100 to $250 the month; sugar boilers and engineers from $100 to $175 the month; locomotive engineers from $40 to $75 the month, and plantation carpenters and blacksmiths from $50 to $100 the month. All of the higher-priced men on the plantations, including the above, have their houses and firewood furnished. White teamsters get from $30 to $40 the month, and the Chinese and Japanese common laborers about $15 the month.

In Honolulu mechanics are now in demand. There is considerable building going on and masons and carpenters are needed. The wages of carpenters and painters are from three to five dollars for the day's work of nine hours. Bricklayers receive five dollars and machinists from three to five dollars the day. There are at present about 2000 mechanics on the islands, of whom about 500 are Chinese and Japanese. There are about 300 American mechanics and perhaps 250 Portuguese. The drivers of the carts and wagons are principally natives, and the handling of freight at the wharves is done by the same class. I am told that they are preferred to the whites by the shippers. Outside of skilled mechanics, I should not advise any of our young men who have nothing but their muscle as capital to come to Honolulu.

HOW MUCH YOU CAN EARN WITH YOUR HEAD

As to clerks and bookkeepers the situation is much similar. There are frequent opportunities to get positions, but not more so than in the United States. There are already here about 1400 clerks and salesmen who get wages of from $50 to $125 the month and upward. Some are employed in the stores, on the plantations, and others in the smaller towns, but the most are here in Honolulu. Every large establishment must have a variety of clerks large enough to cover all the languages in general use in the islands—that is, Chinese, Japanese, Portuguese, Hawaiian and English. If a clerk can speak German and English, or both English and Portuguese, he is considered the more valuable on that account. There are some large German firms in Honolulu who will not employ a clerk who cannot speak and write German.

In the line of commercial traveling there is little done in the Hawaiian Islands, and the commercial man from the United States, who expects to visit the islands to work up trade, upon landing at Honolulu will be asked to pay $500 for the privilege of selling goods or taking orders on the Island of Oahu. He will have to pay $250 for the same privilege on the larger of the other islands, and, if he should make this his residence and engage in business, he will find that the city charges from fifty dollars the year upward for a license. In all small businesses he will have the competition of the Chinese and Japanese who now have the petty retail trade of the islands, running the restaurants, the fruit stands and small grocery stores. They are good traders and are satisfied with small profits.

The professions are also fairly well supplied, there being about ninety doctors and one hundred and one lawyers. Under the Republic there were four circuit courts, a supreme court and about thirty district courts, but these may be changed under the new government inaugurated by the United States. Among the doctors are four American women and twenty-seven Japanese and Chinese practitioners. The Board of Health employs thirty physicians in the hospitals and dispensaries throughout the country, but these positions are filled. Doctors and dentists must take out a license, which is granted only upon the applicant showing a diploma from some reputable college or upon passing an examination. The children of rich or well-to-do Honolulu residents are graduating from the American colleges and universities every year and coming back here to practice in their chosen professions. They, of course, have the advantage over the newcomers in their local acquaintance and business connections.

THE OPENINGS IN THE GREAT SUGAR BUSINESS

The best chances and, in fact, almost the only chances for fortune-making in the Hawaiian Islands are from agriculture. The islands have neither mines nor manufactures, but they have a soil which will raise more sugar to the acre than any other land upon earth. On some plantations as many as ten tons of sugar to the acre are annually raised, a product from five to eight times as great as the average product of the sugar plantations of Louisiana.

The most of the money now made in the islands is from sugar. There are sixty large plantations, comprising altogether about 80,000 acres and yielding a product which annually sells for more than $15,000,000. These plantations are managed after the most modern methods. They are chiefly owned by corporations, the capital stocks of which range from half a million to four millions of dollars. The stock in the various companies is regularly bought and sold in the Honolulu stock exchange and nearly all of the companies pay big dividends. There is, all told, about $30,000,000 invested in the industry, of which about $22,500,000 belongs to Americans. The chief officers and overseers of the plantations are Americans, but the laborers are chiefly Chinese and Japanese who have been brought here under contract for this work. At present one-fourth of the whole population and fully one-half of the Asiatic population are employed on the sugar estates.

The chief opportunities for young men in connection with sugar raising are in what is here called coöperative farming—that is, in buying or leasing a small tract of land from one of the large companies and raising cane to be sold at the great factories. This is comparatively a new plan and quite a number of men are doing it at a profit. There is little opportunity to buy wild land which will raise sugar, and there are practically no sugar lands left in the hands of the Government. The profits from such land are so large that the best of it was bought or taken up on long leases from the Government years ago.

A BRIGHT FUTURE FOR MARKET GARDENERS

Outside of sugar there are many opportunities for the young man to succeed here in the different kinds of intensive farming which can be profitably undertaken on the islands. There is so little land, that the opportunities for doing things on the bonanza scale have long since gone by. In the raising of fruits and vegetables, in producing grain and meat for home consumption and in coffee plantations there would seem to be many openings. The soil here will produce almost any kind of tropical fruit. It will produce the choicest of pineapples and bananas and every kind of vegetable, including potatoes. Nevertheless, fruits are exceedingly high in the Honolulu markets and most of the potatoes used come from California. The same can be said of the wheat, notwithstanding the fact that during the first days of the gold excitement in California the bulk of the wheat and potatoes used there was raised in the Hawaiian Islands.

This is a land of oranges, but the fruit sells in Honolulu at twenty-five cents the dozen; strawberries can be easily grown, but they bring twenty-five cents the pound; grapes thrive, but if you buy them at the fruit stands you pay fifteen cents the pound for them, and it is so with similar fruits. As to bananas and pineapples, it is claimed the islands could produce enough of them to supply all the markets east of the Mississippi River. The taking off the tariff and the reduction of freight rates, which will probably follow the annexation to the United States, will make this country the tropical fruit garden of our Western States.

So far there has been so much money in sugar raising that everything else has had to give way to it, the planters lazily preferring to buy their supplies from the outside, just as the cotton planters of the Southern States did when they received such high prices for that crop. Now that the sugar lands are all taken up, other possible crops are receiving consideration.

THE BEST CHANCE FOR THE SMALL CAPITALIST

The chief of the new industries is the raising of coffee, and this is perhaps the best opening for the young man of small means. The coffee lands lie high up above the sugar plantations, which are chiefly found close to the sea. The coffee tree will bear as high up as half a mile above sea level, or as low as five hundred feet above that point. Coffee raising is comparatively a new industry, bringing a new class of land into use; hundreds of small capitalists have gone into it within the past few years.

The Hawaiian coffee is far superior to that raised in Brazil. It ranks with the best Mocha and Java in the markets of the Pacific slope, selling at retail there for thirty-five and forty cents the pound. It brings from fifteen to eighteen cents the pound at wholesale in the markets of San Francisco, where Rio sells for six or seven cents. At these rates the planters of Hawaii can figure on a clear profit of about ten cents the pound, and as a good plantation in bearing will annually produce about 1500 pounds to the acre, the profits are very large. One plantation on the Island of Hawaii produced last year 3400 pounds to the acre, or a net profit of $340 the acre, so that it will be seen that even a small coffee plantation might bring in a considerable income.

UNHULLED COFFEE BERRIES

To raise coffee, however, requires some capital, and no young man should come to the islands for that purpose unless he has a capital of from three to five thousand dollars. The latter amount is considered by some low and by others ample for a start. For this sum he could take up a hundred acres of Government land on the Island of Hawaii, about the only island on which there is any land left. He would secure it on what is known as the purchase-lease system, agreeing to pay for it at its appraised value, say at from seven to ten dollars the acre, at any time within twenty-one years, provided he pay the Government eight per cent. interest on the value of the appraisement until the purchase money be paid. He would also agree to make certain improvements, and to live on the land, the understanding being that he could complete the purchase at any time after two years.

THE PROCESS OF BUILDING UP A PLANTATION

The coffee raiser first clears the land of forest and jungle. This will cost him perhaps thirty dollars the acre; but he can clear a little at a time, putting in, say, ten acres more every year, until at last he has the whole clear and in coffee. He buys his coffee trees of a nursery for two or three cents apiece and sets them out. They are cultivated from year to year, and at the third year begin to produce. They should be in full bearing the fifth year, at which time they will have cost him from $150 to $200 the acre. From that time on for twenty years or more they should annually pay him $100 the acre—a generous profit on his investment.

The process of building up such a plantation can be graduated by the amount of capital in the hands of the farmer, the larger plantations requiring, of course, more money and labor. A hundred-acre plantation with fifty acres only in coffee should produce an income of $6000 a year after the fifth year. This is, estimating the yield to be one pound to the tree, at a profit of ten cents the pound. Not counting the labor of the planter, the net cost of making and stocking such a plantation would be $12,000. The man with $5000 would start with less cultivated land, do his own work at least as far as management is concerned, and perhaps add to his income by raising bananas and vegetables.

The young man in this case will probably realize considerable off of the rise in the value of his land. There is but little good Government land left. The amount, all told, is less than two million acres. Of this, much is sterile, a great part inaccessible, and other parts are covered with lava. There are perhaps 500,000 acres that are of some value, and half of this amount is excellent land. The best coffee lands are on the Island of Hawaii, and about 60,000 acres of this character will be opened to settlement by the Kohala and Hilo Railway, which is now being surveyed.

THE CONDITIONS ON WHICH LAND CAN BE HELD

The Government is anxious that this land should be taken up by small planters, and, according to law, land can only be sold or leased in lots not to exceed one hundred acres, and only to persons who will agree to keep one-fourth of the land in cultivation for a period of years, and who will agree to live upon it. To such persons the land is sold at a low appraisement, often at one-fourth and less than the value of private lands in the same vicinity and of the same character. If all the good Government land as above estimated, 250,000 acres, were so divided, it would only accommodate 2500 families, so it will be seen that the supply is limited and the value of such lands must eventually increase.

At present the islands are divided up into great baronial estates owned or leased by rich men or corporations. Oahu has no public land available to settlers; Kauai, the Garden Island, is practically controlled by six corporations, and the Bishop Estate owns 600,000 acres outright. The Parkers control 700,000 acres on the Island of Hawaii, including 250,000 acres under irrigation, and the small island of Niihau has 25,000 sheep all owned by one family. The chances of the young investor are almost exclusively limited to the Government lands, and these are comparatively so few that they will, in a short time, be exhausted.

How They Treat Cub Reporters in Ohio

HARRY D JONES, a well-known New York editor, tells a story illustrating the trials of one cub reporter:

"It was in Cleveland, Ohio, some years ago, when I was engaged in daily newspaper work in that city. A young man had just joined the reportorial staff of a rival paper. He came from an out-of-the-way town, and had never before lived in a large city. He was elated over this position, and assumed so much dignity and even haughtiness that the other reporters determined to teach him a lesson. He had been sent to the lake front to get an exclusive story concerning the ship-building industry, and he announced that fact to several other reporters, one of whom looked at him in mock amazement and remarked solemnly:

"'By Jove, old man, that's work they give to the oldest reporters on the staff! You see, these millionaire shipbuilders won't talk to the ordinary reporter. If you have influence you can get a great beat from Keelson's yard. Everybody has been trying to get in there for two weeks.'

"The new reporter said that he had all the influence he needed and went post-haste to the yard. Here he was received by the second conspirator, who had taken on the guise of a member of the firm, and filled up with a technical story in which keels and main trucks, rudder posts and cutwaters, rolling chocks and deadeyes, were hopelessly and absurdly mingled. He closed the interview by presenting the reporter with a photograph of what he called the newest idea in naval architecture, but which was, in fact, a snapshot picture of a factory taken at an unusual angle, with the factory chimney seeming to spring from the deck of a small boat lying in front of the building.

"The next day this remarkable picture appeared in print. Early in the afternoon the reporter was called up on the telephone by the third conspirator, who said angrily:

"'I am the agent of the ship-building company whose boat you libeled to-day, and you have described it so incorrectly that I shall sue you for damages unless you print a retraction and make the proper corrections. The chimney as you have printed it looks as if it were on my boat. It does not belong to my boat at all, but is part of a factory near by.'

"And this statement appeared in the paper the next morning just as it had been sent over the telephone. That same afternoon the new reporter started on one of the longest vacations on record in Ohio journalism. It is not ended yet."

Nawaz Khan: The Gift of Allah

By W. A. Fraser

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company. Copyright in Great Britain

NAWAZ KHAN was the fighting ram of the Marris. This is a chronicle of the result of his dabbling in the affairs of the British Empire.

The Marris tribesmen were a joyous set of looting blackguards—proper Pathans. They were a small tribe; to them had come down a heritage of border feud, which, though it developed the fighting qualities of the survivals, kept the census within bounds.

Their land was fifty miles northeast of a sin-stricken teikil (station) named Sibi, on the Afghan border. Any tribe that lives within fifty miles of that station is sure to be had clean through. Sibi was known as "the white man's grave"; that was flattery—it was worse.

In September, when I passed through the land of the Marris they despoiled me with cheerful abandon; they looted my commissariat camel with platonic freedom, and one night a lover of fine raiment came as I slept and cut the side from my tent to make a toga for his broad shoulders. Allah! that was clever.

Six footsore brigands made sandals from my leather guncase, and then came and hobnobbed with me over a pot of tea. They were proud of their new footwear; the oak-tanned soles peeped at me joyously from beneath the square, rugged toes of the unabashed Pathans. I said nothing about this little matter—controversy might have ended with a slit in my neck; they have such a summary way of ending unpleasant arguments.

My guide, who was a first cousin to these outlaws in deviltry, was the best-natured blackguard I ever traveled with; he gave me politic pointers, for he had the wisdom of the serpent.

"These dwellers in caves," he said, "are the unregenerate offspring of depraved camels—also of evil swine; therefore take no notice, and we will get through pleasantly enough—without trouble."

His policy was sound; so the Marris and I remained on the very best of terms; they even showed me Nawaz Khan, the fighting ram that had bucked into oblivion every other ram from Dera Ghazi to Peshawur. And because of that they had been exalted among the ram-fighting, man-fighting, any-sort-of-fighting nations of that kush.

At the guide's suggestion I gave the owner, Rahat Shah, five rupees to make silver knobs for the points of the Khan's horns. Surely I had become a blood-brother to the cut-throat Marris. That was what the guide said; also was I safe in the sight of Allah, he assured me.

When I returned in December, Nawaz Khan, "the Gift of Allah," was gone. He had been looted, or had tumbled over a cliff. The tribe had searched at the bottom of every precipice without result. That he had been stolen was as difficult of belief as the statement that some one had made away with Buddha's tooth from the temple at Kandy.

But Nawaz Khan was gone, of a certainty. And now there was only the memory of his many battles, and the promise of much murder for the thieves who held him.

When I reached Sibi almost the first sight I saw was a ram, joyous in much fat, taking a rise out of a tall Punjabi orderly in front of his Colonel's tent. The ram had caught him fair in the middle, on the south side, and if the soldier had been brittle he would have broken in two. As it was, he covered much territory before lighting on his head in the white sand of the Sibi plain.

The orderly was vexed at the importunate attention from the hard-headed ram. He picked himself up with Sikh dignity and reached for his gun which stood with three inches of its iron muzzle buried in the soft earth.

Now a ram, when he tries for a knock-out blow and fails, usually backs up and plays a little harder next time, but the orderly's assailant seemed to think he had carried the joke far enough—wisely, perhaps—and walked sedately over to the Colonel's dog-cart and started peeling the yellow paint from its spokes.

Something about the cut of this pugnacious sheep appeared familiar to me. I manœuvred up to him strategically, keeping my line of retreat well open. A critical reconnaissance convinced me that it was the fighting ram of my freebooting friends who lived in the foothills of the Suleimans: there were the silver knobs of which I was the donor.

Great Scott! what was he doing here at the Colonel's tent? The whole Marris country would be in a blaze if they knew of it.

But they had looted me; therefore let them look to Allah for the return of their tribe's glory.

I asked Teniers, who was a Lieutenant in the regiment, where they had pakarao'd the sheep.

"Such a lark!" he answered. "You know, the Colonel is a queer fish; studies his book on tactics—form D. B. Z. in his pocket all the time. Good enough chap, you know, the old fellow is—wouldn't know enough to step inside if it were raining bullets, and nothing to be gained by getting shot; but all the same, he's like one of those greaseless country carts with his squeaky voice—puts the fellows all on edge, you know.

"We don't mind fighting—like it, of course; but hang it all! when there's no fighting to be got—when all these hill fellows are like a bally lot of shepherds, plodding around with their sheep and goats, and no raiding on, why, we want a bit of fun or else we'll go flabby.

"Now, 'Old Squeaks'—that's what the chaps call him—thinks fun, polo, and all the rest of it, you know, is all skittles; he talks about the officers blowin' their oof, and tommy-rot of that sort."

I let Teniers talk, and busied myself with his cheroot case, hunting for a decent Trichi; for I knew there was something needing a lot of explaining away, and that my young friend was leading up to it diplomatically enough. So I waited, and smoked patiently as he rattled on with his picturesque narrative.

"Well, it seemed hopeless enough; we sat in the worst sort of luck. There was some fighting up Chitral way with Shir Afzul, Umra Khan, and that lot, but we never got 'the route.' The camp was simply dying of stagnation. If cholera had come down from the Bolan, as it did last year, it would have played the deuce with us—we were that stalled for want of fighting or something.

"There were always five or six of our fellows in hospital, and not a broken bone or a 'concussion' in the whole bally lot—nothing but flabby heart. That was what was bowling them over—thinking. We didn't come out here to think, did we, Braem?"

"I should say not," I replied with an emphatic laugh.

Teniers looked at me quizzically. "Don't be a sarcastic goat," he said testily. "We can think right enough when it's needed; but fighting, or polo, or racing's the thing to keep a man fit. Good Heavens! the Surgeon actually hinted that some of the fellows were malingering. It would have ended in mutiny right enough; but just then we got hold of Yusuf——"

Before my friend had time to finish the sentence there was a rushing noise like the cutting loose of a junior cyclone, and over we went, tent and all. Jove! but it was a mix-up. The cot, a stool, a suit-case, young Teniers with a sword spitted between his legs, and myself, rolled up in several yards of canvas.

I felt some great body go crashing over me, and heard, rather indistinctly, the Lieutenant's voice, muffled in the folds of the tent, saying: "It's that ——— ram, I bet a guinea! What in the name of Allah is he after now?"

It was the Khan, right enough. When a sergeant and two privates had sorted us from among the débris, we discovered that a small, brick-laden donkey had excited the ram's curiosity, and he had attempted to sample the stability of the groggy little legs that looked so hopelessly inadequate.

The donkey flipped about just in time to miss the rush, and Nawaz Khan's charge had carried him through our tent. When the soldiers had pitched the wrecked tent, Teniers continued the interrupted history of the advent of the ram.

"Does he do that often?" I asked.

"That's the first time he's pipped my castle," said the Lieutenant, working the sand out of his hair with a brush. "His favorite mark is a Tommy curled up on a charpoy asleep. Sometimes he bunts the water barrels over, too; and once he tipped the Old Man up backing to charge something that seemed a happy mark. Squeaks was heels on, and didn't see him coming. We hid the ram for two days—the Colonel would have shot him."

"Who owns him—did one of the men chor him?" I asked cautiously, for the Khan's deeds made my friend a bit irrelevant to the point at issue.

"No; got him from Yusuf—you know Yusuf Khan, the camel man?"

I assented. I remembered him well. Once upon a time he had sold me a mad Bokharan as a riding camel, and the blatant thing had run away with me for twenty miles. At the end I was seasick, and for a week had amateur rheumatism. "Yes, I remember him," I said reminiscently; "he's a bad lot, even for a Pathan."

"Well, Yusuf wanted the contract for supplying transport camels, and came to me about it. Wanted to know what backshish he could give the Colonel to win his heart. Did you ever hear of such a thing? Fancy his trying to work Squeaks that way. They do it among themselves, you know; everybody's got to have his dustoor—so he thought it was only a question of finding out the Colonel's fancy.

"Lutyens, who came up with the regiment, was with me, and we pulled old Yusuf's leg no end of a time, quizzing him as to what he had to give the Colonel. At last he mentioned that he had a fighting ram, the best between Sibi and Cabul.

"By Jove! you should have seen Lutyens jump at that. He swore the Colonel was just dying to have a fighting ram; that he was a great sportsman, and reveled in that sort of thing—lived on it. I must say that I backed the Major up—I had to.

"'You'll get anything you want,' Lutyens told Yusuf, 'only bring the ram in.'

"Fancy Squeaks fighting rams—it's unholy. His aunt, or somebody, wouldn't like it.

"We put the other fellows on to the 'good thing,' and in the end Yusuf was coached properly. Also we worked the Colonel—stuffed him. It was as good as a ballet, or a brush up in the hills. The fellows came out of hospital to play the new game that was on.

"The Colonel, you know, had been down in Burma, or China, or some other heathen country, with his regiment, and when they were sent up here to relieve the Tenth, neither he nor any of the others knew a word of this Pathan kuhr—Pushtu is like dummy talk to them. Of course he had passed in the thing at home, the lingo we all went through—Urdu, they call it, I think; but here it seems to be Pushtu, sheep-talk, and Persian mixed. When Squeaks thinks he's telling them to clear out they come and sit in his lap.

"We squared his kruni (interpreter). He's a Bengali Baboo, and is afraid of everything but rupees. Lutyens frightened him to death—swore he'd ride Shahzada over him by accident if he didn't make proper talk when Yusuf brought in the lambkin.

"One day Yusuf and three other brawny Afghans turned up, with the dirt of twoscore years thick upon the lot of them. Cracky! but they were fierce-looking: jezails, jade-handled knives the length of your arm, and all the rest of their cut-throat tools. With them came the ram, of course. He was short-clipped, and gorgeous in many colors—painted up for the occasion.

"'Diplomacy is the racket,' said Lutyens; 'play Squeaks on that.'

"You see, the Colonel has a hobby that if we can humor these natives we sha'n't have to fight them. It'll be a beastly hole to live in if that ever comes about; we'd soon die off if there was no fighting to be had.

"The Old Man held a regular durbar; for the Baboo explained that Yusuf was one of the Khan of Kelat's small chiefs, and that he wanted to make friendship with the English for his tribe. His people lived somewhere up in the Bolans near Kirta.

"They ate salt together, and touched palms with a rupee, and things went on swimmingly.

"Yusuf couldn't understand a word the Colonel said, and the Afghan's bakt was all Greek to Squeaks. Lutyens had his eye on the kranî, who was interpreting after a fashion—you know Lutyens' eye; it's like a cocked pistol—so we were on velvet.

"The game was, that Yusuf had brought in the ram as a peace offering; it was the thing his people prized most on earth—a sort of sacred gift. And so long as the Colonel kept the ram in the regiment, Yusuf's people would look upon us as blood-brothers. It was all Lutyens' doings, I swear.

"At first when the Colonel understood that he was to take the sheep, he bucked at the idea. He hates everything but a cavalry horse, you know, and only likes them because they're useful.

"The funny part of the business was that Yusuf really got the contract for the camels; not on account of the sheep, but because the Colonel thought it a good thing to win over this head man.

"That's how we got the ram," said Teniers. "He simply won't leave the Colonel—hangs around his tent all the time, bunting the orderly. One day he chewed the tops off Squeaks' new boots. He's really kept us alive. And what's odd, the Colonel's got fond of him—we all know that; he's never bunted the Old Man once, only the time he upset him by mistake. He just does as he likes in the regiment; they look upon him as a mascot.

"He's a proper budmash (scoundrel); but what can you expect from a ram that's been brought up among these sons of Belial when he gets into decent society?

"The Sergeants' mess clubbed in and put that silver ring on his horn. They're a scum lot—they looted all the refreshment-rooms coming up from Karachi; but they'd fight for the lamb until they were wiped out, I believe. That's because he's so properly bad; they like it."

I said never a word about the original owners of the ram—it would be a pity to spoil sport. If Yusuf had looted him from the Marris he deserved that camel contract. I even forgave him my ride on the mad Bokharan.

Then we had a week of Sibi dullness; nothing happened, absolutely nothing—only the heat. It was terrific.

The Beluchis in the plain about Sibi went out and tilled their fields, and tended their flocks, and never a hillman swooped down on them. It looked as though the little round towers of defense dotted all over the plain like huge churns might as well be leveled to the ground. The fellows squabbled among themselves, and prayed for strong-hearted infidels to come down and fight them. It was the heat—it took the life out of everything. Even the Khan lay asleep most of the time—he was getting fat.

All week the Colonel had labored most seriously over a letter to the Civil and Military Gazette on the necessity for higher diplomatic knowledge among military officers in command in border districts. He made a strong point of the assertion that "diplomacy was the higher form of applied patience." He always wrote with a tight grip on the pen, and his mouth twisted to one side. That's a proper military man's attitude—it's like sword play.

Incidentally, the ram mixed up with the Colonel's epic. Tuesday while he was sweating over an intricate paragraph that wouldn't go right anyhow, the Khan stalked Lutyens' fox-terrier, and shikarried him into the Colonel's tent. The table was upset, and three pages of the manuscript floated in ink. The profanity was awful. It frightened even the Khan, and he didn't show up for a day.

When the Old Man finished the article Thursday he had writers' cramp and a stiff neck. Friday the ram nibbled the letter out of his tunic pocket, as it lay on a chair, and ate it. The orderly saw him just finishing the "Yours truly, Diplomat."

Now patience was a good thing to write about in an article on diplomacy; but when it came to having a week's work chewed up by a bilious ram it was a little too much for human nature, and the Colonel's language was terrific; also he battered the ram.

All Saturday we laughed over this, for it leaked out. That night Nawaz Khan chevied a bowl of lettuce that was on Major Lutyens' dinner-table; and the four of us who were to have dined with him had to go and borrow a scrap meal from different sections of the camp. It cost Lutyens twenty-five rupees for new dishes; to say nothing of two wasted bottles of Simpkin opened on the ram's horns.

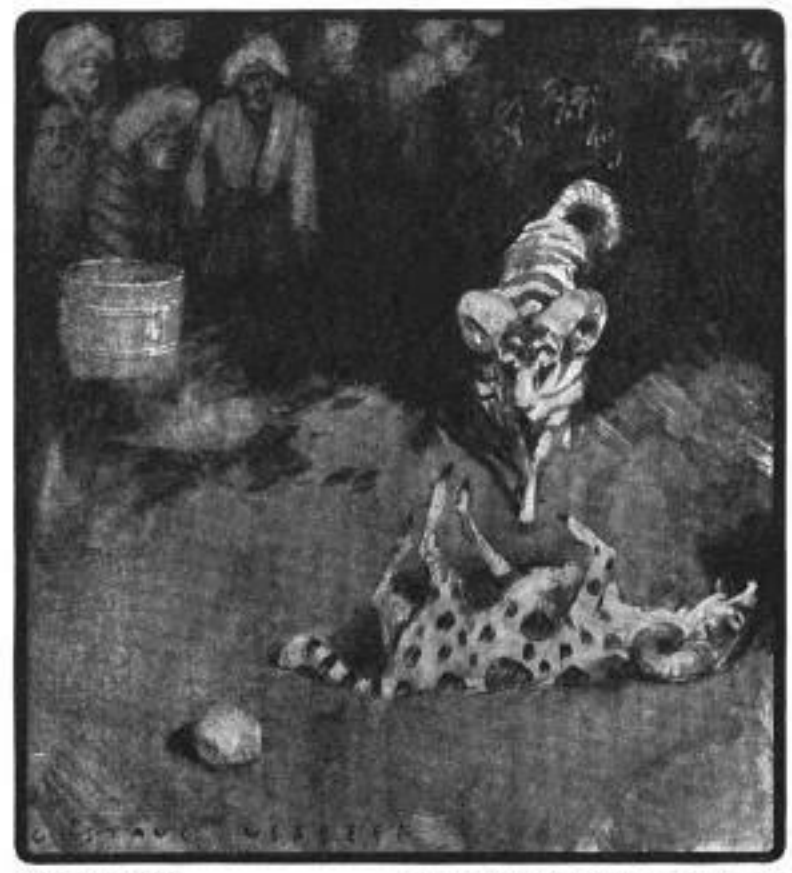
Monday joy reigned in the regiment. "The route" was out for a detachment of two companies. Where they were going nobody knew, only the Colonel. Something was on up in the hills. It couldn't be a fight, with only two companies called; it must be political. However, it was a move; and Lutyens and Teniers, who were going, were full of it.

By daylight Tuesday morning the men were on the march; and by noon the broad, flat surface of the Sibi Pat (desert) had swallowed them up; there was only a glinting mirage where they had gone off toward the northeast. They were heading straight for the Marris hills.

A feeling of misgiving came over me when I realized that they were going toward the Marris Pass, for the ram had gone with them.

At sunrise, Thursday, bright, glinting flashes struck our camp, thrown from the hills to the east. It was a heliograph signal. It read:

> "Surrounded by tribesmen fifteen miles up the Pass. Hard pressed. Send reënforcements."



An answer was flashed back that we'd leave immediately, and soon the remainder of the regiment was streaming across the Pat, with two seven-pounders and a Gatling.

This is what had happened in the meantime.

After they had gone about five miles, the Colonel suddenly discovered that Nawaz Khan was complacently marching with the transport. The Old Man swore like a trooper. "Curse the brute!" he exclaimed, "am I never going to get away from that ram!" But the fellows fancied he was really pleased that the Khan had stuck to them. It was too late to turn him back, so he and the orderly plodded along together.

When they got among the hills, the natives came into the camp friendly enough. At first there were a few of them. They talked to the Colonel through the kranî, and though the latter was a little mixed on their bakt, he understood just enough to exchange the courtesies.

But the minute they got their eye on the ram, things changed. They soon slipped away; but our fellows didn't know that it had anything to do with the Khan—they didn't know he had been looted from the Marris.

—FINALLY THE KHAN WAS SMASHED TO THE EARTH BY A GLANCING BLOW

At the next halt, farther up in the hills, quite a large body of tribesmen came in and had a palaver. Our fellows had seen them hovering about on the line of march. The Baboo couldn't explain four annas of what they said; but it was easy to see they were demanding the ram.

Then the Old Man's liking for the beast cropped up. "It was infernal cheek," he called it. "The ram was the regiment's mascot—it would be like giving up the colors. Never! he'd fight them first. If it were a sort of toll they were levying he'd pay something for the sake of peace rather than have a tamasha."

He ordered the Baboo to give the chief, Afzul ul Mulk, fifty rupees. The latter tucked the bag of silver in his belt, and sat on his haunches sullenly.

"What is he waiting for?" asked the Colonel.

"He wants the ram, sir."

This brought the Colonel to the end of his diplomatic tether—his choler got up, and he ordered the Marris to clear out. They went, and the troops lost sight of them.

Toward noon, as the detachment marched along the track which led over a dry watercourse up to a narrow slit in the hills, they were suddenly fired upon from in front. The hills on either side of the Pass were thronged with white-turbaned tribesmen who were sniping at the troops with long rifles.

The Colonel's men returned the fire, but most of the bullets only spatted against the rock-cover the hillmen crouched behind. "Phut! phut!" went the guns on the hillside; "p-ing-g! spit! spat!" came the leaden pills from every side, for the Pathans were closing up in the rear also. The men were in a trap.

"We've got to get out of this, and make a stand on higher ground, sir," said Lutyens.

Then the men charged up one side of the valley, and drove the Marris from the top of a hill at the point of the bayonet. It was hot work. Lutyens got a bullet in his arm, and half a dozen men dropped in the valley. There was no time to get them; they lay there under the cross-fire, as well as eight or ten of the Pathans.

It looked like bad business, and the hills all around simply swarmed with tribesmen who kept up a dropping fire. It didn't do much harm, the range was too great; but the troops were surrounded, and it would be hot work getting out. The Marris saw they had our fellows trapped, and played a waiting game. There were hundreds of them; the hills were alive. Teniers and Sergeant Flynn volunteered to slip through the enemy that night and bring up reënforcements.

They took a heliograph with them because they could signal from the foothills in the morning, saving a twenty-mile tramp, and get word to the regiment quicker. They stole out in the darkness, and the men waited, not knowing whether they got through or not.

All night the tribesmen kept up a spitting fire—just enough to make rest impossible. That was their game—to keep the small troop hemmed in, and worry them to death.

Our fellows knew what it meant—water. The hill was like an ash heap—as dry. The water bottles wouldn't fight the heat for twenty-four hours; another twenty-four and they would parch up and choke. The men of Allah on the hills knew that, too.

Of course, if Teniers didn't get through, and the balance of the regiment didn't turn up, the detachment would have to fight its way out. It would be at terrible cost—probably not a man would get through alive. They hadn't a field gun with them—nothing but their rifles; so they couldn't shell the enemy from their path. This was a serious mistake; but the Colonel had evidently started out on a political mission, and considered guns an impediment to rapid travel. So they prayed hard that Teniers or the sergeant might get through.

They expected the natives to rush them just before daylight, but there was no attack—nothing but the wearing fire, the dribbling in of bullets, to keep them on edge.

The wounded and dead lay between the two forces. Once our men tried to slip down to bring in their wounded, but were driven back; twice the tribesmen crept down, but were repulsed with a stiff volley—their mission was throat-cutting.

In the morning it was seen that the Marris had been at work during the night. Two stone sangars had been thrown up within fair range of our men; but Lutyens had also constructed a barricade, so honors were even.

About nine o'clock half-a-dozen Marris came down with a white flag—they wanted to pick up the wounded. Our fellows were glad of the chance of a truce, and the poor chaps who had lain out all night were brought in.

While this was going on, another party of eight or ten came in with a white flag also; and with them was a gigantic ram, close-clipped, and with all the glory of war paint on his strong-ribbed sides and muscular quarters. The Baboo unearthed from their muddy vocabulary that they wanted to fight the Khan.

"They're a rum lot," said Lutyens, with his arm in a sling; "while they've got us hemmed in here, and hope to starve us out, they want to put in the time pleasantly by holding sports. But it will delay matters anyway, and give Teniers a chance. If he'd been captured we'd have heard about it, I think—he must have got through.

"We'll fight them with the ram, won't we, sir?" he said to the Colonel. "It'll keep things back. We'll mark time as long as we can—I'll swear the ram has just been fed, and hold the fight off for a couple of hours till he's in good condition. He's too fat to fight anyway—the other fellow'll do him up; their brute's as fit as a fiddle."

So with the aid of the Baboo the thing was explained, in a fashion, and the fight held off until after dinner; the visitors, who were probably selecting the individual throats they meant to slit when they had persuaded our men to surrender their rifles later on, were fed with profuse hospitality.

It was a fine diplomatic play all round. Afzul Mulk reasoned that they were helping to eat up the provisions the troops had to subsist upon, therefore they would be starved into surrender the sooner. The Colonel and his officers hoped that Teniers had escaped, and if they could delay matters with the aid of the ram long enough, the relieving force would pop in on the flank of the enemy with a machine gun or two, and save the situation.

The hillmen were receiving reënforcements all the time. They were a fine lot of blackguards, these Marris; they ate cheerily with our fellows, and viewed critically the commissariat they hoped to be placed in command of by the help of Allah and much thirst.

Lutyens, who had taken charge of the fighting arrangements, delayed bringing out the Khan as long as he dared. At last, about two o'clock, he concluded he had reached the limit; the visitors were muttering impatiently.

A sharp lookout was kept to prevent a surprise, and the tamasha started. The Khan was full of it. Fighting in the camp at Sibi had been stupid play; nothing fought back—here was the sport of his lambhood. The Marris ram was keen as a fox-terrier, too.

When they came together in the first round it was like the bursting of a shrapnel; but it was only a feeler evidently. They backed off a little farther next time, and with short, jerky pig-jumps banged into each other. The flint horns cracked sharp and clear in the still mountain air.

As the sound went echoing up the cañons of the hills the tribesmen cheered with joy—it was a fight after their own hearts. The whole camp warmed to the fun; the Colonel was the most excited man in the detachment.

Lutyens was new to the game, and didn't handle his ram right. One of the tribesmen, who had been watching the Khan with loving eye, jumped up and begged, with much pantomime, to be given charge of the detachment ram.

"Let him handle him!" cried the Colonel; "we've got to win, or they'll take it as an omen that they're going to beat us."

The Pathan almost cried for joy when he put his strong fingers in the Khan's whiskers. He laid his swarthy face against the ram's Roman nose, and the sheep knew him. It was Rahat Shah, the Khan's rightful owner; but our chaps didn't know that. They backed the rams amongst themselves. Afzul, the head man of the Marris, drew forth the Colonel's fifty rupees he had tucked in his belt, and gave Squeaks to understand he wanted to gamble on the fight. Jove! if the Colonel didn't take him up! Nobody had ever seen him make a bet in his life before.

The Khan's new handler played fair—played to win. Lutyens watched him close; but he didn't need that. He was a proper sportsman—they're all that. He gave the Khan a chance to get his wind; delayed each round as long as he could. That was what our fellows wanted.

The Khan was a bit the stronger, an' at first got a lead over the other chap; but the hawk-eyes of the natives had sized up the situation pretty well. They knew that our ram was fat, inside and out, and would tire after a bit. Their ram was as hard as nails; everything in their country is, men and all. He was like a fighting boar—gaunt and rough; all muscle and pluck, with horns of steel.

The Khan's charges became perceptibly less fierce; he wavered a little as they came together like rocks in an avalanche. His hind quarters drooped after each crash.

"This comes of you juniors always stuffing the beast with sugar or some cursed thing!" squeaked the Colonel. "You've spoiled one of the best fights ever was."

What with preliminaries, and rests between rounds, and hard fighting, the battle lasted over an hour, when finally the Khan was smashed to the earth by a glancing blow that slipped from his horns and tore along his thick neck. He'd had enough—he knew that. Not for his old master even, not for anything, would he face the music again. The tribesmen had won.

The visitors sprang to their feet and cheered the wild battle-cry of the Pathan. Up, up the hills it went, caught up and echoed from throat to throat—hundreds of them—until the whole range rang with the pean of victory. It was impressive. Our men were awed. It was like a foreboding of disaster.

The Colonel quietly handed over the rupees to Afzul. The Marris squatted on their haunches again; and Lutyens, to show that there was no ill-will, ordered hot coffee served to them.

Rahat Shah, who had handled the Khan, got him on his feet, and started to lead him over to the little group of squatted tribesmen.

The Colonel interfered. "Take the ram away from that chap," he ordered. "I believe they're trying to walk him off."

The orderly took the Khan from the Marris and put him over with our men. Rahat Shah was astonished—indignant. He hustled the orderly a little, and there was a bit of a scuffle at first; but the ram was taken away from the persistent tribesmen.

The sitting Marris muttered among themselves and commenced to move about restlessly. Afzul was energetically trying to explain something to the Baboo.

"What's the matter?" asked the Colonel. "What does he say?"

"Not understanding his talk, sir," replied the Baboo. "His talk not of my country, therefore not understanding proper. He wanting the sheep, sir, I think."

"That's rich," retorted the Colonel; "dash his eyes! I suppose they think because the ram's beaten we won't keep him. Tell them, if you can, with my salaams, that if they want him real bad, they can come and take him in their usual zabardasti way—there'll be a few dead Mussulmans before they get him, though. But don't hurry it, Baboo—keep them as long as you can. I'd like to hear the music of a Gatling on their flank over there."

Now the Baboo loved to talk—all Baboos do; but the Marris didn't want talk; it was the ram they were after. Besides, they hated a Baboo worse than they did the cursed Feringees, the British.

When they saw they were getting more Baboo talk than ram, they exchanged a few fierce, hot words among themselves, standing defiantly erect, then turned away, anger flipping from every fold of their loose dress, and marched sullenly down the hill, across the valley, and up where crouched their fellows.

"Gad! they're mad," said the Colonel. "Wonder what it's all about. We'll get pepper now; get ready for them, Major."

Below, the valley was silent. The dead had been turned under the rubble of earth and broken stone, and the wounded brought into the lines. The sun was almost dipping behind the peaks in the west.

With set faces the men waited for the bloodthirsty rush that would come surely: either that, or the hiss of a shrapnel coming up the valley from the relief. Which would come first? It was time for the reinforcement, if Teniers had escaped.

They could see the tribesmen creeping closer down from the surrounding hills—drawing the death circle nearer.

"Reserve your fire," said the Colonel sternly. "Give it to them when you can smell them. We'll make as good a fight as the ram did, anyway."

"By Jove! they're mad clean through," said Lutyens, as he watched the Pathans through his field glass; "they won't even wait for the dark; and to starve us out is too slow, evidently. There they go—sniping again," as little white puffs of smoke darted out from the hillside like hot breath on a frosty morning, and the "p-s-ing-g" of the singing lead struck on his ears.

Then he swept the valley to the south with the powerful glass. Nothing moved in that direction but the white of a fluttering Marris coat, or the brown of a sheepskin vest.

Lower and lower moved the white circle of the creeping tribesmen. It was like watching the foam-wash of the incoming tide.

"Fix bayonets!" commanded Lutyens; and the shining steel was clicked into place with grim earnestness.

"They don't relish the steel," said Lutyens; "we can give them points at that game anyway." It was a grim joke, for he knew well that numbers would tell in the end; and though they might be driven back once, twice, a dozen times, the Pathan wolves would come again, and again, until every throat was cut.

The foe was down in the valley now, not three hundred yards, and slipping from rock to rock—stalking their white prey.

"When they mass for the rush," said the Major to the men, "we'll give them a volley, and another before they reach us; then it'll be the bayonet against their big knives. Gad! I almost thought—no, it couldn't be. I fancied I heard a bugle; but it's one of their cursed sheep-calls, I suppose."

The Marris were armed with smooth-worn Sniders ("gas pipes") and the long-barreled jezail. More than half of them had nothing but the strong hungry knives that would rip and slash when they had broken the ranks.

Suddenly Afzul was seen to jump on a rock and wave a green and yellow banner. That was the signal for the onslaught. Pandemonium broke loose. Every rock and every hill echoed with a hundred tongues the fanatic Moslem cry.

"They're a noisy lot of beggars," said the Colonel; "just like the Burmese; but they'll fight better, I fancy."

Like a pack of hungry wolves giving cry they started up the ascent.

"Present! steady, men—aim low! fire!" came the commands sharp and clear from the Major.

A red circle of hot, belching fire darted from the black barrels of the Martinis; and the wailing hail swept down the hillside, and the white, rushing line swayed, staggered, trembled for an instant, and then swept on again, closing up the gaps that had been bitten into it by the eager teeth. The Sniders and the jezails vomited back an answer; but the stone barricade grabbed at the bullets, and only three men swayed drunkenly from the wall.

Half-way up the hill the Martinis coughed again; and the second volley plowed deeper and more terribly into the Moslem foe.

Again the line wavered; there was a lull; Afzul's voice could be heard bellowing like a mountain leopard at his hesitating men.

A low moaning shriek came up the valley; there was a crash as a shrapnel burst, and an acre of bullets hissed and screeched as they cut through the air on the charging enemy's flank. "Boo-o-m-m," ponderously came the voice of the screw-gun that had thrown the shell.

"Hurrah! the relief!" cheered Lutyens, his bared sword gleaming. "Give the hounds another volley!"

Down in the valley an English bugle was sounding the charge. "Pb-u-t-t, pb-u-t-t-pb-u-t-t!" a Gatling was chirruping, and "Boo-o-m-m!" a seven-pounder was chorusing. The advancing troops were volley firing, and the white mass of turbaned tribesmen was being rolled back like a war map.

Afzul's men had come too late—the stone wall stared at them stolidly; they broke; and fold on fold the Pathan mass was pushed back, and up through the pass they had come down from.

"Just in time, eh?" panted Teniers, as he galloped up to the detachment.

The relief was complete. It was useless to follow the Marris among the hills without cavalry.

I had gone up with the regiment, and Teniers told me all about the trouble. There was a ton of guilt on my soul; for if I had spoken, had told of the ownership of the ram, all this might have been averted. How was I to break it to the Colonel? I must tell him.

That night at dinner Lutyens suddenly broke in with, "Well, we had two ripping fights to-day."

"Was this the second attack?" queried Teniers.

"No, Nawaz Khan fought the first battle. We had a truce, and the fellows came down with a sheep built like a 'blue bull,' and he did up the Khan in fine shape."

"Why the thunder did they attack you this time, then, if they got the ram?" I asked.

"They didn't get him," said the Colonel simply in his squeaky voice. "We wouldn't give him up."

"Great Scott! sir," I exclaimed; "you've forever blasted the name of the British as true sportsmen. The fundamental principle, sir, governing all ram fights, from Calcutta to Cabul, is that the victor takes the beaten ram."

The Colonel's face turned ashy pale. That he had killed a score or more tribesmen was not the cause, for that had been a fair fight; but that he had done this thing was a disgrace—he saw that.

"More than that," I exclaimed, excited by what had been said, and seizing the opportunity, "the ram belonged to them in the first place. He was the pride of their tribe. Somebody looted him, probably the man who brought him into the regiment—Yusuf."

"How do you know that, sir?" gasped the Colonel.

I explained.

"What shall we do—what shall we do?" moaned the Colonel helplessly.

"Jove!" exclaimed Lutyens, "we must put this right. We can't have these beggars taking us for a lot of welchers. They fought game enough—and they were in the right, too."

As atonement I offered to find Afzul the next day and explain matters.

I did. Taking Teniers and a white flag, I followed up the tribesmen, and found Afzul. I explained it all.

We had trounced them, we were in force, and he realized that what I said must be true. No white man could have stolen the Khan—it must have been Yusuf.

He accompanied me back to the camp. The Khan was turned over to him, and a good indemnity paid for the dead tribesmen, for we were undoubtedly in the wrong.

"You may go through my country," said Afzul. "The fight was a good one."

WHEN THE REGIMENTS MARCH AWAY

By Frank L. Stanton

WHAT do the war-drums say
When the regiments march away
Under the old red, white and blue,
Whose blown stripes ripple "Farewell" to you—
To the tear-dimmed eyes and the hearts so true;
What do the war-drums say?

"Over the world away,
To the wrath and red o' the fray,
Go bayonets and blades
Of the gallant brigades,
From patriot-mothers and loved, fair maids;
Away! away! to the crimson fray;
And the boys will be back some day!"

What do the war-drums say
When the regiments march away
Where the trampled fields of the world are red
With the life-rain over the green turf shed,
And the drooped, torn flags enfold the dead—
What do the war-drums say?

"Under the crimson bars,
Under the storm-swept stars,
Far from the mothers and maids that weep
O'er the reddened harvest their hearts must reap,
In the love of their country they sleep—they sleep!
And away! away! to the crimson fray;
And the boys will be back some day!"

So do the war-drums say
Where the swords are keen to slay.
But what of the life-blood that falls like dew?
"It has crimsoned the stripes of the flag for you,
And given the stars to its heaven of blue!"
So do the war-drums say.

Business Methods for Our Cities

MAYOR THOMAS GORDON HAYES, of Baltimore, and Mayor James Duval Phelan, of San Francisco, are attracting more interest from the students and friends of good municipal government than the executives of any other cities in the United States. It is not only due to the fact that they are both men of unusual force and capacity, but that they are inaugurating new city charters which contain many of the reforms for which good citizens have been fighting these many years. In each case the charter seeks to divorce absolutely the municipal affairs from all other politics. The municipal elections are on different dates from all other elections. There are other points of similarity between the two instruments.

The Baltimore Mayor has a four-year term at $6000 the year; the Second Branch of the City Council confirms the Mayor's appointments, and the president of this branch, who receives $3000 the year, fills the office of Mayor in case of absence or sickness of the Mayor. It requires a three-fourths vote to override the Mayor's veto. The business of the city is rigidly systematized, and all appropriations have to be passed upon by the Board of Estimates, which is composed of the heads of the main departments. The annual budget, when sent to the City Council, may be decreased, but it cannot be increased under the law. In every board or commission, minority representation is mandatory.

Mr. Hayes, the present Mayor, is between fifty and sixty years of age, and is one of the most distinguished lawyers of Maryland. He has served in the Legislature, where his vigorous independence won him reputation. He was a soldier in the Confederate war, and then a college professor, afterward studying law. His campaign last May was fought on reform lines, and he got a large share of the independent Republican vote.

The new San Francisco charter is one of the most radical ever adopted by an American city. It provides for civil service reform and economical government. The legislative body has power to raise money by taxation, but no authority to spend it, that power being reposed almost entirely in the boards appointed by the Mayor. The feature of the law, as in other recent charters, is in concentrating responsibilities in the Mayor, who has absolute powers of appointment and removal. One new feature is that on the petition of fifteen per cent. of the qualified electors any question may be submitted to the people.

Mayor Phelan is a capitalist, and is about thirty-nine years of age. He was a commissioner of the World's Fair, and was once president of the famous Bohemian Club of San Francisco. He is now serving his third term as Mayor.

PUTTING A CITY ON A BUSINESS BASIS

By Thomas G. Hayes, Mayor of Baltimore

I HAVE been Mayor of Baltimore about three months. I was elected on the regular Democratic ticket over the regular nominee of the Republican party by a majority of about 9000 votes. Baltimore had been, for the four years preceding, under the administration of two Republican Mayors. In the speeches on the hustings before my election and in the inaugural address I promised to the people of Baltimore a business administration. I have tried thus far to keep, and I think I have succeeded in keeping, my promises.

After entering upon the duties of Mayor I made a careful examination of the list of municipal employees and found a number of unnecessary office-holders; I also discovered that the salaries of a number of the necessary employees was much more than was paid for similar service in private employment. With the coöperation of a most excellent City Council, I have succeeded in abolishing all the unnecessary offices, and reducing the salaries to the standard of pay for similar service in private employment.

I also promised to put the fire department of the city under the civil service system, so that every one employed in this department should in future be taken from an eligible list, prepared by an examining board, and that the terms and tenures of all these employees should be for life, efficiency and good behavior. Every man in this department was to know that the retention of his position was solely dependent upon good and faithful service, and that neither politics nor political service had anything whatever to do with his appointment or his retention in the public service. An ordinance has been framed since I became Mayor, and approved, placing the fire department, as above explained, on the merit system, and out of the reach of politics or politicians.

When I became Mayor the appropriation for the year 1900 was pending before the City Council, but not passed. The ordinance of estimates, as it is called, was critically examined by a committee of the City Council and myself, and we succeeded in reducing the annual budget for expenditures for this year nearly one-half million dollars. This reduction did not cripple the public service, but simply reduced, in the different municipal departments, unnecessary expenditures. This recital is given simply to show what a body of courageous and firm city officials may accomplish when they are determined to give a business administration to municipal affairs.

Politics can be eliminated from municipal government, as it should be, by firm and faithful executive and legislative municipal officials. If anybody denies this, I give the above accomplished facts in Baltimore's history to refute the denial. This is but the beginning in Baltimore toward a business administration. One result already accomplished is a reduction of taxes; we hope to reduce the taxes from two dollars in the hundred dollars to one dollar and seventy-five cents in the hundred.

It may be interesting to learn how these reforms have been accomplished. In my efforts I had to contend with the combined political influence of both parties, which were united in their opposition. This opposition tried to work under cover. I fortunately knew from my experience in public life the mode and manner of the workings of the professional politicians, and thereby was prepared to know and resist their attack. My vulnerable point was the City Council. To guard this body against the attempts and attacks of these enemies of the public welfare I personally took charge of, and made myself the sentry over, the legislative department of our city government, and to their credit the members of the City Council met the assault like true and brave men, and came off victorious.

There was another great advantage we had. My administration of Baltimore was the first under the new charter passed by the Legislature in 1898. This organic act, I may be permitted to say, although as a member of the Charter Commission I helped to write it, greatly aided us. It is the best legal enactment that ever emanated from a legislature for the government of large cities. We were enabled to get so admirable a City Council because this new charter took municipal elections away from National and State elections. This provision divorced, in a measure, politics from municipal elections, and both parties, in order to get the votes of the voters who vote for the best men, were forced to nominate their very best men.

Our municipal election in May, 1899, was fought on the issue of good municipal government, and the Democratic nominees got votes of Republicans and Independents because they thought their nominees were the best men. If the election had been held in November, party issues involved in the other candidates running for National or State offices would have been involved, and, irrespective of the fitness of the nominees, the party whip would have been used.

This party coercion was tried in our municipal election in May, but to no effect. If the good people of our large cities want their municipal government taken out of politics and run on business principles, they should divorce municipal elections from National and State elections, and send for a copy of the new charter of Baltimore and get their Legislature to pass its duplicate for the government of their own cities. I shall be glad to send a copy to any one.

I am determined, as Mayor, to continue my efforts in behalf of better methods in municipal government. I shall appoint the very best men to office, men who are truly in accord with my policy. They will be both Democrats and Republicans. No politics shall enter a single department if I can prevent it. The responsibility, by our new charter, is on me as Mayor, and I propose to exert my best efforts to wisely meet the responsibility and give to the people of my city a good municipal government.

I shall be always rigorously opposed by the professional politicians of both parties, but I have the hearty support of the best thinking people of my city. I feel confident I shall accomplish something toward improving municipal government. In pursuing this policy I am none the less a Democrat. I am attached to the principles of government as enunciated by the founders of my party, and I feel that I cannot serve my party better than by striving to give to the people a non-partisan business municipal government.

MAKING CORPORATIONS PAY TAXES

By James D. Phelan, Mayor of San Francisco

THE street railway, electric light, gas and water companies for a long time escaped their just burden of taxation. They paid only on their tangible property, and hence was the anomalous condition of their stocks and bonds selling in the market for ten times as much as the sworn value of their property as returned by the assessor. When they desired rates fixed upon the valuation of their investment, they would insist upon the high valuation being accepted as the basis, and when they were called upon to make their statement to the assessor, they would challenge him to find any more property than was represented in plant and roadway.

Then our cities bethought themselves of franchise taxation, because the value of the franchise was manifestly the difference between the value of the plant and the selling price of the stocks and bonds on the market. A country assessor adopted this rule of determining values and the Supreme Court upheld it in the case of the City Gas Company vs. January (California Reports). The rule is that the value of the franchise for the purposes of taxation is the difference between the assessed value of the tangible property and the market price of the stocks and bonds of the corporation. Under this rule San Francisco added over $20,000,000 to its assessment roll last year.

The franchise to use the streets, in the matter of street railways, is practically an exclusive one. Without such a franchise the plant would be of no value whatever. Therefore the franchise becomes the essential and valuable asset of the company. By assessing the franchise according to this flexible rule there is nothing arbitrary in the valuation put upon it, because the stock market, with its fluctuations caused by competition or by increased earnings, fixes the value. If competition drives the company hard, its shares go down in price, and its assessment is correspondingly diminished; if the city grows, and the traffic on the road increases, the shares appreciate, and the company adds to the city's revenues. If the city regulates the car-fares, reducing them, or travel diminishes, the shares will go down, and the city loses in its revenues derived from franchise taxation, and gains by giving cheaper service to the people. The same is true of gas, electric light, water and telephone companies.

In California no exclusive franchise can be granted to a water or artificial lighting company—that is to say, any one filing a bond for the restoration of the street has a right granted by the Constitution of laying pipes and mains and conduits. We call this a Constitutional franchise. If there be no competition it is worth more, and if there be competition it is worth less, and the market determines its value from time to time. In California, and especially in San Francisco, the great corporations in the past have not paid their fair share of taxation, but now they are being put upon the same level with other property owners, and within a few years there will be a complete equalization of assessments.

The corporations have until recent years dominated every branch of the city government, but they have been overthrown in this city in several popular elections, and an endeavor will be made to overthrow their supremacy in the State. The State Board of Equalization, consisting of three members elected by districts, and the State Controller, assess the value of all railways operating in more than one county, and apportion to each county its share, according to the track mileage. This board is controlled by the railway corporations, and with increased mileage they have actually reduced assessed values, which are altogether out of proportion to the value of the stocks and bonds of the railway corporations. The people must control the Board of Equalization in order to apply the rule which I have described, and which is in vogue largely in cities and towns.

Another excellent effect of this rule is at once apparent: that it discourages the fictitious issuance of stocks and bonds, and prevents inflation. It has a tendency to preserve real values, which is a safeguard to the investing public as well as to patrons and consumers, and prevents jobbery and fraud in public utilities.

Three Hundred Thousand Miles with Henry Ward Beecher

By Major J. B. Pond

IN MANY a group of ministers in nearly every large city in this country have I seen Mr. Beecher standing as a father, giving and receiving blessings. When he left churches and halls where he had been preaching and lecturing, crowds always surged around him, accosting him in grateful words, asking to shake hands with him, and cheering him loudly as he drove away.

Episcopalians, Congregationalists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists, Unitarians, Universalists, Jews and Catholics, all mixed in the crowds and seemed equally anxious to do him honor.

In his private conversation his speech was as perfect in quality of thought, in richness of illustration, and in precision of statement as were his public utterances. This is true of only one other man that I have ever known, and that man, Wendell Phillips, was the least like him of all orators of his day. One could spend a day in converse with either of these men, then listen to the lecture or sermon, and feel that the conversation was fully equal, if not superior, to the speech. I am bound to say from our long and intimate acquaintance that I believe Mr. Beecher's best things have been said in private.

PUBLIC SPIRIT IN THE PULPIT

Perhaps nothing more significant of his sympathy with society at large can be shown than the promptness with which he accepted an offer of Chaplaincy by the Thirteenth Regiment of the National Guard, through its commander, Colonel Austen. In January, 1878, the tender was made and accepted.

As usual, Mr. Beecher's action was canvassed and criticised in Plymouth Church, whereupon at a Friday evening prayer-meeting he said: "I did not accept, as you may readily suppose, because I had nothing to do, and because I wanted to fill up vacant time. It was not because I had any special military gifts, or that any special military proclivities led me to delight in such position. I was as much surprised as any one could be when the request was made by Colonel Austen, and I was informed that it was the unanimous wish of the officers of the regiment that I should accept the place. The first impulse I felt on receiving the invitation was to say No, but the second impulse was in the nature of a query, whether there was not some duty there. The question was not exactly, 'Should you accept the place?' but rather, 'Why should you not accept it?'"

Mr. Beecher's presence was always the occasion of a warm reception along the entire line of march when the regiment paraded.

A PAGE FROM MR. BEECHER'S FARM DIARY

His Peekskill home was his earthly paradise, and every laborer upon it, every animal, almost every insect, had its place in his heart; for that was the wonder of his greatness, that the smallest and the least shared his love and sympathy.

His delight in Nature was deep, continuous, and sometimes rapturous.

He kept a farm diary, which was picked up from among the rubbish after the family had moved away. It contained entries at different periods each summer, from the time he went to Peekskill until the autumn before his death. There were two books, bound in calf, full of entries in his own hand. It was a complete directory of the farm. Here are a few of the many hundred entries:

"June 12, 1867. Some pale maple leaves are already letting go. A few descended before my window this morning. One of them stuck into the grass stem first, and quivered in a way that would make you think it was a bird. This is the very beginning of summer, and before trees have fairly got on their summer robes they begin contribution to death.

"July 5. Bobolink sang to-day. Bluebirds, none. Robins, larks, wren, yet songful. Woodrobin, some.

"July 18, 1867. Woodthrush still vocal last night; heard it when on compound road; also in Killendgrass Wood. First new potatoes yesterday.

"July 26. Woodrobin still sings. Second brood on corner robins coming off. Rain thus far abundant.

"August 3. Vireo, song-sparrow, meadow-lark, house-wren. For two days robin song ceased. Woodthrush have not heard for two days. On twenty-ninth of July the last cut hay come again.

"August 6, 1867. Heard to-day the first yellow-hammer of the season, and also half a song of the robins, and only in snatches. Sparrow still sings. Wren silent. Sparrow yet quite vocal, and bluebirds flying in air give their soft and tender song.

"October 3, 1867. Yesterday was particularly full of birds that seem to be traveling through on their way south. Bluebirds lisped their gentle and most ladylike notes, robins flew in threes and fives, high in the air. Heard a yellow-hammer and meadow-lark sing. To-night no sound but the melodious cricket, whose gurgle is far more agreeable than the hard and grating sounds of katydid and locust.

"August 2, 1872. Robin silent for a week. Occasional note yet from woodthrush. Finches, sparrows and linnets vocal. Young brood of thrushes hatched and now flying near hickory trees. The robin is the most powerful of all singers; his voice leads all, and constitutes four-fifths of the sound in summer mornings.

"1881. After a faithful service of twenty-three years Thomas James Turner departed this life Wednesday, January 5, 1881, and was buried from my house, with service also in the Episcopal Church in Peekskill, where he had long been a communicant, and with Masonic honors, Saturday, January 8, 1881. He was, according to the measure of his gifts, an upright, faithful and trustworthy man, who served not for lucre. I should be glad to have his name associated with this place, upon which he lived from about the time I bought it, and who has had a hand in every step in improvements which made it what it is this day."

Editor's Note—This is the second and last of Major Pond's papers on Henry Ward Beecher. The first appeared in The Saturday Evening Post of February 17.

OUR UNOFFICIAL AMBASSADOR TO ENGLAND

In 1863 Mr. Beecher made a single speech in Great Britain—as Oliver Wendell Holmes wrote—but it was delivered in piecemeal in different places. Its exordium was on the ninth of October, in Manchester; its peroration was pronounced on the twentieth of the same month in Exeter Hall, London. The public is more or less familiar with the result of that mission.

After a few months' absence he returned to America, having finished a more remarkable embassy than any envoy who has represented us in Europe since Franklin pleaded the cause of the young Republic at the Court of Versailles. He had no official existence; but through the heart of the people he reached nobles, ministers, courtiers, and the throne itself. He whom the Times attacked, he whom Punch caricatured, was a power in the land. The change of the ruling classes in England, who were strong for the South, was at once manifest. As Mr. Scott, who introduced him in Exeter Hall, told me years later: "You should have been here to witness the effect of that speech as he swayed his enthusiastic audience hither and thither by his convincing arguments and appeal."

I was a soldier at that time, commanding a battalion of cavalry on the frontier of Southwestern Missouri, Kansas and the Indian country, but I read with eagerness of the great achievements of Mr. Beecher in England. We soldiers looked upon Beecher at home as Beecher in the field. He sharpened the swords, ran the bullets, and forged the cannon. His speeches read by the soldiers made Spartans out of the most timid. He inspired, encouraged and electrified as no one else could.

During all our travels and associations together in this country my anxiety and determination to have Mr. Beecher heard again in England became more and more intense. I never could get much encouragement until the spring of 1886, when, after much deliberation and urging by friends, he told me to go ahead. I immediately engaged passage from New York on Saturday morning, June 19. That eventful Friday evening prayer-meeting, the evening before Mr. and Mrs. Beecher sailed, both the lecture-room and auditorium were crowded. When the great overflow asked Mr. Beecher if they could not go into the auditorium, he replied: "No; this is our prayer-meeting room, where we have met on Friday evenings for forty years, and I do not feel like making this evening an exception." The overflow filled the main auditorium with members and friends waiting to say good-by to Mr. and Mrs. Beecher.

HOW PLYMOUTH CHURCH SAW ITS PASTOR OFF

The ship left the wharf at six o'clock on the morning of the nineteenth, her decks crowded with passengers not yet aware of Mr. Beecher's presence; but as he stood almost alone on the forecastle deck, leaning on the rail, his well-known form attracted attention of people on the ferry-boats, and simultaneously the whistles of tugboats and other neighboring craft were sounded in salute.

Over a thousand Plymouth Church people had risen before the sun to pay a farewell tribute to Mr. and Mrs. Beecher by an excursion down the harbor on the steamer Grand Republic.

Before we reached Liberty Island and slowed down, the Grand Republic came alongside, her throng of passengers crowded to the nearer guards, and sent up cheer after cheer.

We passed Sandy Hook at 10:30, and were soon out at sea, bound for England. We found on board baskets, bouquets and banks of flowers. Many friends had sent letters of farewell, and one had provided a basket of homing pigeons with instructions how to send the messages, what birds to fly first, and what others at two and three o'clock. Mr. Beecher wrote messages to his sons and to his friends in various parts of the country, fastened them to the birds according to directions, took the birds in his hands, playfully gave them a parting instruction, and let them fly. They reached their destination in due time.

SOME INCIDENTS OF THE SECOND TRIP TO ENGLAND

On the next Saturday morning at daybreak we awoke off the Irish coast. There was a heavy fog. The fog-whistle was making a horrible din. We could hear voices in the distance, noises of life and commerce. Soon the fog lifted and we saw land. At six o'clock we reached Queenstown. Here many of our passengers disembarked, and here, with the Dublin morning papers, we got letters and telegrams, and countless invitations for Mr. Beecher to dine and to speak and lecture. We saw Gladstone announced to speak in Liverpool the following Monday and decided to remain and hear him. We received letters from Dr. and Mrs. Joseph Parker, Dr. Henry Allon, and a host of others of Mr. Beecher's clerical friends, inviting him to preach, and scores of applications from all parts of the Kingdom for lectures.

We landed in Liverpool at 7:30 in the evening, and were met by delegations from Bradford, Leeds, York, Carnarvon, Manchester, Edinburgh, Belfast, Dublin and other cities. Reporters from the London papers were also in waiting. My fondest dream was realized. And I want to tell something of that experience, because, under some strange journalistic influence, the American newspaper accounts of the trip rather left it to be inferred that there was some lack of success. But let us see.

We spent Sunday, the twenty-seventh, in Liverpool. Mr. Beecher had several invitations to preach, but was obliged to decline all since he had not regained his vigor lost in seasickness. He found his way to some church alone, and sat in a large congregation unrecognized for the first time since he was ordained a minister. In the afternoon many clergymen and many men active in politics called to pay their respects.

The first lecture in England took place in Exeter Hall, London, July 19. It was in the same hall that Mr. Beecher had spoken when last in England, during our American Civil War. I believe there was scarcely a clergyman or minister in the city of London who would have declined the honor to introduce Mr. Beecher on this occasion, but Mr. Beecher said to me on the morning of the lecture: "Pond, when I spoke here in 1863, having hard work to find some one to preside, Mr. Benjamin Scott, Chamberlain of the City of London, volunteered his services. See if you can find him; I want him to take the chair to-night."

I did find him, still Chamberlain of the city. He very modestly referred me to others who he said would gladly preside, and would lend more honor to the occasion than he could. That would not do. I told him that he was Mr. Beecher's choice. He seemed highly complimented, and kindly consented to serve for the second time. The great hall was packed, and when Mr. Scott appeared, the memory of his earlier action still green, the burst of applause which greeted him grew as it continued, the audience finally rising, waving handkerchiefs and cheering.

Mr. Scott referred to the meeting in the hall twenty-three years before. He had never regretted occupying the position filled on that occasion. Now Mr. Beecher had honored him by asking him to be present again.

MR. BEECHER ON ANGLO-SAXON UNION

Mr. Scott sat down, and Mr. Beecher arose and was greeted with deafening applause. He stood silent and impassive, his face seemingly untouched by emotion, as he looked around upon the vast audience. As the applause died away he began to speak, but before he could make himself heard the applause was again repeated, with additional emphasis, if possible, and Mr. Beecher was obliged to wait for it to cease. Then, in a strong voice that reverberated around the hall, he recalled the previous meeting. "A long lapse of time in a man's life," he said, "and such lapses give solidity to a man's opinion; they also give sagacity."

He was not surprised at the view some people took of America; they did not know the facts. "America is the younger tree, but the acorn from which it sprang fell from the English oak. Americans are of English lineage and blood. If England is not proud of America, why, then the latter will make her so"—a remark which aroused much applause. The lecture—that one on the Reign of the Common People, which so many thousands of Americans have heard with pleasure (and no two audiences ever heard alike)—occupied nearly two hours in delivery, and was frequently interrupted by applause and cheers.

THE WELCOME OF ALL DENOMINATIONS

Mr. Beecher preached his first sermon in London on Sunday, July 4, 1886, in City Temple, whose pastor was the Rev. Dr. Joseph Parker. The congregation were admitted by ticket—church members first, then the public, to the capacity of the auditorium. Hundreds, and I may say thousands, came who had to be turned away. That week the religious and secular press teemed with praise for the great American preacher. Every daily paper in London had some kindly notice of him. It is not usual in England for the secular press to notice religious doings, especially those of dissenters, so called. Every denomination has its well-supported organ.

More generous criticism could not have been written than Mr. Beecher received at the hands of the secular and religious press. His sermon was published verbatim, with extended editorial comment.

Sunday, July 11, was an interesting day. Mr. Beecher preached in Union Chapel, Islington, London, for his old friend, the Rev. Dr. Henry Allon, the scholarly representative of the highest class of cultivated, well-educated Congregationalists. There was as great a congregation of intelligent people as I have ever seen. The usual system of first admitting members of the society by ticket was adopted exclusively up to a certain hour. Then the doors were thrown open to the public, and the large auditorium was immediately packed to its utmost capacity. As great a throng outside was unable to get in.

THE VISIT TO WESTMINSTER ABBEY

After service, and dinner with Doctor and Mrs. Allon, Mr. Beecher and I, by invitation of Dean Bradley, visited Westminster Abbey, where a number of clergymen of the Church of England were gathered to meet him in the parlors of the Deanery. Tea was served, and the Dean invited Mr. Beecher through the various historical private rooms about the Abbey. Dean Stanley's library and desk were just as when he died. Incidents and anecdotes of their late friend were exchanged between the Dean and Mr. Beecher. The clergymen listened to the dialogue as though fearing to lose a word. As Mr. Beecher entered the Jerusalem Chamber he said:

"I am struck with awe. No room has greater interest to me, unless it be the 'Upper Room.'"

He recalled with remarkable rapidity and correctness the many religious events that had taken place there—the Westminster Assembly and Confession of Faith, the two revisions of the Bible, etc.—and the eminent and scholarly men brought up within the very gates of that sanctuary listened with intense interest to his eloquent exposition of what must have seemed their own peculiar province of history.

The affection and respect with which Mr. Beecher was greeted by English clergymen—those of the Establishment as well as Non-Conformists—was very marked.

The Dean of Canterbury said to Mr. Beecher himself:

"There is one thing, Mr. Beecher, for which we must all thank you, and that is for what you have taught us of the Fatherhood of God."

When Mr. Beecher went (in 1886) through England and Scotland he was hailed on every side by ministers who bore the most grateful testimony to the happy influence which his ministry had exercised upon their spiritual lives. Many of these men, too, had seen and heard him in America.

Doctor Howson, the Dean of Chester, and joint author with Conybeare of the scholarly and famous Life of St. Paul, came to Plymouth Church to see the man and hear the voice whose printed words had been so much to him. I accompanied him to Plymouth Church. We went home with Mr. Beecher, and they had a delightful time together; and on his return to England he sent one of his books in return for one Mr. Beecher had given him, inscribed, "For gold I give thee brass."

I must make a special allusion to the meeting with the theological students in City Temple on Friday morning, October 15. There were about 600 of the students to whom Mr. Beecher was to talk. The remaining seats in the Temple were set aside for ministers and clergymen of all denominations, college professors and visitors, who were admitted on presentation of their personal cards. These were taken up at the door at my request, and I now have the cards of 618 ministers, who, in addition to the students and professors, thronged the meeting, notwithstanding that the rain descended in torrents.

It was estimated by the pastor, Doctor Parker, that nearly 3000 people were present.

Never was Mr. Beecher more elevated in thought, more eloquent in expression, more tender in feeling; and never did I witness a multitude of earnest men more thoroughly filled with Christian joy than on this occasion.

That was a never-to-be-forgotten morning. The address was one of great power—suggestive, reminiscent, witty, full of wisdom and experience; but the great intellectual display came afterward, when he said he would try to answer any question put to him.

A TILT AT ARMS IN THE FIELD OF THEOLOGY

I imagine that of all people to ask uncomfortable and insoluble questions, the young theological student, freshly familiar with all the dogmatic niceties and doubts of the books, is the most troublesome, and Mr. Beecher, who always freely laid himself open by great breadth of statement, was an ideal target for their ingenuity. The first question keyed him up to the keenest enjoyment of the situation. For over half an hour he stood there, alert, excited, but never a more complete master of all his powers, and replied to the questions thrust at him from every side in rapid succession—questions of every conceivable sort, in theory, practice and speculation. His replies were invariably brief, and they came as quickly as a flash of lightning. It seemed as if you could see his mind flash. He was witty, sarcastic, subtle and humorous. His replies, commonly the very essence of common-sense, went to the mark like a bullet. Here is one question from the balcony that turned the laugh on the interlocutor very suddenly: "Mr. Beecher, I am a clergyman. May I beg to ask one question? I have simply to say how very grateful we should be if, as many of us are unable to hear you on Sunday morning, you could preach anywhere within our reach on Sunday evening."

Mr. Beecher, quick as a flash: "I shall be perfectly willing to preach in St. Paul's, or at Westminster, any hour."

"I mean in any chapel in London."

Mr. Beecher: "I am afraid I shall have to carry out my original purpose in that regard. I have been preaching in the chapels in London some time, and should like to try some of the larger buildings."

The last lecture of the tour had been delivered in Dublin. There was much handshaking; the people had got as thoroughly warmed as they dared. Mr. Beecher was jolly and happy as he extended his hand to the hesitating people gathered around him, seemingly wishing and hoping, but scarcely venturing, to approach him. "Come right along," he said; "this is my good-by shake. I am glad to see you."

We rode back to our hotel. To-morrow we would be on our way to America. Mrs. Beecher had supper waiting, and we had our small jokes and enjoyed ourselves. Never were three people more happy. Mr. Beecher reminded me that this was not the first time we had knocked off, a day at a time, a long lecture tour.

Between the fourth of July and the twenty-first of October, fifteen and a half weeks, Mr. Beecher had preached seventeen times, delivered nine public addresses and fifty-eight lectures. For the fifty-eight lectures he cleared the sum of $11,600 net of all expenses for himself and Mrs. Beecher from the day they sailed from New York, June 19, to the day they arrived at their home in Brooklyn, October 31. This was his summer vacation.

Miss Terry's Matinée to the Blind

EVERY one knows that, as a class, the actors are a most kind-hearted folk. One of the latest incidents of this kind occurred during Miss Terry's recent engagement in Washington.

Like all other visitors who go to the National Capital, Miss Terry was taken to see the Congressional Library. While going through it she was shown into the Pavilion of the Blind. She was greatly interested at once; she went through the beautiful room, examining carefully the books which are printed in the raised characters, the typewriters which are made to write in the same manner, and the cards and games, and all the time questioning Miss Giffin as to what had been done and was doing for the blind. Miss Giffin, who has been the efficient superintendent of the department ever since it was established, explained in detail the plan of the department, and told her of the readings that are given there five afternoons each week, and at which some of the most distinguished people in Washington, resident and visiting, come to read to the blind; of the musicales which are given in the pavilion every Wednesday, and of the generosity of the street-car lines in providing free tickets.

"And I am in hopes," added Miss Giffin in conclusion, "that in time we may secure free sittings for them in the theatres, as is done for them now on the continent, where they can hear and enjoy the standard plays."

"But would they enjoy it?" asked Miss Terry, "when they could not see the acting?"

"Oh, yes, indeed," answered Miss Giffin. "Perhaps you do not know it, but the loss of sight of the eyes is largely made up to those who are thus afflicted in the marvelous sight of the mind. Their imaginative powers are wonderful, and their keen minds picture all that they hear so vividly that I sometimes think they realize more fully what is going on about them than they would if they saw it with natural eyes."

"Well, then," said Miss Terry, "let us, you and I, inaugurate in this country the custom of sending the blind to the theatres. I will send you the tickets for as many as you think would care to go to hear me in The Amber Heart, Saturday afternoon, and then you can bring them."

On the next Friday the tickets were sent, according to the promise, and a happier party was never seen than were the twenty blind persons Miss Giffin took with her to the theatre the following day. Excellent seats had been reserved for them, and all during the play they listened with rapt attention. So acute were their ears that several times during the afternoon when Miss Terry turned her face toward them in speaking they would whisper excitedly to one another, "See! She is looking at us; she is saying that just to us!" When the play was over, at her invitation they gathered in one of the boxes and she came down to meet them. She sat down amongst them while each one lightly passed their skillful fingers over her face and called her their "Beautiful, beautiful Ellaline," and poured out their gratitude to her for what they declared was the happiest afternoon of their lives.

She was very much touched by the incident, and as she left them she assured them that they had been an inspiration to her and that she should never forget them. That she did not forget them was evident. She went from Washington to Baltimore, and two of the blind girls wrote her a letter, further expressing the gratitude which they felt to her. In a few days the following answer came to them in her own handwriting:

> "My Dears: I am so much gratified to hear that you liked The Amber Heart. Next time you must hear Sir Henry.
> "Miss Giffin did come to me here—and we had a lovely time together. Remember me to her affectionately, and also to Mr. Hutcheson and Mr. Washington Coleman. With love to you all, Yours always the same, ELLEN TERRY."

Below it she had written in point her name, which she underscored twice and added an exclamatory "There!"

HERBERT PUTNAM

The Diplomacy of Herbert Putnam

In his brief but successful career as a public librarian, Herbert Putnam, the new Congressional Librarian, has faced three varied problems, of which he has mastered two and holds the solution of the third in his grasp. He established a public library in Minneapolis, popularized another one in Boston, and now in Washington he has begun to make the National Library as comprehensive and powerful an institution, so far as this country is concerned, as the British Museum is in Great Britain. One of the chief factors in Mr. Putnam's success is his tact. He has the rare ability of saying "no" without giving offense. In his intercourse with his employees as well as with the public he is the personification of placidity.

As an illustration of his tact the following story was told the other day by an intimate friend in New York:

When Mr. Putnam was the head of the Public Library in Boston a ward leader of that city called on him to recommend a henchman for a place in the library.

There was no reason why the librarian should not have refused at once and peremptorily to appoint him, but he chose to follow another course.

After a few minutes' talk with the politician, Mr. Putnam asked him whether he had ever been through all the departments of the institution.

"I never have, but I'd like to see it," replied the politician.

"It will give me much pleasure to go with you," said Mr. Putnam.

Mr. Putnam took him behind the counters and through the building from top to bottom, explaining the character and the magnitude of the work in detail. He further pointed out, without seeming to do so, the varied duties of the employees and the attainments they must possess to do the work. When the tour was ended, Mr. Putnam said:

"I'm pleased to have had a chance to show the library to you, and if your friend will fill out an application blank and send it, and if he passes the necessary examination, I think there will be no difficulty in placing his name on the waiting list."

The politician, however, had seen enough of library work to convince him that his constituent could find no place on the staff, and the blank was never filled out. But, to the day he left Boston, Mr. Putnam had no warmer admirer in that city than this same ward leader.

Mr. Putnam is still under thirty-nine. He is a native of New York and a graduate of Harvard. He is a member of the bar and he practiced law three years in Boston.

Doctor Jenkins and Some of His Jokes

Dr. William T. Jenkins has been in public office in New York so many years that only the very oldest newspaper reporters remember the time he was not a deputy coroner or something higher on the official roll. The doctor is a brother-in-law of Richard Croker. In appearance he is rather short, florid, somewhat stout and mild-mannered, and more than almost any other official in Gotham he answers to the misused term, "genial." For many years, with few interruptions, the doctor has been Health Officer of the Port, and in that capacity has made himself the friend of every ship news reporter in the city—except one.

He lost this man's friendship through his fondness for practical jokes. The doctor is an inveterate wag. This reporter, who is now an influential editor, was, like all other beginners when he served his apprenticeship, down at Quarantine Station, on Staten Island. He was honest, simple-minded, credulous and industrious, and the other reporters had rare sport with him. At length the doctor took a hand. The tyro had already been led into writing such improbable items as "The California day boat has been driven ashore on Mosquito bar by a Jersey sand storm. No lives lost," and "The Peruvian bark Calisaya is four days overdue," and had been properly admonished by his city editor for his gullibility, but when the health officer one night told him gravely that he had "fumigated twelve thousand crates of molasses," he believed it, and wrote it, and was transferred on account of it.

It was years before the reporter had his turn, but it came, as all things do to him who waits. A Sunday newspaper hired him to furnish a column of personal gossip, and he led it off one day with a pleasant little item to the effect that "Doctor Jenkins was trying to buy a match for a three months' old black and white kitten, and was willing to pay five dollars for a perfect duplicate of his pet." The result can better be imagined than described. The reporter had paid back the debt with compound interest. And a month after this had appeared and Quarantine Station had quieted down, albeit there were many times more kittens there than ever before, the vengeful reporter wrote the following connection:

"The item about Doctor Jenkins and his kitten was an error. The genial doctor does not care for a kitten. It is a black and white puppy-dog that he wants, and he will pay ten dollars for any pup that suits him. Free ferriage to and from the Island for all persons having pups to sell."

Ernest Seton Thompson's Literary Partner

Mrs. Grace Gallatin Thompson, wife of Ernest Seton Thompson, the naturalist, painter, lecturer and author, has spent her winters, since her marriage, four years ago, in New York on the top floor of an old Fifth Avenue mansion, the lower floors of which are given over to piano warerooms and business offices. Here she has fitted up a studio and living rooms that are, in spite of their location, as dainty and secluded as if they were miles away. Every summer Mrs. Thompson spends several months with her husband in the Rockies. When they were married, Mrs. Thompson exacted a promise that every fourth summer should be spent in Europe, but so potent is the influence of the camp that they will return next summer in August to spend the rest of the season in the far West.

It is hard to say which is Mrs. Thompson's busiest time. In the summer she rides, studies and hunts with her husband. It should be explained that "hunting" does not refer to killing. No game is killed in the Thompson camp except for food. They do hunt, however, for rare specimens of furred and feathered forest dwellers, and they are remarkably successful in their quests.

In the winter Mrs. Thompson writes, draws and makes her husband's books. She directs the matter of letterpress display and the illustrations. When Mr. Thompson's first book was brought out, Mrs. Thompson's revolutionary ideas caused a conflict between her and the publishers over every page. She won each battle, however, and since that time she has had her own way, undisputed, for it is undeniably attractive and has been of great aid to her husband's success.

Early in their married career the story got abroad that Mrs. Thompson was a vegetarian, because of her husband's well-known antipathy to taking animal life needlessly, and once when they were the star guests at a fashionable Western hotel she had some difficulty in being served with meat. She got it after a while, as she has got most things she wanted, but she lost a part of the glamour that fame had built up around her.

EARLE H. EATON

Mr. Eaton's Subterranean Adventure

"The most exciting morning I ever spent," said Earle H. Eaton, Editor of the American Press Association, the other day, "was with a well-shooter. Few people know what a well-shooter is, so I don't mind saying that he is a professional who handles dynamite and other high explosives in wells and deep mines. The name, I am told, came from Pennsylvania, in the old oil days when trained operators renewed the life of wells by exploding heavy charges of dynamite or nitroglycerin at the bottom of the shaft.

"When I was invited to descend a deep salt mine at Piffard, New York, in the Warsaw salt district, in company with a well-shooter, I gladly accepted. Despite his dangerous vocation, he was a genial and even merry soul. We went down in a steel cage. It looked very nice on the outside, but the moment it started its plunge downward into darkness I found myself on my knees holding on to a convenient steel cross-bar. We descended one thousand feet, more or less, and then came to the salt formation where the rock salt is fifty or sixty feet thick. It is drilled by means of compressed air. The holes are charged with dynamite cartridges. These are connected by wires from a battery, and when the place is cleared the touch of a button brings forth an explosion which throws down carloads of salt. Upon my arrival the preparations for a blast were nearly complete, and Mr. Gallagher, the foreman, politely inquired, 'Do you prefer to go up out of the mine or stay here and stand a blow?'

"The question was so startling that I asked, 'Is it possible to stand the blow?'

"He answered nonchalantly, 'Yes, if you stand away from it thirty feet, get on your tiptoes, and keep your mouth wide open. If you don't it will break the drums of your ears and possibly start your nose to bleed.'

"Impelled by some mysterious curiosity, I made up my mind to stand the blow. The foreman placed me in a corner where I could not be hit by flying fragments. I stood on my toe tips and opened my mouth until I thought my jaws were dislocated.

"'I'll count three,' said the foreman, 'and then I'll touch her off. One—Keep your mouth open. Two—Keep your mouth open. Three.'

"Then came the queerest sensation I ever had. It was a roar alongside of which a cannonade is silence. It seemed as if the solid mine had suddenly come together and crushed me flat as a sheet of paper. Then the walls expanded and my body with them. The foreman said afterward that it was the air inside of me contracting and expanding, and I fancy he knew what he was talking about. It was a novel experience, but a very satisfying one, and never since then have I been inclined to accept an invitation to stand a blow in a salt mine."

Anna Gould's Professor of Feudal Law

Professor Isaac Franklin Russell, dean of the woman's law class of the University of New York, is a wit as well as a jurist and scholar. On one occasion a young woman in one of his classes said:

"The old common law seems to be full of contradictions."

"It is," replied the Professor. "For example, fee-tail has no end, and a fee-male cannot have any possible relation to a woman."

On another occasion a student asked: "In the old days the law favored the eldest son; nowadays, which of the family does the law favor?"

The Dean replied: "Why, the survivor, of course."

Professor Russell was one of the counsel who drew up the marriage settlements of Anna Gould and the Count de Castellane. By an odd coincidence, a year before, the bride was a student in his class, and was one of the best informed of the women upon feudal law and the legal status of Royalty and nobility. Probably no French noblewoman is better acquainted with her own legal rights, duties and liabilities than the millionaire American Countess.

OF THE HOUR

Treed by the Wrong Dog

This is a story concerning Dr. F. S. Newcomer, of Indianapolis, a relative by marriage of General Harrison; of Alfred Freemont Potts, a well-known lawyer, of the Hoosier Capital; and of a newspaper reporter now living in New York. It is a true story.

Once upon a time Doctor Newcomer bought a prize English bulldog, fierce, ugly, forbidding, and disagreeable even to his closest friends. At night the Doctor turned him loose to keep tramps and burglars from his yard. The arrival of this brute was a matter of public interest, and the reporter wrote stories about him, exploiting his ferocity and his pedigree, and even printed a picture of him. The reporter lived across the street from the Doctor, on a shady, quiet cross street lined with young trees protected by tree-boxes from vandal horses.

One night, late, the reporter, coming home from his office, heard a deep, hoarse growl and a hurried scratching of gravel from across the street. Without waiting to interrogate, he climbed up a tree-box, and the same moment a dog hurled himself in the darkness against the foot of the same and gave utterance to a grewsome and blood-curdling bark.

"Good doggie," observed the reporter in conciliatory tones from his perch; "good doggie, nice doggie. That's a good old dog."

Then he made a step downward, at which the good old dog charged again on the tree-box and renewed his growl. This was repeated a number of times. At length the reporter tried a new tack. He appealed to the dog's sense of gratitude, and he spoke with the eloquence of despair.

"Do you think this is a fair deal?" he asked plaintively. "I've written you up. I've printed your picture. I have given you a name among Indianapolis dogs. I don't expect you to send me a check, but do you think it is right to keep me up in this tree-box from three o'clock until daylight?"

The dog answered with a deeper, hoarser and fiercer growl than before. There was no pity in his soul, and the man in the tree shivered and waited with all the patience he could muster. After an hour of captivity and argument the captor indiscreetly strolled over to the gas lamp in front of the reporter's house. Whereupon the reporter came down and, walking up to the dog, kicked him until he ran yelping and whining across the street. It was not Newcomer's dog at all, but an undersized, woolly mongrel belonging to Mr. Potts—a toothless family retainer that had acquired his hoarseness from a bad cold.

Sheriff Dunn's Palace in Ireland

Last fall's election in New York made an ex-Sheriff of Thomas Dunn, a millionaire contractor and one of the most popular office-holders in Gotham. Mr. Dunn is a self-made man. He came to New York from Ireland when he was young, and knew, from infancy, all there is to know about the practical side of poverty. He amassed his fortune in business before he went into politics. Among other things, the ex-Sheriff is enthusiastically patriotic, and this trait almost led him into perpetrating a bull that probably would have become historic. When New York was preparing to welcome Admiral Dewey, Mr. Dunn arranged for a mammoth decoration many feet wide and many more yards long, flaming in color and bearing the inscription:

"Welcome Home to Dewey."

This flaring sign he proposed displaying on the Sheriff's official residence, which happens to be the Ludlow Street jail. But wise counsel prevented, and the sign was shown elsewhere.

During the campaign when Mr. Dunn was elected he was invited by some friends to dine with Judge P. Henry Dugro, the millionaire owner of the Savoy Hotel, where the Infanta Eulalie was entertained during her visit to New York. The Judge, who is something of a wag, and having in mind the early poverty of Mr. Dunn, thought with his friends to dazzle him with the splendor of this dining-room, which is really a very gorgeous affair and is used only on state occasions. So the apartment was specially decorated and made more than ordinarily brilliant. After the party had assembled, the host led Mr. Dunn around the room, pointing out the rare pictures and the onyx mantels. He did this rather patronizingly, as had been agreed between himself and the other guests, and therefore he was not surprised when Mr. Dunn sighed deeply.

"What's the matter, Tom?" he asked; "anything wrong?"

"No," replied the politician sadly; "only this sort of thing makes me lonesome."

"Lonesome?" echoed the conspirators.

"Yes. It reminds me so much of my mother's place in ould Ireland."

SARA ANDERSON

Miss Anderson's First Song

Sara Anderson, the oratorio singer who achieved lasting fame at the great Worcester festival of 1898, contemplates giving up the concert for the operatic stage and will probably make the change after the close of her concert season in London next summer. Miss Anderson comes of a musical family. Her mother is Mrs. Sara Barron Anderson, once the famous contralto of Doctor Paxton's church. Her father and her sister are also proficient musicians, and their home in New York is a favorite resort for local and visiting singers and composers.

A close friend of the family is authority for the following story of the manner in which Miss Anderson began her musical career: When she was less than twelve years old she heard her mother sing a lullaby in her parlor at an entertainment. The next day she surprised her family by singing the song precisely as she had heard it, although it was a difficult composition. So true was her memory that she did not make a mistake in a single note.

The next week she began music lessons, and so carefully was she trained and so little publicity attended her efforts, that when she appeared at Worcester she was wholly unknown to the metropolitan critics. Since then her advancement has been remarkably rapid. She was the leading star at the Cincinnati festival last summer.

A Filipino Tartar

Lieutenant-Colonel H. H. Sargeant, U. S. A., before the late conflict with Spain won literary laurels by two scholarly volumes on the campaigns of Napoleon Bonaparte. During that war he had but little opportunity to take part in battle, his duties being to organize and drill the volunteers at the mobilization camps and, after August, to look after engineering and sanitary matters at Santiago de Cuba. Early last year he was sent to the Philippines, where he has had his full share of the hardest campaigning. He was under the immediate command of Lawton at the battle of San Mateo and was being praised by General Lawton for his gallantry when that officer fell, pierced by a hostile bullet.

Colonel Sargeant tells many enjoyable war stories. Once when instructing some men, he asked, "When you are on the skirmish line, and suddenly encounter the enemy, what would you do?"

"Fall flat." "And what next?" "Stay there."

On another occasion he was questioning a man respecting his absence for six hours.

"I was chasing a Filipino an hour, sir."

"How about the other five hours?"

"The Filipino and his friends were chasing me, sir."

Buffalo Bill's Clever Daughter

Mrs. H. S. Boal, one of the best-known women of Wyoming, enjoys the double distinction of being the daughter of Colonel Cody, better known as "Buffalo Bill," and of residing in a community whose legal title is "B. X. —— Ranch, Slack, Wyoming." No one can tell more interesting stories of her distinguished father, and not even her father has been more pestered with questions by foolish or inquisitive people. Among some of the startling queries which have been put to her are these:

"I suppose you have a very large collection of Indian scalps?"

"Have you ever been scalped yourself?"

"Do you keep buffaloes as domestic pets?"

Once, on the ranch while she was entertaining a foreign stranger, her father rode by and she said, "There's Colonel Cody now."

The man looked at the horseman long and anxiously.

"Are you sure about it?"

"Certainly: I know him very well, indeed."

"Well, I declare, I was never so surprised in my life. Why that man is a gentleman, and not an Indian at all."

ATTORNEY-GENERAL GRIGGS

The Attorney-General as a Prophet

Attorney-General Griggs is credited with making a reputation for sound advice and clear thought quicker than almost any other man connected with the present Administration. It was as the friend of the late Vice-President that Governor Griggs, of New Jersey, entered into national life. His selection was not generally discussed in advance and his appointment quickly followed his choice. He came into the Cabinet as the Spanish war clouds were preparing to break. At this crisis he was one of the most trustworthy of President McKinley's advisers.

A New York newspaper man, high in the President's councils, tells the following hitherto unwritten story of the Attorney-General's early foresight as to the results of the war. It was at a small dinner given by Senator Hanna in his private rooms at the Arlington. The guests were Secretaries Bliss and Alger, Mr. Griggs and the newspaper man. The Maine had been blown up and the report of the Investigating Board was nearly completed, and the newspapers were full of excitement.

"We are certain to have war," remarked one of the party sententiously.

This statement was not disputed and the diners proceeded to discuss the merits of the controversy with Spain unreservedly. All agreed that war was not only inevitable, but that this country was fully justified in any action it might take.

There was no doubt either as to the result of the conflict, although no one prophesied the speedy victory for American arms that ensued.

While the statesmen were outlining with more or less enthusiasm the plan of action which was so soon to be realized, Mr. Griggs remained silent.

"What do you think, General?" asked one of the Secretaries.

"There is no doubt that we will win if ever we enter into a war with Spain," replied the Attorney-General. "I agree with what has been said in that matter, but our chief troubles will not begin until after peace is declared. After Spain has been defeated, then the responsibilities of the United States will begin and they will not be so easily disposed of." These words made a deep impression.

At that time the present complication in the Philippines was not thought of. Cuba and Puerto Rico were the only Spanish colonies discussed. But fewer prophecies of late years have been fulfilled more completely and in shorter time than that of the new Attorney-General.

Three MEN on Four Wheels

By Jerome K. Jerome

Copyright, 1899, by Jerome K. Jerome. Copyright in Great Britain

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS: The three men—Harris, George and the author—are touring Germany awheel, a tandem and a safety being their mounts. After many vicissitudes, and adventures with policemen, shopkeepers and street sprinklers, they reach Baden in good order.

The Ways of the German Dog

FROM Baden, about which it need only be said that it is a pleasure resort singularly like other pleasure resorts of the same description, we started bicycling in earnest. We planned a ten-days' tour which, while completing the Black Forest, should include a spin down the Donau-Thal, which, for the twenty miles from Tuttlingen to Sigmaringen, is, perhaps, the finest valley in all Germany. The Danube stream here winds its narrow way past old-world, unspoiled villages; past ancient monasteries, nestling in green pastures, where still the barefooted and bareheaded friar, his rope girdle tight about his loins, shepherds, with crook in hand, his sheep upon the hillsides; through rocky woods; between sheer walls of cliff, whose every towering crag stands crowned with ruined fortress, church or castle; together with a blick at the Vosges Mountains, where half the population is bitterly pained if you speak to them in French, the other half being insulted when you address them in German, and the whole indignantly contemptuous at the first sound of English—a state of things that renders conversation with the stranger somewhat nervous work.

We did not succeed in carrying out our program in its entirety, for the reason that human performance lags ever behind human intention. It is easy to say and believe at three o'clock in the afternoon that "We will rise at five, breakfast lightly at half-past, and start away at six."

"Then we shall be well on our way before the heat of the day sets in," remarks one.

"This time of the year, the early morning is really the best part of the day. Don't you think so?" adds another.

"Oh, undoubtedly."

"So cool and fresh."

"And the half lights are so exquisite."

The first morning one maintains one's vows. The party assembles at half-past five. It is very silent; individually, somewhat snappy; inclined to grumble with its food; also with most other things; the atmosphere charged with compressed irritability, seeking its vent. In the evening the Tempter's voice is heard:

"I think if we got off by half-past six, sharp, that would be time enough."

The voice of Virtue protests faintly: "It will be breaking our resolution."

Then Tempter replies: "Resolutions were made for man, not man for resolutions. Besides, it is disturbing the whole hotel; think of the poor servants."

The voice of Virtue continues, but even feebler: "But everybody gets up early in these parts."

"They would not if they were not obliged to, poor things. Say breakfast at half-past six, punctual; that will be disturbing nobody."

Thus Sin masquerades under the guise of Good, and one sleeps till six, explaining to one's conscience, who, however, doesn't believe it, that one does this because of unselfish consideration for others. I have known such consideration to extend until seven of the clock.

Likewise distance measured with a pair of compasses is not precisely the same as when measured by the leg.

"Ten miles an hour for seven hours, seventy miles. A nice, easy day's work."

"There are some stiff hills to climb."

"The other side to come down. Say eight miles an hour, and call it sixty miles. If we can't average eight miles an hour we had better go in bath-chairs." It does seem somewhat impossible to do less, on paper.

But at four o'clock in the afternoon the voice of Duty rings less trumpet-toned.

"Well, I suppose we ought to be getting on."

"Oh, there's no hurry; don't fuss. Lovely view from here, isn't it?"

"Very. Don't forget that we are twenty-five miles from St. Blasien."

"How far?"

"Twenty-five miles; a little over, if anything."

"Do you mean we have only come thirty-five miles?"

"That's all."

"Nonsense. I don't believe that map of yours."

"It is impossible, you know. We have been riding steadily ever since the first thing this morning."

"No, we haven't. We didn't get away till eight, to begin with."

"Quarter to eight."

"Well, quarter to eight; and every half-dozen miles we have stopped."

"We have only stopped to look at the view. It's no good coming to see a country and then not seeing it."

"And we have had to pull up some stiff hills."

"Besides, it has been an exceptionally hot day."

"Well, don't forget St. Blasien is twenty-five miles off, that's all."

"Any more hills?"

"Yes, two; up and down."

"I thought you said it was down hill into St. Blasien?"

"So it is for the last ten miles. We are twenty-five miles from St. Blasien here."

"Isn't there anywhere between here and St. Blasien? What's that little place there on the lake?"

"It isn't St. Blasien, or anywhere near it. There's a danger in beginning that sort of thing."

"There's a danger in overworking one's self. One should study moderation in all things. Pretty little place, that Titisee, according to the map; looks as if there would be good air there."

"All right, I'm agreeable. It was you fellows suggested our making for St. Blasien."

"Oh, I'm not so keen on St. Blasien—poky little place, down in a valley. This Titisee, I should say, was ever so much nicer."

"Quite near, isn't it?"

"Five miles."

General chorus: "We'll stop at Titisee."

George made discovery of this difference between theory and practice on the very first day of our ride.

"I thought," said George—he was riding the single, Harris and I being a little ahead on the tandem—"that the idea was to train up the hills, and ride down them."

"So it is," answered Harris, "as a general rule. But the trains don't go up every hill in the Black Forest."

"Somehow I felt a suspicion that they wouldn't," growled George; and for a while silence reigned.

"Besides," remarked Harris, who had evidently been ruminating the subject, "you would not wish to have nothing but down-hill, surely. It would not be playing the game. One must take a little rough with one's smooth."

Again there returned silence, broken this time by George.

"Don't you two fellows overexert yourselves merely on my account," said George.

"How so?" asked Harris.

"I was looking at one on a boarding in Sloane Street only a day or two before we started"

"I mean," answered George, "that where a train does happen to be going up these hills, don't you put aside the idea of taking it for fear of outraging my finer feelings. Personally, I am prepared to go up all these hills in a railway train, even if it's not playing the game. I'll square the thing with my conscience; I've been up at seven every day for a week now, and I calculate it owes me a bit. Don't you consider me in the matter at all."

We promised to bear this in mind, and again the ride continued in dogged dumbness, until it was again broken by George.

"What bicycle did you say this was of yours?" asked George.

Harris told him. I forget of what particular manufacture it happened to be; it is immaterial.

"Are you sure?" persisted George.

"Of course I'm sure," answered Harris. "Why, what's the matter with it?"

"Well, it doesn't come up to the poster," said George, "that's all."

"What poster?" asked Harris.

"The poster advertising this particular brand of cycle," explained George. "I was looking at one on a boarding in Sloane Street only a day or two before we started. A man was riding this make of machine—a man with a banner in his hand; he wasn't doing any work, that was as clear as daylight; he was just sitting on the thing and drinking in the air. The bicycle was going of its own accord, and going well. This thing of yours leaves all the work to me. It is a lazy brute of a machine; if you don't shove, it simply does nothing. I should complain about it if I were you."

When one comes to think of it, few bicycles do realize the poster. On only one poster that I can recollect have I seen the rider represented as doing any work. But then, this man was being pursued by a bull. In ordinary cases the object of the artist is to convince the hesitating neophyte that the sport of bicycling consists in sitting on a luxurious saddle and being moved rapidly in the direction you wish to go by unseen Heavenly powers.

Generally speaking, the rider is a lady, and then one feels that, for perfect bodily rest combined with entire freedom from mental anxiety, slumber upon a water-bed cannot compare with bicycle riding upon a hilly road. No fairy traveling on a summer cloud could take things more easily than does the bicycle girl, according to the poster. Her costume for cycling in hot weather is ideal. Old-fashioned landladies might refuse her lunch, it is true; and a narrow-minded police force might desire to secure her and wrap her in a rug preliminary to summoning her. But such she heeds not. Up hill and down hill, through traffic that might tax the ingenuity of a cat, over road surfaces calculated to break the average steam-roller she passes, a vision of idle loveliness; her fair hair streaming to the wind, her sylphlike form poised airily, one foot upon the saddle, the other resting lightly upon the lamp. Sometimes she condescends to sit down on the saddle; then she puts her feet upon the rests, lights a cigarette, and waves above her head a Chinese lantern.

Less often, it is a mere male thing that rides the machine. He is not so accomplished an acrobat as is the lady; but simple tricks, such as standing on the saddle and waving flags, drinking beer or beef tea while riding, he can and does perform; something, one supposes, he must do to occupy his mind. Sitting still hour after hour on this machine, having no work to do, nothing to think about, must pall upon any man of active temperament. Thus it is that we see him rising on his pedals, as he nears the top of some high hill, to apostrophize the sun or address poetry to the surrounding scenery.

Occasionally the poster pictures a pair of cyclists; and then one grasps the fact how much superior for purposes of flirtation is the modern bicycle to the old-fashioned parlor or the played-out garden gate. He and she mount their bicycles, being careful, of course, that they are of the right make. After that they have nothing to think about but the old sweet tale. Down shady lanes, through busy towns on market days, merrily roll the wheels of the "Bermondsey Company's Bottom Bracket Britain's Best," or of the "Camberwell Company's Jointless Eureka." They need no pedaling; they require no guiding. Give them their heads, and tell them what time you want to get home, and that is all they ask. While Edwin leans from his saddle to whisper the dear old nothings in Angelina's ear, while Angelina's face, to hide its blushes, is turned toward the horizon at the back, the magic bicycles pursue their even course.

And the sun is always shining, and the roads are always dry. No stern parent rides behind, no interfering aunt beside, no demon small-boy brother is peeping around the corner; there never comes a skid. Ah, me! Why were there no "Britain's Best" nor "Camberwell Eurekas" to be hired when we were young?

Or, maybe, the "Britain's Best" or the "Camberwell Eureka" stands leaning against a gate; maybe it is tired. It has worked hard all the afternoon, carrying these young people. Mercifully minded, they have dismounted, to give the machine a rest. They sit upon the grass beneath the shade of graceful boughs; it is long and dry grass. A stream flows by their feet. All is idleness and peace.

That is ever the idea the cycle poster artist sets himself to convey—idleness and peace.

But I am wrong in saying that no cyclist, according to the poster, ever works. Now I come to reflect, I have seen posters representing gentlemen on cycles working very hard—overworking themselves, one might almost say. They are thin and haggard with the toil, the perspiration stands upon their brow in beads; you feel that if there is another hill beyond the poster they must either get off or die. But this is the result of their own folly. This happens because they will persist in riding a machine of an inferior make. Were they riding a "Putney Popular" or "Battersea Bounder," such as the sensible young man in the centre of the poster rides, then all this unnecessary labor would be saved to them. Then all required of them would be, as in gratitude bound, to look happy; perhaps occasionally to back-pedal a little when the machine in its youthful buoyancy loses its head for a moment and dashes on too swiftly.

You tired young men, sitting dejectedly on milestones, too spent to heed the steady rain that soaks you through; you weary maidens, with the straight, damp hair, anxious about the time, longing to swear, not knowing how; you stout, bald men, vanishing visibly as you pant and grunt along the endless road; you purple, dejected matrons, plying with pain the slow, unwilling wheel—why did you not see to it that you bought a "Britain's Best" or a "Camberwell Eureka"? Why are these bicycles of inferior make so prevalent throughout the land?

Or is it with bicycling as with all other things?—does life at no point realize the poster?

The one thing in Germany that never fails to charm and fascinate me is the German dog. In England one grows tired of the old breeds, one knows them all so well: the mastiff, the plum-pudding dog, the terrier (black, white or rough-haired, as the case may be, but always quarrelsome), the collie, the bulldog; never anything new. Now, in Germany you get variety. You come across dogs the like of which you have never seen before; that until you hear them bark you do not know are dogs. It is all so fresh, so interesting. George stopped a dog in Sigmaringen, and drew our attention to it. It suggested a cross between a codfish and a poodle. I would not like to be positive it was not a cross between a codfish and a poodle. Harris tried to photograph it, but it ran up a fence and disappeared through some bushes.

I do not know what the German breeder's idea is; at present he retains his secret. George suggests he is aiming at a griffin. There is much to bear out this theory; and indeed, in one or two cases I have come across, success on these lines would seem to have been almost achieved. Yet I cannot bring myself to believe that such are anything more than mere accidents. The German mind is practical, and I fail to see the object of a griffin. If mere quaintness of design be desired, is there not already the dachshund? What more is needed? Besides, about a house, a griffin would be so inconvenient; people would be continually treading on its tail. My idea is that the Germans are trying for a mermaid, which they will then train to catch fish.

For your German does not encourage laziness in any living thing. He likes to see his dogs work, and the German dog loves work; of that there can be no doubt. The life of the English dog must be a misery to him. Imagine a strong, active and intelligent being, of exceptionally energetic temperament, condemned to spend twenty-four hours a day in absolute idleness! How would you like it yourself? No wonder he feels misunderstood, yearns for the unattainable, and gets himself into trouble generally.

Now the German dog, on the other hand, has plenty to occupy his mind. He is busy and important. Watch him as he walks along harnessed to his milk cart. No churchwarden at collection time could feel or look more pleased with himself. He does not do any real work; the human being does the pushing, he does the barking; that is his idea of division of labor. What he says to himself is:

"The old man can't bark, but he can shove. Very well."

The interest and the pride he takes in the business are quite beautiful to see. Another dog passing by makes, maybe, some jeering remark, casting discredit upon the creaminess of the milk. He stops suddenly, quite regardless of the traffic.

"I beg your pardon, what was that you said about our milk?"

"I said nothing about your milk," retorts the other dog, in a tone of gentle innocence; "I merely said it was a fine day, and asked the price of chalk."

"Oh, you asked the price of chalk, did you? Would you like to know?"

"Yes, thanks; somehow I thought you could tell me."

"You are quite right; I can. It's worth——"

"Oh, do come along," says the old lady, who is tired and hot, and anxious to finish her round.

"Yes, but hang it all, did you hear what he hinted about our milk?"

"Oh, never mind him. There's a tram coming around the corner; we shall all get run over."

"Yes, but I do mind him; one has one's proper pride. He asked the price of chalk, —and, standing one each side of the poor beast, they both abused it and he's going to know it! It's worth just twenty times as much——"

"You'll have the whole thing over, I know you will," cries the old lady pathetically, struggling with all her feeble strength to haul him back. "Oh, dear, oh, dear! I do wish I had left you at home."

The tram is bearing down upon them; a cab driver is shouting at them; another huge brute, hoping to be in time to take a hand, is dragging a bread cart, followed by a screaming child, across the road from the opposite side; a small crowd is collecting; and a policeman is hastening to the scene.

"It's worth," says the milk dog, "just twenty times as much as you'll be worth before I've done with you."

"Oh, you think so, do you?"

"Yes, I do, you grandson of a French spaniel, you fried fish-eating——"

"There! I knew you'd have it over," says the poor milkwoman. "I told him he'd have it over."

But he is busy and heeds her not. Five minutes later, when the traffic is renewed, when the bread girl has collected her muddy rolls, and the policeman has gone off with the name and address of everybody in the street, he consents to look behind him.

"It is a bit of an upset," he admits; then, shaking himself free of care, he adds cheerfully: "But I guess I taught him the price of chalk. He won't interfere with us again, I'm thinking."

"I'm sure I hope not," says the old lady, regarding dejectedly the milky road.

But his favorite sport is to wait at the top of the hill for another dog, and then race down. On these occasions the chief occupation of the other fellow is to run about behind, picking up the scattered articles, loaves, cabbages or shirts, as they are jerked out. At the bottom of the hill he stops and waits for his friend.

"Good race, wasn't it?" he remarks, panting, as the Human comes up, laden to the chin. "I believe I'd have won it, too, if it hadn't been for that fool of a small boy. He was right in my way just as I turned the corner. You noticed him? Wish I had, beastly brat! What's he yelling like that for? Because I knocked him down and ran over him? Well, why didn't he get out of the way? It's disgraceful, the way people leave their children about for other creatures to tumble over. Halloo! did all those things come out? You couldn't have packed them very carefully; you should see to a thing like that. You did not dream of my tearing down the hill, twenty miles an hour? Surely you know me better than to expect I'd let that old Schneider's dog pass me without an effort. But there, you never think. You're sure you've got them all? You believe so? I shouldn't 'believe,' if I were you; I should run back up the hill again and make sure. You feel too tired? Oh, all right; don't blame me if anything is missing, that's all."

He is so self-willed. He is cock-sure that the correct turning is the second on the right, and nothing will persuade him that it is the third. He is positive he can get across the road in time, and will not be convinced until he sees the cart smashed up. Then he is very apologetic, it is true. But of what use is that? As he is usually the size and strength of a young bull, and his human companion is generally a weak-kneed old man or woman, or a small child, he has his way. The greatest punishment his proprietor can inflict upon him is to leave him at home, and take the cart out alone. But your German is too kind-hearted to do this often.

That he is harnessed to the cart for anybody's pleasure but his own it is impossible to believe; and I am confident that the German peasant plans the tiny harness and fashions the little cart purely with the hope of gratifying his dog. In other countries—in Belgium, Holland and France—I have seen these draught dogs ill treated and overworked; but in Germany, never. Germans abuse animals shockingly. I have seen a German stand in front of his horse and call it every name he could lay his tongue to. But the horse, like the husband of King Alfred's hostess, was evidently used to it, and did not mind. I have seen a German, weary with abusing his horse, call to his wife to come out and assist him. When she came he told her what the horse had done. Maybe, carried away by his passion, he exaggerated, making the animal out worse than it really was. Be this as it may, the recital roused the woman's temper to almost equal heat with his own; and, standing one each side of the poor beast, they both abused it. They abused its dead mother, they insulted its father; they made cutting remarks about its personal appearance, its intelligence, its moral sense, its general ability as a horse. The animal bore the torrent with exemplary patience for a while; then it did the best thing possible to do under the circumstances. Without losing its own temper, without replying a word, it moved quietly away. The lady returned to her washing, and the man followed the horse up the street, still abusing it.

A kinder-hearted people than the Germans there is no need for. Cruelty to animal or child is a thing almost unknown in the land. The whip with them is a musical instrument; its crack is heard from morning to night, but a coachman that in the streets of Dresden I once saw use one was very nearly lynched by the indignant crowd. Germany is the only country in Europe where the traveler can settle himself comfortably in his hired carriage, confident that his gentle, willing friend between the shafts will be neither overworked nor cruelly treated.

Shanks and the Civil War Censors

OF THE great journalists of the Civil War period, one of the few survivors is William F. G. Shanks, who for many years was an editor of the New York Tribune. During the conflict he won high distinction by the ingenious method whereby he outwitted some of the Generals in command. An order had been issued which practically prohibited the sending home of any news, excepting what met the approval of some young officers who had been appointed censors.

Every paper suffered immediately with the exception of the Tribune. Day after day it published the news in full to the surprise and wrath of the Generals. They made an investigation, but without results. Shanks' letters were studied and examined to see if he used invisible ink or verbal cryptograms. All were alike in containing few facts and many remarks about remittances, accounts, cashier's mistakes and other private monetary matters.

Yet every letter contained the news and it was conveyed in the sentences which spoke about the correspondent's finances. He had foreseen the emergency and made a code which covered nearly every possible military movement.

"Last week's pay received" meant "the army will move forward;" "send me fifty dollars," "the enemy are being reenforced," and so forth. So skillfully was it done that a sympathetic censor offered to lend the correspondent enough money for his wants until a remittance arrived.

American Crudity

GIVE the American an inch, if you would see him begin at once the conquest of the yardstick. We are an enterprising people, a successful people, enormously acquisitive and ruthlessly sincere; but it is not accurate to call us ungenerous; nor are we crude.

To be sure, a certain class of Americans, taking the cue from alien critics, keep themselves busy telling us how refined Europe is, and how boorish America is; but what criterion do they apply in making up their estimate of our standing? Measured by the European standard, we may be lacking; it would be strange were our civilization of the same structure, substance and dimensions as that of the Old World. It does not follow, however, that because society in New York or Kalamazoo is different from society in Paris or Florence, it is necessarily crude. Why not measure Europe by the American tape-line? By doing this we could at least preserve our self-respect. Europe has age and experience on its side of the line; but age and experience do not always conserve grace, symmetry, strength, the three elements of excellence in form; nor does it, as a rule, happen that years and the wear and tear of exertion leave in the spiritual countenance the fine debonair expression of a triumphant and intelligent youth. Montaigne observed that age "fixed more furrows in the soul than in the face."

By what standard of excellence is France, for example, found superior to America? We need not be ill-tempered and suggest the Dreyfus incident as prohibiting comparison; but certainly those who are constantly decrying our social and political status out of one corner of their mouths, while out of the other they blow endless praise of foreign culture, refinement and savoir faire, will acknowledge the impossibility of a Dreyfus horror in an American court. A rope is no stronger than its weakest point, and the administration of justice ought not to be the weak point in a high civilization.

We have our lynchings; but it would be a weak judge of American life who could conclude that the unlawful hanging of a felon by a rural mob is as significant here as is the fact in France of a citizen's fortifying his house and for weeks defying the whole government. The meaning lies much deeper than mere political organization can reach. It belongs to breeding, to generations of men and women educated by unsound example, by insincere moral, domestic, religious and political teaching, and informed by influences generated in decaying public honor and private virtue.

What the phrase "high culture" ought to mean exists in America more generally and evenly distributed than in any other country in the world. Some of us may not pay due attention to the silk tile; we may sometimes even wear a swallow-tailed coat in broad daylight; but a polygamist cannot sit with us in Congress, and we know the difference between lying and diplomacy. Moreover, we are not vulgarly revengeful. The Paris Exposition will not suffer on account of the bitter things said of us by Frenchmen and French journals during our war with Spain. Noblesse oblige; we wish our friends of the Old World great success; especially do we wish long life and great reforms to the Republic of France.

High culture is sound culture, and may exist without much knowledge of, or particular respect for, mere conventional superficialities. The culture which has counted for most in American life is the practical education of the masses in moral government. It begins in the home, where domestic purity flourishes; it goes on through school; it passes into the place of business, it governs at the ballot-box and holds fast in official life. There is corruption, there are bad citizens, depraved homes and dishonored offices; but as a people we are sound to the core. Our culture may not be of the swallow-tail variety, but it is serving us a better turn than could be commanded by all the conventional superiority of Europe.

Nor must self-abasing American critics lose sight of the impression we have recently been making on the Old World, despite its self-pride and almost idolatrous regard for tradition. Diplomacy is said to be the test of national equipoise; but we have reformed diplomacy by changing it to plain, respectful and perfectly frank talk. Our culture says what it means. We are not afraid to be sincere, and do not hesitate to demand sincerity. The fact is, we are no longer a nation of pioneers and backwoodsmen; we rank with the best, and the time has come for us to dismiss the critics who still harp on the worn-out theory that we are a very respectable people, but ridiculously crude.

Men Who "Can't Afford It"

MANY people who have the time and inclination to be curious about the affairs of others are greatly puzzled by the dissimilar surroundings and possessions of acquaintances who are greatly alike in taste, intelligence and income. One man succeeds in sending his children to college; another, no poorer, does not, and insists that he cannot. There are men in very modest circumstances who have books and pictures and ornaments which make their homes admired by all beholders, whereas the houses of some other men of the vicinity—their owners no whit less prosperous—have bare walls and a barnlike effect; their occupants may read much, but the books are borrowed. One man subscribes to all the high-class magazines and periodicals; his next-door neighbor has only the cheapest. Smith's wife and daughters dress well; Brown, whose income equals Smith's, and whose family is no larger, is called mean by the gentler sex because the women of his family wear only gowns that are old or shabby or common. Of two city men whose incomes are alike and whose families do not differ in size, one sends his wife and children to the country for the summer, while the other gives his family a short outing or none.

It would seem that there is no truth in the common theory that with equality of incomes and responsibilities all families would be alike prosperous and well-supplied, for the men who lack the comforts and luxuries enjoyed by their neighbors declare that they cannot afford them, nor can they understand how others succeed in getting them, unless by lucky speculations, or credit-stretching, or downright theft.

It may be that the lacking ones have secret yet noble uses for money in ways that their neighbors and critics know not of. They may be helping the poor, or contributing largely to religious associations, or saving money with which to endow college professorships, or they may be patriotically reducing the national debt by occasionally burning some greenbacks and destroying the ashes. They declare that they do not speculate, neither do they gamble, and their neighbors believe them. But if they do none of these things, and if "figures don't lie," how is it that they cannot afford the many things which they desire and which their no-richer acquaintances enjoy?

Among the articles largely desired and consumed by civilized beings of all classes are two of which men seldom deprive themselves solely on the ground that they can't afford them; these are liquors and cigars. It is certain that many well-meaning and reputable people who never were charged with excess consume so much of one or the other, or both, that the annual cost thereof must be quite large. Some persons—and, strangely enough, all of them non-users of these creature comforts—have taken the pains to compute the outlay on the moderate drinker's potations and the moderate smoker's cigars. The figures—which may not be entirely accurate—may be had by any one who is curious on the subject, and they may be manipulated so as to show that a week's supply of cigars, no matter how cheap, costs as much as a good book, a box of cigars as much as a framed picture or a sightly bit of bric-à-brac; and that the drinks of the man who never takes too much amount in a month to the price of a silk dress or a parlor rug, and that a boy could be kept at college a year with the money required for liquor and cigars by the man who uses both in moderation.

Is it possible that such figures explain the trouble of some respectable men who complain that they "can't afford it"?

The Opening of a New Era

HISTORY shows that it is difficult—if not, indeed, quite impossible—for any age to discern the true purport of its own activities. Old ideals control public thought and new ideals emerge from the efforts made to reconcile new conditions with the old ideals, but the process is so gradual that it generally escapes contemporary observation. It requires but little reflection to discover that this fact introduces a valuable principle of conservatism in social progress, so that great transformations can take place without any breach of social continuity. The difference between the United States of to-day and the United States of Washington's time is as great as the difference between the acorn and the oak, but the Republic is still that which the Fathers planted.

Nevertheless, though it is impossible to foretell what the future may bring forth, there are some events so significant that it is plain that they are turning points of destiny. Such an event was the Declaration of Independence, the importance of which was apparent to contemporary observers, although they were quite unable to measure that importance. Such an event was the war with Spain, which unquestionably marks the beginning of a new era in our national history, although its nature is yet to be developed and will hardly be disclosed until our posterity, with accomplished results before them, are in a position to appreciate what we are now doing.

One fact which has already made its way to the front of our politics is that the assumption of responsibilities for the government of distant countries and peoples produces vital reactions upon our domestic affairs. Questions of this order are now confronting Congress, and their political importance is becoming sharply manifest. But how great their importance we can hardly realize, although history warns us how vast the possibilities may be.

It is, however, no reproach to our politics that such vast issues are being dealt with in a spirit of opportunism, and that party positions are being taken rather with regard to present considerations of political expediency than upon a broad view of ultimate results. This is really the only safe process, for it keeps on the safe ground of practical experience and coördinates political development with social conditions. The impulse of expansion and the fear of imperialism are reciprocal forces in the working out of national destiny under the new conditions which have presented themselves, and the vigor of contention as to the true course of national policy is a far more hopeful augury of the future than would be a wave of enthusiasm for new ideals and new principles, sweeping the nation from its old habits of thought and action.

Making the Machine Work for Good

A POLITICAL reformer, prominent in a certain Western State, not long ago worked hard to control a campaign. He succeeded in getting control of the balance of power by sending out workers who secured pledges from voters to oppose the candidates blacklisted by a certain committee. When the list of tabooed ones appeared it was found to hold the names of certain candidates who had been looked upon as clean, honest men.

When asked why those men had been blacklisted, the reformer replied that they were members of a "combination," that a "combination" was a political "machine," and that his organization was radically opposed to all political "machinery." Then he launched his votes and won a victory. The organization he had perfected was a political "combination" and a political "machine." Yet the reformer did not realize that he had been inconsistent.

This condemnation of the political "machine" by the reformer is part of a general tendency of the mind to mistake the particular for the general, to condemn the general system because specific instances are worthy of condemnation.

Yet if much-desired reforms in politics are ever to be brought about, the usefulness of the "machine" method must be recognized by reformers. Let us suppose a certain element controls the politics of a great State. This element is known as the "machine." Reformers denounce it as corrupt. They are determined to throttle it and purify the State administration. They believe they can do this at the polls, and set to work. They find that speakers must be sent to enlighten the people. To do this money must be furnished for expenses, since not even reformers can often pay hotel bills out of their own pockets. So a committee is appointed to look after funds. Now it is seen that there must be some one to look after the press notices, some one else to organize a house-to-house canvass, a force to "get out the vote," and a score of other committees and individuals to do various necessary parts of the campaign work. These wants are met as they arise. Some one is assigned to each detail, and the organization becomes thorough and effective. But this organization is a "machine." Tell the reformers so and they will probably shake their heads at first. Then they will say:

"Perhaps it is a machine, but it is a GOOD MACHINE. It is not like the one we are working to destroy."

Now they are getting at the point. It was not "machines" they were fighting, but bad machines. To overthrow one bad "machine," which they had in mind, they organized a good one. They tell you they found it absolutely necessary to do so. They have done one of the things they complained about in the old machine; they have to a certain extent given up their individuality, for all organization entails a sacrifice of individuality. But they are likely to accomplish their purpose and they bless their "machine."

Luther complained that the devil had all the good tunes. So may good people complain that the demagogues and political villains have at least more than their share of the good political methods. It has been a mistake for the good people to allow this. It will be well for us if we stop talking against political organization and political "machines." Let us be specific, and cry out against bad machines. If we recognize the value of "machinery" in doing good and bringing about reform, and if we make use of it, we will hasten the millennium.

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES" That are Making HISTORY

JOHN HAY, SECRETARY OF STATE

The Live Interest of Solemn Documents

The longer we live the more we appreciate how little direct personal interest there is for the great majority of people in mere documents. If you were asked about your college diploma, there are 999 chances out of a thousand that you could not recall what it said, and certainly equal chances that you could not read it after you hunted it up. Take a more vital illustration, your marriage certificate—that is, if you are married—and the marriage license, if you contemplate that important and essential introduction to content and happiness. You do not recall what it says, nor are you particularly interested in the phraseology. You are satisfied simply because it represents the fact itself. You know you were graduated and you know that you were married or are going to be married, and the papers in the case do not bother you. It seems utterly illogical, but, at the same time, it shows human nature.

Thus in the treaties between nations, in the documents that represent the higher interests of civilization and politics, we find a lack of interest that would be incomprehensible did we not appreciate the attitude of the average citizen who knows that certain agreements have been reached, or are being reached, and is satisfied with the fact, and willing to leave the technical expression of it to the experts.

This apathy, however, cannot continue, for, as the world grows older, it is absolutely certain that treaties will be the great stepping-stones in its upward march. They not only summarize the progress that has gone before, but give the sure footings for forward movement. Indeed there are signs that the people are awakening to the value of these instruments. A fine illustration of this quickness of thought and understanding was shown when the new convention to supersede the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was made public. Within twenty-four hours there were editorial comments and interviews exhibiting a wonderfully wide and correct grasp of history and modern conditions, so that the complex question was brought to such a simplicity that it could be discussed at the dinner-table.

The Hard Lines of Modern Treaties

For nearly six hundred years treaties have been made, and each following the other has marked a change in the world's relations. For hundreds of years they were between sovereign states; the legislative body had nothing to do with it. To this day that is a fact in many countries, even in Great Britain. With us the treaty must have a two-thirds vote in the United States Senate, so that it is obliged to pass under the most critical and the most aggressive ordeal. It is the same way in France, and the time will undoubtedly come when no treaty will be made except with the consent of at least one branch of the legislative body of any nation. This has its advantages and disadvantages. Of course it delays action. There are many people in this country who believe that if the Senate had not been so long in confirming the treaty with Spain we should not have had the war with the Filipinos.

SENATOR MORGAN, OF ALABAMA

Diplomatists are notoriously suspicious of legislatures, but the legislature is as suspicious of diplomacy as diplomacy is distrustful of legislation. It is not pleasant for a State Department to bend its energies to a great achievement and then to have the whole thing attacked and possibly changed by newspapers and Senators. But in this age of publicity the delicate sensibilities of kid-gloved statesmanship must take knocks and shocks as part of the game.

The Clayton-Bulwer Treaty of Eighteen-Fifty

The original Clayton-Bulwer treaty was ratified in 1850. The rush of population to the Pacific Coast had shown the certainty of a canal across the isthmus. In 1849 this country entered into a treaty with Nicaragua for such a canal by way of Lake Nicaragua, but one end of it, Greytown, was occupied by British settlers, and Great Britain claimed a protectorate over the Mosquito Indians, who were supposed to own some territory in that neighborhood. The feeling ran high, and Mr. Clayton, who was Secretary of State, asked, through Sir H. L. Bulwer, the British Minister at Washington, that Great Britain withdraw her claims to the coast so as to permit the canal to be built under the joint control of the United States and Nicaragua. The British Government declined, but agreed to enter into a treaty for a joint protectorate over the canal. This was negotiated by Mr. Clayton and Sir H. L. Bulwer, and was signed at Washington April 19, 1850. Each nation declared that it would not obtain an exclusive control over the said ship canal, nor erect fortifications commanding the same, nor exercise any authority over any part of Central America.

This treaty never gave satisfaction, and six years ago Mr. Frelinghuysen, our Secretary of State, said in an official dispatch that the treaty was void. These were his words: "First, that the consideration of the treaty having failed, its object never having been accomplished, the United States did not receive that for which they covenanted; and second, that Great Britain has persistently violated her agreement not to colonize the Central American coast." Mr. Morgan in the Senate and Mr. Hepburn in the House introduced measures looking to absolute control of the canal by the United States.

The New Treaty for the Nicaragua Canal

On February 5, 1900, John Hay, the Secretary of State, and Lord Pauncefote, the British Ambassador, signed a new treaty to supersede the Clayton-Bulwer convention. This agreed:

1. That "the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States."

2. That "the canal shall be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of equity, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

3. "No fortifications shall be erected commanding the canal or the water adjacent. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness or disorder.

4. "The canal shall never be blockaded, and vessels of war of the belligerents shall not take stores in it except so far as it may be strictly necessary."

Of course, the formal document comprises numerous articles and many sections, but the points enumerated above contain the gist of the convention. The opposition was mainly upon the prohibition of fortifications. To the British contention that it was placing the canal on the same basis as the Suez Canal, it was pointed out that Great Britain commands all the approaches to the Suez Canal, and has provided well for its use if war should occur. It was further stated that Great Britain, in her West India possessions, possessed the nearest base to the Nicaragua Canal. In addition to all that, it was claimed that Great Britain had already nullified the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and that this new negotiation was in no sense necessary.

Thus the contest began and continued in the newspapers and in Congress. According to the agreement made between Messrs. Hay and Pauncefote, the ratification shall be exchanged at Washington or at London within six months from the date of signature, which fixes the limit of time at July 5.

The Two Great Republics Getting Closer Together

The Dingley Tariff Act gave to diplomacy the making of certain commercial conventions that would place the products of the United States on a better footing. Five treaties were made with Great Britain, all relating to the British West India Islands. The sixth and the most important was with France. This was in line with the declaration of Section IV of the tariff law, giving the President power to renew reciprocity treaties, so that American products might be placed on the same equality with those of the most favored nations.

The negotiations between the United States and France lasted nearly two years. This country secured concessions on 644 heads, the rates being on an average of about twenty per cent. below those of the general tariff of France. France secured from this country important concessions on over one hundred of her chief products, the reductions ranging from five to twenty per cent. A long fight was made to secure lower rates on French wines, but this failed.

Without going into technical details, it may be said that the new treaty placed the products of the United States on the same basis in France as the products of Great Britain and Germany, while heretofore our products have had to pay the maximum rates. An idea of the change is seen in respect to petroleum and mineral oils. By this treaty the saving in duties will each year reach five millions of dollars.

A great many business questions are involved in the treaty, and it may have a hard time both at Washington and at Paris. It represents a vast amount of work and negotiation, however, and the men who made it will do all they can to save it, even though it be amended.

SIR JULIAN PAUNCEFOTE, BRITISH AMBASSADOR

A Great Treaty that Got Through Safely

One important treaty, the greatest of its kind the world has ever known, has succeeded in getting through without the usual difficulties. It is the famous peace and arbitration treaty made at The Hague last year. This treaty is a convention among the nations of the earth, and the fact that nearly all of them have signed it gives it a unique place in the annals of mankind. The usual methods of ratification had to be modified in order to meet the peculiar conditions. In the case of the United States the acceptance of it by a two-thirds vote in the Senate and by the President's signature is followed by the deposit of the document at The Hague by the United States Minister. The usual exchange that attends treaties could not be carried out very well in this case, and The Hague authorities will simply notify each Power who is party to the treaty of the fact of ratification.

One point in this new treaty is of vast importance to this country. It is a special amendment stipulating that the United States shall not be required by the treaty to depart from the policy of not interfering with the political affairs of foreign states, and further saying, "Nor shall anything contained in the said convention be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of America of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions." In other words, in signing The Hague treaty our Government did not sign away the Monroe Doctrine.

Another interesting point is that this new treaty provides a few pleasant offices for distinguished statesmen. Within the next few months the President will name four persons, of known competency in questions of international law, to serve as the representatives of the United States on the permanent board created by the treaty. The term of service is six years, and of course the compensation—no definite salary is mentioned—will be very liberal. The expenses of the International Bureau will be shared by the different nations.

Leading Questions Still to Be Settled

There are other great treaties that will be concluded within the next few years. Although the United States, by a happy stroke of diplomacy, secured in China the open door for the world, and now possesses the promises of the Powers to that effect in writing, there will be a treaty or a series of treaties summarizing and perfecting the work.

The matter that promises the greatest difficulty for us is the Alaskan boundary line. The question at issue has not been settled, in spite of the work of able commissioners.

There is a modus vivendi which does not give Canada the seaport that she wants, and it is quite certain that she will insist upon her great ambition, and that the English Government will do all it can to help her. It is quite likely, however, that this matter will be held in abeyance until England is not so busy in other parts of the world. It has been freely stated that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty has some bearing on the Alaskan situation, and this had much to do with opposition to it. England's friendship is not doubted, but nobody is sure when making treaties or trading horses.

The GRIP of HONOR

DRAWN BY WILL CRAWFORD

Seventh Chapter

THERE are only two men-of-war in the whole lot."

"Right, Yer Honor; that 'un near the shore thereaway looks like a big frigate. That'll be the Serapis, I'm thinkin'."

"Yes, and that one farther out the Scarborough."

"Aye, aye, sir; an' all the rest of 'em is merchantmen. There ain't a gun on board any of 'em. Nice pickin's them'll be fur us poor sailormen arter we dispose of them war-vessels. Dash my wig, jist think of them fat traders, an' we a-rummagin' among 'em——"

"That will do, Price. Just moderate your transports a little," said the officer, stepping forward to the brow of the hill and taking another long look at the harbor.

"I ain't no transport," muttered the garrulous old man under his breath; "I won't carry no soldiers nowhere. I'm a man-o'-war, I am"; but he took good care that his superior should not hear these somewhat insubordinate remarks.

"Well," said the latter, turning about after his close scrutiny, "I think we have ascertained about all we have come for. They are the Baltic convoy, without doubt, and you would better make a straight course for the ship at once and report."

"An' you, sir?" asked the old man respectfully. "Won't you come along, sir? I hate to cut cable an' leave you here adrift alone, Yer Honor."

"No," answered the officer after a reflective pause, "I think I shall go up to that castle on the bluff beyond and find out a little more definitely as to the situation, if possible. Meanwhile, do you get on your horse and ride back to Bridlington Bay. Go aboard the Alert; tell Mr. Lunt from me to join the Richard to the southward at once, and notify Captain Jones of what we have seen. Tell him I think it will be perfectly safe for him to come on, for there is a great fleet of merchant ships here with only two ships of war. I will find some means to join him at the rendezvous before the rest of the ships can assemble and they can get under way. Now, bear a hand; don't let the grass grow under your keel."

"Oh, Yer Honor, have I got to git on board that 'ere four-legged craft ag'in?" said old Price ruefully.

Editor's Note—The Grip of Honor began in The Saturday Evening Post of February 24.

"That's what you have to do, my lad," remarked the officer cheerfully.

"Seems like somethin's wrong with him," said the old sailor. "A animal wot steers by the head is contrary like to Natur'. Now, if I could only git him to go about on t'other tack, or wear him, by shiftin' his tail, I'd understand him perfectly, but this 'ere tiller-rope business over his bows is wot gits me; an', sir, I can't make out with them 'ere stirrups, nuther; it's like hangin' on to the yardarm in a tossin' sea without no footropes. Howsomever, if I must, I must, I guess."

"Oh, you won't mind it," replied the officer, laughing at the old man's rueful face; "besides, the wind's fair, and you'll be going free most of the way. Just give him a touch of your weather heel and you'll soon make the harbor."

"I never thought about the wind," said the veteran gunner thoughtfully, his face brightening as he turned and listened for it. "Yer Honor's right. 'Twill be plain sailin'. Well, sir, anchors a-weigh and here goes."

The old seaman, giving great evidence of his disinclination, in spite of the favoring breeze, at last climbed upon the back of his staid old horse, and, resisting the temptation to give him his direction by a pull of the tail, got under way and lurched rapidly down the road. Left to himself, the Lieutenant mounted his own horse—surprising to state, for a sailor, he was an excellent horseman—and rode down toward the sleeping town nestled around Scarborough harbor, where a large fleet of merchant ships, convoyed by two men-of-war, rode quietly at their anchors.

Opposite the acclivity on which the two men had stood, and to the north of the town, rose a bold headland, or scar, almost an island, to the height of about three hundred feet. The rugged crest was crowned by a picturesque old castle. The headland jutted out boldly into the sea, and the wild waters dashed upon its walls from every side. Access to the castle was by means of a causeway and bridge springing over a rocky and otherwise impassable connection between the cliff and the mainland, which was sometimes flooded at high tide.

Portions of the castle were in bad repair, or had been dismantled in the several wars in which it had played a memorable part since its erection in 1136 by a follower of William the Conqueror; but a large part of it was still habitable, and had been provided with a sufficient garrison. A heavy water battery, which had been placed in position during the rebellion in 1745, had been strengthened and reënforced recently.

Captain Jones, in the Bon Homme Richard, had been cruising around the coasts of the British Islands for some time. He had heard of the expected arrival of the Baltic fleet in these waters, and had presumed that they would make Scarborough harbor. Word had been received from a small trader he had overhauled that a large number of ships had assembled in that harbor, and in order to ascertain whether he might safely attack them with his small nondescript squadron he had accepted the voluntary services of Lieutenant O'Neill, seconded by Gunner Price, of the Bon Homme Richard.

They had gone on ahead of the squadron in the cutter Alert, and had landed below Flamborough headland, and had ridden thence to Scarborough to ascertain the facts. The Alert was to carry the news back to Jones, who was on the Richard, farther down the coast, and the vessels of his squadron were all to assemble a day or two later in Bridlington Bay, a small and unimportant town with a good harbor, within easy reach of the expected prey. Should the report of the scouts be favorable, the squadron would proceed at once to attack the convoy.

On their journey to Scarborough O'Neill had ascertained from a passing countryman that Lord Westbrooke was still Governor of the castle, and he at once surmised that Lady Elizabeth Howard would probably be there with her guardian. More than twice the year he had asked for from her had elapsed, and many untoward circumstances had prevented him from carrying out his plan of seeking her; but she had ever been in his heart, and time and separation had but intensified his love. The mercurial Irishman had been deeply smitten by the English beauty, and the constancy of his devotion evidenced the depth of the impression made.

When Jones had returned with the Ranger from his first successful cruise, he and his officers had been feted and made much of by the French Court. The gallant adventures in which he had participated lent a new charm to the fascinating personality of the son of the old Marshal, whose social position was already everything that could be desired, and his heart accordingly had been a target for repeated attacks upon the part of the bright-eyed and fascinating dames of France—but to no avail.

Something of the story of his devotion had been allowed to leak out, however, to account for his obduracy, and they finally understood why he was so unusually insensible to their charms. This romance only added a piquancy to the feminine pursuit of which he was the object, although the ladies' sportive love chase proved in the end unavailing. He had resolved, O'Neill said, to show the world that unusual spectacle, a constant Irishman! That was to attempt the impossible, had been the quick reply, but nevertheless he had accomplished it.

Our Celtic mariner continued in the American service—not that he cared particularly for America, for democratic doctrines could never be acceptable to a follower of the young Stuart and the intimate associate of the young nobles of France; but first because he saw in it renewed opportunities to annoy and humiliate the stout Hanoverian whom he and his people hated, and from whom they had received much harm; and second, because he was so much attracted by the strong personality of Paul Jones. So great had become his regard for this wonderful man that he had even waived considerations of rank in favor of an American, the gallant Richard Dale, and had consented to serve as Second Lieutenant, instead of First, on the Richard, when that famous ship and her ill-assorted consorts started forth upon the memorable cruise.

The tacticians of the French Navy, unfortunately, were not given to consider downright hard fighting as the end and aim of naval enterprise. Their manœuvres were calculated to annoy and harass the enemy, but their first thought was not to destroy his ships, but to protect their own—a fatal mistake in policy from which they have ever suffered. This was not John Paul Jones' way. Whatever else he was, he was a fighter from the beginning to the end, and O'Neill found in him a congenial spirit.

The lovelorn Irishman had tried several times to communicate with Lady Elizabeth by letter and messenger, but without success, for he received no reply to his letters, and his messengers had never returned. Therefore, when he found himself in such close proximity to her as on this occasion, Tuesday evening, the twenty-first of September, 1779, he was utterly unable to resist the temptation at least to try to see her again. Jones and the ships were not due at the rendezvous until Thursday morning. There would be ample time to rejoin them on Wednesday.

O'Neill imagined himself perfectly safe; he had worn no disguise except the uniform of a French naval officer, and as France and England were nominally at peace he persuaded himself that he was in no danger. This failure to return promptly to his ship was a breach of naval propriety, he admitted, of course, but nothing more, and for that he was willing to suffer.

With the delightful casuistry of lovers he persuaded himself against his better judgment and failed to see his action in its true military significance. Trusting to audacity, mother wit, and Dan Cupid for protection, he went bravely on. In fact, he was taking his life in his hand. Meanwhile, with a beating heart—beating not from fear, but with anticipation—he rode slowly down the hill and into the town, where he left his horse at an inn and made his way on foot, and supperless, such was his eagerness, toward the castle.

He had no definite plan. There did not seem to be room for any. He had one consuming desire—to see, to speak to, to come in touch again with the beautiful girl who had been the object of his every thought, the end of his every desire, the spirit of his every dream since they had met. He had a thought—a hope—that she was still Elizabeth Howard. There was that in her promise, in her look, in her word when she had said, "Come and see," on the strand, which gave him the hope that she would wait until he did come, be it one year or two; and with the sanguine spirit of his race he could not prepare himself for a disappointment.

The moon had risen when he walked quietly through the town and began to mount the hill. He did not know how to gain admittance to the castle when he approached it, and, as ill luck would have it, as he was standing on the causeway looking toward the gate he was approached by a squad of soldiers under the command of a Sergeant, who were returning from an errand in the town. His meditations, as he stood gazing at the lights shining from the different windows, wondering behind which wall was ensconced the idol of his heart, were rudely interrupted by the grasp of a rough hand upon his shoulder and a harsh voice in his ear saying:

"Well, sir, wot are you a-doin' 'ere at this hour of the night? Entrance to the castle is forbid to every one except members of the garrison, or them which has passes. No one is allowed on the causeway after sunset, even. There is so many tales of raidin's on the coast by that bloody, ravagin' pirate, Jones, an' his bleedin' gang, that we're a'most in a state of siege. Give an account of yourself."

"My friend," began O'Neill calmly, glancing rapidly about him and giving up at once any idea of resistance, for he was surrounded by at least a dozen men, "my friend," he said, speaking in broken English, with a well-simulated French accent, "I am an officer of the King of France, traveling for pleasure through your great country. I hear of the old castle—I wish to see it—hence I come here. I have done nothing—you will let me go free?"

"A Frenchman?"

"Yes, monsieur, I have that honor."

"Well, that settles it. You've got to come along with us now. A frog-eatin' Frenchman's our natural-born enemy."

"But monsieur, there is no war between my master and your King."

"Don't monshur me. I don't take no palaverin', an' I don't know whether there is war or not," retorted the Sergeant brusquely; "but we always did hate the bloody Frenchies, an' we always will, an' whenever we ketch one of 'em around here he's got to give an account of hisself. But if you come along peaceable like, all right—we won't hurt you. If you don't, we'll just pick you up an' carry you. You can take your chice," he added indifferently.

A horseman galloping in from the town at this moment drew rein in front of the little group.

"Ah! Sergeant, what is that? Whom have you there?" he queried sharply.

"'Tis a Frenchman, sir. We found him a-prowlin' round here. He's a spy, I takes it," answered the Sergeant, saluting, but still retaining his grasp.

"Pardon me, monsieur," said O'Neill; "I am no spy. I am a gentleman of France, as I explained to this man. I travel—come here to see the castle——"

"Well, sir, I can assist you to attain your end," interrupted the Lieutenant on the horse; "and since you desire to see the castle, perhaps you would not object to a look at it from the inside."

"As a prisoner, monsieur?"

"Well, I am sorry you put it that way, but I shall be compelled to turn you over to the Governor."

"But I protest, monsieur!"

"You can protest to the Admiral if you wish—the Governor, I mean—for you will have to come along now under the circumstances. We hear that Scots buccaneer, Paul Jones, is off the coast, and we don't know when he might strike or whom he might send on shore. We can't be too careful."

"Very well, monsieur; I come," said O'Neill, shrugging his shoulders and resigning himself to the inevitable.

"That's good," answered the young officer. "Bring him along, Sergeant."

"Yes, Leftenant. Now, you Johnnie, right about face, march!"

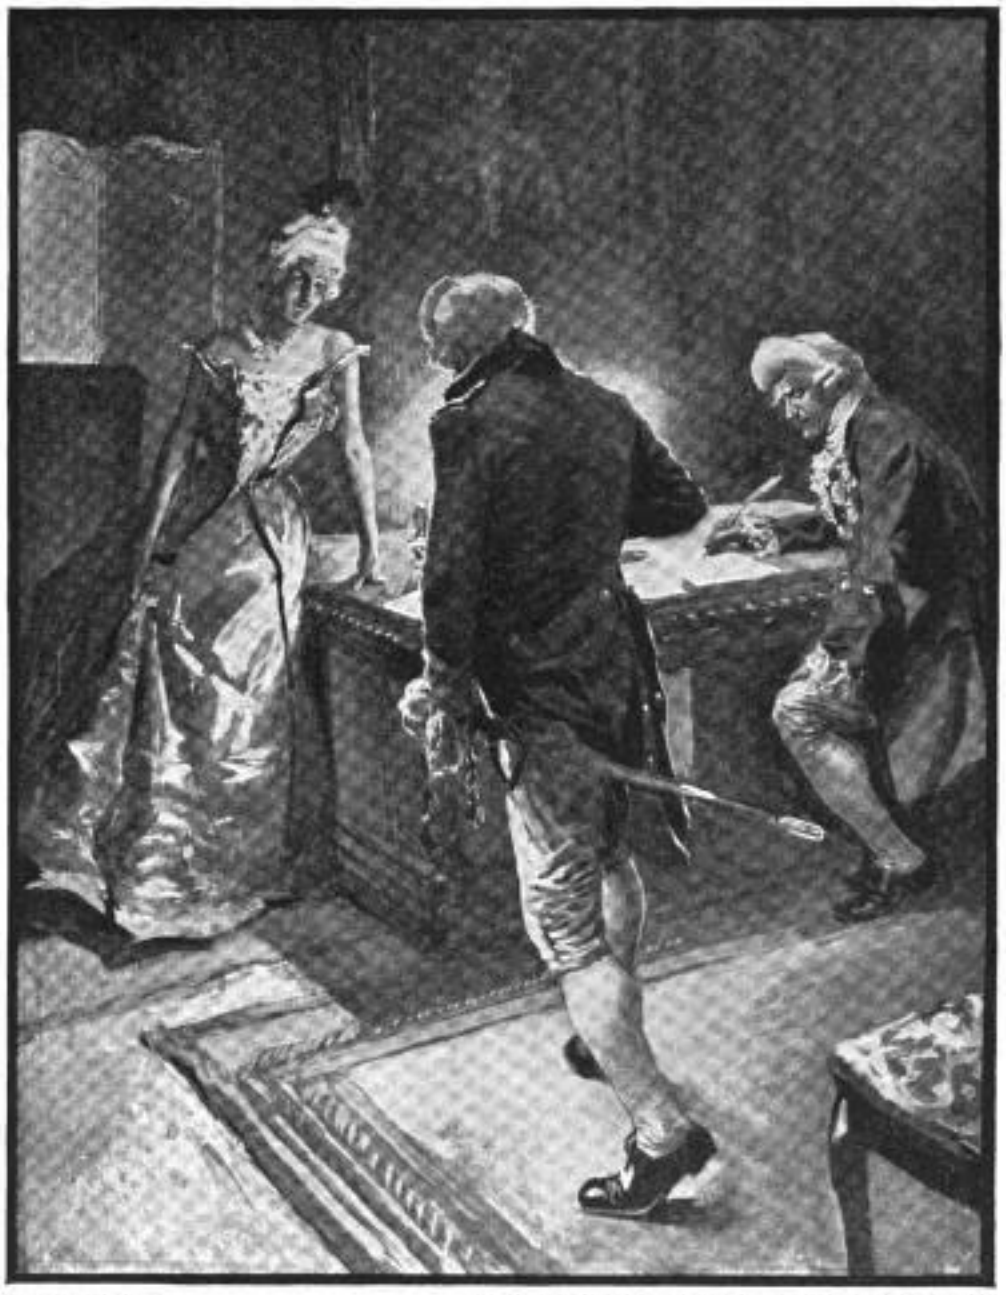
It was in this unexpected and undignified manner that O'Neill gained entrance to the castle. As they walked beneath the great gates of the gloomy fortress, his heart, in spite of the serious nature of his position, gave a bound of elation. This reckless young man had as yet no other thought than that by every step he had been brought a little nearer to his divinity. If other thoughts had come it is doubtful if he would have allowed them to stop him now. As the party halted in the courtyard, while the Lieutenant dismounted and hastened to apprise the Governor of the capture, he even ventured most imprudently to ask the Sergeant if Lady Elizabeth Howard was in the castle.

"She is," replied that astonished functionary. "Wot's that to you, I'd like to know?"

Eighth Chapter

BEFORE he could answer an order came for the prisoner to be brought forward. After ascending a flight of worn stone steps and going through a long, dark passage, a great door was thrown open and he was confronted by a blaze of light which dazzled him at first, until, his eyes becoming accustomed to the illumination, he realized that he stood on the threshold of a splendid hall in the old keep which had possibly once been the banqueting hall of the castle. Long lancet windows upon one side, their leaded frames filled with rich painted glass, looked out upon the sea beating ceaselessly upon the bluff below and filling the room with a subdued murmur.

The room was massively and splendidly furnished with heavy antique furniture. The stone walls were covered with hangings of rich old tapestry from the famous looms of Arras. Here and there were portraits of distinguished members of the Westbrooke family—women renowned for their beauty, or men who, holding the castle at different times, had made their names famous by their bravery and skill. The prisoner's feet sank into a thick, soft, luxurious carpet stretched upon the stone flags of the old floor.



Writing at a large table standing near the centre of the room and covered with candelabra sat a bewigged old man of commanding presence, dressed in a naval uniform covered with orders and stars bespeaking high rank. Farther away, with her back turned to the light and to the door by which O'Neill had entered, a young woman sat apparently reading intently. One glance at the graceful curve of her neck and the exquisite poise of her head told him it was she. Forgetful of everything else, he would have stepped forward had it not been for the restraining hand of the Sergeant.

"The prisoner, M'Lud!" said the latter, saluting.

The Admiral continued his writing a moment, and then looking up fixed his eyes keenly upon the young man. His first glance told him that he had to deal with no ordinary prisoner. He arose at once and bowed with the courtesy of a finished gentleman.

"Have the goodness to step forward, sir, and be seated," he said, pointing to a chair. "Sergeant, remain on guard where you are."

With an equally low bow to the older man, O'Neill took a few steps in his direction, and sat down on the chair in front of the Admiral, facing him and the woman beyond, who, still intent upon her book, had not yet noticed his entrance.

"THE MARQUIS DE RICHEMONT, AT YOUR SERVICE, MADAM," O'NEILL INTERRUPTED QUICKLY

Prisoners being every-day occurrences at the castle in these troublous times, they had ceased to interest her; but the unusual complaisance of the old man, as expressed by his voice and manner, attracted her attention, and she looked up from the book, though without turning her head, and listened.

"I am sorry to subject you to any annoyance, sir," continued the Admiral, "but the rules are very strict, and I must abide by my own regulations. We apprehend a descent upon our coast by the notorious pirate, John Paul Jones"—O'Neill started and bit his lip, but said nothing—"and it is my duty to take unusual precautions. I must ask your name, your station, and business here."

"I am the——" began O'Neill quietly, but with his glance fixed on the powdered head showing over the chair-back opposite him.

There was a revolution at the other side of the table. Lady Elizabeth sprang to her feet with a hurried exclamation, dropped her book to the floor, turned quickly and stepped toward the other two. O'Neill rose also.

How beautiful she looked, en grande tenue, her hair rolled high and powdered, jewels sparkling about her snowy throat, the soft, white neck which rose from the pale blue silk of her corsage, the——

"It is——" she cried.

"The Marquis de Richemont, at your service, madam," O'Neill interrupted quickly, bowing low before her lest in her surprise she should betray him.

"What is the meaning of this, Elizabeth? Do you know this man?" asked the Admiral in great astonishment.

"Every traveler," smilingly interrupted O'Neill—striving to give Elizabeth time to collect herself—with the appearance of the greatest sang-froid himself, though his heart was beating so rapidly he could scarce maintain his composure, "on these islands has heard of the beauty of Lady Elizabeth Howard. Her reputation as a woman of charms has been extended to the Continent, whence I come. It was in the hope of seeing her that I walked up toward the castle this evening. I have not the honor of her acquaintance, monsieur."

"Do you know this gentleman, Elizabeth?" persisted the Admiral sternly, his suspicions aroused by her actions.

There was evidently some mystery about his coming, and the girl was quick to see that to proclaim O'Neill's name and occupation would probably place him in an embarrassing position, to say the least. She recovered herself by a great effort and, turning away languidly, remarked with well-assumed carelessness:

"I? Certainly not, sir; I have never heard of the Marquis de Richemont before in my life." The last statement was absolutely correct, the Irishman's rank having been kept strictly in abeyance. O'Neill shrugged his shoulders and extended his hands in confirmation of her words.

"Why that scream, then, and that surprise, madam?" questioned the still unconvinced Admiral.

"I know not, sir; I must have been dreaming, and the sound of a strange voice startled me."

"Beg pardon, M'Lud," said the Sergeant, saluting; "Yer Worship, he axed if Lady Elizabeth Howard lived 'ere w'en he was down in the courtyard."

"Silence, sirrah!" thundered the old Admiral, who allowed no one to entertain doubts of his ward but himself. "Do you mean to imply that Lady Elizabeth has knowledge of this gentleman?"

"Oh, Sergeant!" said the girl, clasping her hands and looking at the old veteran with all the fascination of which she was capable.

"No, Yer Ludship; no, sir. Of course not; certainly not, Yer Honor," returned the man in great confusion. "I spoke by way of showin' that's wot he come for."

"It was in pursuance of my desire to see so great a beauty that I asked the question, monsieur."

"Sir, your admiration does me too much honor," said Elizabeth, curtsying.

"I make up for the fact that your reputation does Your Ladyship too little, then, mademoiselle," he answered.

"Enough of this!" said the Admiral impatiently; "the girl is well enough, but you didn't come here to look at her, did you?"

"On my honor as a gentleman, monsieur, for no other purpose."

"Well, give some account of yourself otherwise, and perhaps if it be satisfactory, as you have accomplished that purpose, I may send you on your way rejoicing," said the Admiral, amused at the extravagance of the young man.

"No man could leave the presence of Lady Elizabeth Howard rejoicing, sir."

"Confound you, sir," cried the Governor testily, "are you going to stand there and bandy compliments all day, like a French dancing-master?"

"I have nothing further to urge for my words, My Lord, when my excuse stands in your very presence."

The Governor looked at the two young people in great perplexity.

"I fear, my dear Marquis de Richemont," said he ironically, "unless you can give some more coherent account of yourself I shall be under the painful necessity of having you locked up, in which case the only divinity you will be allowed to gaze upon will be the lovely face and figure of yonder Sergeant."

"Yes, Yer Ludship——" remarked the Sergeant grimacing.

"Silence, sirrah!" thundered the Admiral again.

"My Lord," answered O'Neill, smiling, "it is very simple. I am an officer in the Navy of the King of France, making a tour of England for pleasure. I came here to this town this evening. I hear of the great Admiral, Lord Westbrooke, in his great castle, and the beauty of his ward, Lady Elizabeth Howard. I am a lover of the beautiful. I stand on the causeway gazing at the castle. Your soldiers arrest me and bring me here. I rejoice to find the Lady Elizabeth even more beautiful than I have dreamed. Two years have only intensified her charms——"

"Two years! Dreams, sir! What mean you by that, pray? What have the years to do with the matter? Did you see her two years ago?" cried the Admiral suspiciously again.

O'Neill started; it was a fatal slip, but he hastened to repair it as best he could.

"I have seen her picture, sir."

"And where, pray, have you seen her picture?"

"In the possession of an English officer, a friend of mine whom I met at Liverpool two years ago," answered O'Neill audaciously.

"And who was this English officer, pray, who displayed my picture?" interrupted Elizabeth with an appearance of great agitation.

"Major Edward Coventry, mademoiselle."

"Oh! Edward! Why, God bless me!" said the Admiral genially, "he is my son. Do you mean to tell me you are a friend of his? Why didn't you say so before?"

"I had the honor of his acquaintance," said O'Neil, bowing gravely, "on one very interesting and memorable occasion, indeed, when he was on duty at the Château Birkenhead, I believe."

"Yes, that would be about two years ago. Sir, in that case you are very welcome to this castle," said the Admiral; "and now I beg leave to present you in due and proper form to my ward. Lady Elizabeth Howard, permit me to introduce to you the Marquis de Richemont."

"I am charmed to have the pleasure of meeting the Marquis," responded the girl, smiling and curtsying deeply.

"The pleasure and honor are mine, mademoiselle," remarked O'Neill, fully entering into the comedy.

"And," continued the Admiral, "as my son, Major Edward Coventry, has sent me word he will be here shortly, you can renew your acquaintance with him."

It was as if he had exploded a bombshell in the room.

"What! Edward coming here?" cried Elizabeth, her voice filled with terror, which she vainly endeavored to conceal. "What for? Why did you not tell me?"

"He desired to surprise you, my dear," answered the Admiral, wondering at her agitation. "You know your wedding takes place next week."

"Ah, a wedding!" said O'Neill, starting and looking at Elizabeth. "Mademoiselle is then to marry?"

"Yes, your friend, Major Coventry," replied the old man. "An old engagement."

"I refused to marry him for a year, and for six months more. I waited all that time. There was no word," she said slowly to O'Neill, as if each word were wrung from her by his intent look, her pale cheeks flooding with color.

"Have you taken leave of your senses, Elizabeth?" continued the Admiral in great surprise; "of what interest to a stranger is your—er—maidenly hesitation?"

"Anything which concerns so fair a lady is of deep interest to your humble servant," answered O'Neill ironically and bitterly. The comedy had gone, tragedy, as ever, following hard upon.

A door at the rear of the room was opened softly at this moment, and a young man in the brilliant scarlet uniform of a British officer entered and stepped lightly toward them. His glance fell first upon the speaker.

"Barry O'Neill, by Heavens!" he exclaimed, springing eagerly forward with outstretched hand. "How came you here?" For a moment the young soldier was oblivious to the presence of his father and his betrothed. His untimely entrance filled the room with apprehension and dismay.

Ninth Chapter

"O'NEILL!" said the Admiral in much bewilderment. "Edward, this is your friend, the Marquis de Richemont."

DRAWN BY WILL CRAWFORD

"It had to come, an' it's too late to be mended now," said the Sergeant philosophically

"Edward, do not speak!" cried Lady Elizabeth distractedly.

"Ah, Elizabeth, my love and duty to you; but not speak? About what, pray? What mean you?"

"Is this gentleman, the Marquis de Richemont, your friend or not, sir? Cease this by-play, Elizabeth. I will have an explanation," demanded the now thoroughly aroused Admiral.

"My friend; quite so," returned Major Coventry smiling. "Though I was ignorant that he was a Marquis, he is none the less welcome. I am exceedingly glad to see him again. You, too, I presume, Elizabeth?"

"Glad even as you are," she replied deliberately, now seeing that further concealment was useless.

"But you called him O'Neill," continued the Admiral.

"That is my name, sir," said O'Neill calmly, recognizing the uselessness of further evasion. "I am one of the Irish O'Neills, formerly of County Clare, now in the service of the King of France." He could not have said it more proudly had he been the King himself.

"The last time I saw you you were on the Ranger, that American Continental ship," continued Coventry.

"As a prisoner?" cried the Admiral.

"As an officer, My Lord," answered the Irishman.

"What, sir! And now you are——"

"Second Lieutenant of the American Continental ship, Bon Homme Richard, Captain John Paul Jones, at your service," was the dauntless reply.

"Good gad!" said the Admiral; "is it possible? And you, Elizabeth, you have deceived me also; you knew this man?"

"Yes, sir; but not as the Marquis de Richemont."

"You have met this gentleman before?"

"Yes, sir."

"Where, may I ask, and when?"

"About a year and a half ago, sir. You remember when the Maidstone was wrecked? He saved me from death then, and after Captain Jones put me ashore, you know——"

"He spared my life, too, as well, sir, at that time," said Coventry.

"You seem to be a good hand at saving lives, Lieutenant O'Neill, Marquis de Richemont; perhaps you can think of some way of saving your own," retorted the Admiral sarcastically.

"'Tis useless to me now, My Lord, and not worth the saving," answered the young man calmly; "but I would not have you mar the approaching nuptials of your son and ward by an execution. Let me at least live until after the wedding. I shall be more willing to die then," he added softly.

"You came here for what purpose?" continued the Admiral, disregarding the latter words of the young man as utterly irrelevant.

"To find out the number and force and disposition of the ships in the harbor."

"At the instance of——"

"Captain Jones, sir."

"The murdering pirate!"

"I have resented such language and proved its falsity upon the person of your son, sir," O'Neill burst out, stepping forward with hand on sword; "shall I impose the same lesson on the father?"

"You are a prisoner, sir," said the Admiral imperturbably, "and are here at my pleasure to receive, not to give, lessons. Stand back, sir! Sergeant, bring in a file of men for a guard. Deliver up your sword at once, sir, to Major Coventry."

"Your Lordship is master here; I obey," answered the Irishman, shrugging his shoulders, and, drawing his sword, he tendered it to Major Coventry, who stepped forward reluctantly to receive it.

"Father," he said respectfully, "so far as my knowledge goes, Captain Jones is certainly a gentleman. Had it not been for his magnanimity and that of my friend—I may still call you that, sir?"

"I am vastly honored, sir, I am sure."

"My friend, the Marquis de Richemont, you would be childless to-day. Had it not been for the courage of this gentleman, Lady Elizabeth here——"

"Oh, sir," cried Elizabeth impetuously, "they are men of honor. I pray you enlarge this officer and let him go free; nay, never shake your head; I ask it as a wedding gift."

"My liberty your wedding gift, mademoiselle? Never!" put in O'Neill firmly.

"Say no more, either of you," said the Admiral decisively. "You, sir, came here as an enemy—a spy."

"Not so, sir. I came here in the uniform of a French officer."

"But that is not the uniform of the flag under which you now serve," continued the Admiral keenly. "You may secure some consideration, however, at my hands, as representing His Majesty the King, God bless him, by revealing the circumstances and plans and the ultimate purpose of your rebellious Captain."

"Clearly an impossible proposition," said O'Neill, bowing.

"But stop," said the Admiral; "now that I recall it, you gave me your word of honor that you came here to see this lady."

"And that is true, sir. I might have escaped to my ship with ease, in possession of the information I desired to get, but I came up to the castle to see her."

"A most foolish excursion, sir; and why, pray?"

"Because I love her," said O'Neill calmly.

"What!" cried Coventry, in great surprise and dismay. "Did you know this, Elizabeth?"

"Is a woman ever ignorant of the feelings she excites in a lover's breast, sir?" O'Neill answered for her.

"And have you—did you——" continued Coventry, looking still at Elizabeth.

"Lady Elizabeth has done nothing, sir. No word of affection has ever crossed her lips—to me, at least," again replied O'Neill. "She wouldn't even wait."

"Oh, but she did," interrupted Coventry jealously; "a year—six months—she tried to postpone her wedding for six months more. I begin to understand."

"Peace, Edward!" said Elizabeth, trembling violently.

"The Marquis de Richemont is—is nothing to me—can never be anything to me, that is. The wedding shall proceed at the appointed date, I give you my word. It was the wish of my mother, the wish of the Admiral, your wish——"

"And yours, also, dearest Elizabeth, is it not?" said Coventry, taking her hand entreatingly. She hesitated and stood silent.

"Have me executed at once, sir, in mercy and pity," said O'Neill to the Admiral; "let it be now—the sooner the better. This I cannot stand; 'tis too much."

"Not so," replied the Admiral gravely. "I will consider the matter further, and consult with you again. Meanwhile, if you will give me your parole I will allow you the freedom of the castle."

"Parole! 'Tis given, sir. Faith, I hardly think you could drive me away."

"That's well," returned the Admiral. "Sergeant, call my steward and have him assign chambers to the Marquis de Richemont. Coventry, I presume you will place your wardrobe at his disposal in case he needs anything. Now the Marquis will doubtless wish to retire. We will see him in the morning. Come, Elizabeth. Good-night, sir; the Sergeant will attend to your wants."

"Lord Westbrooke, I thank you. Major Coventry, your servant. Lady Elizabeth, I wish you joy on your wedding; good-night," replied the young man, bowing to each of them in succession.

As the Admiral and the others left the room the young Lieutenant sank down on his chair and put his head on his hands upon the table. The old Sergeant, who had seen it all, watched him a moment in silence. Walking up to him finally, and laying his hand on his shoulder with the familiarity of a privileged character, he said:

"Come now, sir; be a soldier."

"You can give no worse advice than that to a sailor, my friend," replied O'Neill, rising and smiling in spite of his misery. "Lead on; I will follow," he added.

As they passed down the great hall, the eyes of the wretched Lieutenant fell upon a large picture hanging rather low on the wall in a far corner above a dais near the doorway. It was the picture of a beautiful woman in the fashion of some fifty years back. She was seated in a great carved oak chair, the counterpart of, and evidently painted from, one standing beneath it. In face and feature the portrait was a striking likeness of Lady Elizabeth Howard. The skill of the painter had been so great, the colors had been so nicely chosen, so delicately laid on, that in the flickering, uncertain candlelight, which left this part of the room in a rather deep shadow, the picture actually seemed to breathe. O'Neill stopped as if petrified.

"Come along, sir," said the Sergeant gruffly, after a moment's silence.

"A moment, if you please, my friend—a moment. What sort of a man are you to pass by such as this without notice? It should be Lady Elizabeth, but the fashion of the dress——"

"It's her mother, sir, a cousin of the Admiral. I pass it every day, sir, and I've got so I don't take no notice on it no more. She was a young thing, scarce older than her young leddyship, when she set for that paintin', an' they had no children for years, leastways they all died, till this baby was born, an' then she died, too. I've been attached to the Admiral's service in one way or another sence I was a boy, an' dandled her many a time on my knee. Yes, an' her young leddyship, Lady Elizabeth that is, too, w'en she was a little girl."

"My regard for you goes up a thousandfold, my friend," said O'Neill, smiling. "I could almost envy you your opportunities. Would I had been you!"

"'Tain't no use wishin' that," said the old Sergeant, shaking his head; "there never was no Frenchman could ever take my place."

"Quite right," replied O'Neill, smiling; "'twould be clearly impossible."

"Come along, then, Yer Honor."

"Stay a moment," returned the enraptured Irishman, "a year at gaze would not sate me with the beauty of this picture. How like is the fair image," murmured the entranced young man, approaching nearer and fairly holding his breath under the influence of the moment. He stretched out his hand toward the painting with a little reverential gesture.

"Look out, sir!" said the Sergeant warningly; "the picture hangs very loose, an' the frame——"

What evil fate was it that determined its fall at that moment? There was a tremendous crash, something gave way, and the great frame dropped from its place on the wall and fell across the heavy oaken chair which stood beneath it, and the picture was impaled upon its gothic points. The two men sprang to seize it and lift it up. Alas, it had been literally torn to pieces. The canvas had evidently been originally a defective one, for it had split in every direction. Restoration was impossible.

"Good Heavens!" said the Irishman; "what a misfortune."

"It had to come, an' it's too late to be mended now," said the Sergeant philosophically, "so we must git on."

"Very good," said O'Neill, tenderly lifting the frame, with the rags of the tattered canvas hanging to it, back against the wall; "there is nothing to keep us here now. Unlucky fool that I am! Even the semblance of the original is not for me."

IN MIDWINTER

By Clinton Scollard

THE wind is loud behind the hill;
Among the pines its breath is frore;
The pathway of the meadow rill
Is seen no more.

Day dawns without the vireo's call;
Day sinks without the thrush's cry;
And like the shadow of a pall
The rooks flap by.

The dead leaf, the ungarnered sheaf,
The writhing bough are cased in rime;
It is the solstice of earth's grief—
Her mourning time!

Mr. Moody's Little Joke

COMPARATIVELY few people knew the humorous side of the late Dwight L. Moody; yet among the neighbors and friends of his boyhood he was known as a good deal of a wag, and a hearty laugh was a benediction to him.

One of his old friends, Mr. George G. Rockwood, of New York, then his summer neighbor, standing with him one day in front of his home at Northfield, dwelt with great enthusiasm upon the beautiful view of the Connecticut River and the rolling uplands presented from the spot.

It is one of the finest stretches of landscape in the entire State, and all who have seen it have admired it greatly.

"Yes," said Mr. Moody, "that's the only fraud I ever committed. When I purchased this place, the poor fellow who owned it went off and left the view, and never came back for it."

WASHINGTON, February, 1900.

THE season is only a few weeks old and already I begin to feel like that poor, tired woman who, when she came to die, said she hoped that Gabriel would not toot his trumpet for at least a thousand years, as she knew it would take her that length of time to rest sufficiently for the resurrection.

Page says that it is no use to talk of being tired and a wreck yet a while, for there are several weeks more of this gayety and it won't do to give out before Ash Wednesday. I thought when it first began that at least I should have every Sunday in which to rest after first going to church at St. John's, but alas! Sunday is the elect day of the week among diplomats, and now that I see my Ultima Thule in sight and am beginning to be invited to breakfasts and to five o'clock teas at the various Embassies and Legations, the luxury of a quiet Sunday is denied me.

I went to a breakfast a few days ago where there was little formality and where I was made quite one of them. To begin with, the hostess kept her pet poodle in her lap throughout the entire breakfast, much to my secret surprise. She said that she was afraid to let the little "angel" out of her sight, lest this cruel Government of ours should think him dangerous and either impound him or put a muzzle upon him. Everybody laughed at this statement, for it is a perfectly well-known fact that no dog belonging to a diplomat can be muzzled, as all property belonging to diplomats is foreign territory, so to speak. And then, besides, the idea of this particular poodle being dangerous was most ludicrous, for he was so little that a muzzle that would fit him would have been about the size of a diminutive tea strainer. This theme of muzzled dogs was excitedly discussed. Because of a dog having gone mad at the British Embassy, our City Fathers have issued an edict for the muzzling of all dogs, which has called out a great hue and cry, especially among the foreigners.

THE QUESTION OF SECRETARY AND SERGEANT-AT-ARMS IS ALREADY SETTLED IN FAVOR OF MR. BENNETT AND MR. RANSDELL

I find it hard to follow the talk on the occasions of these breakfasts, and I am determined therefore to acquire the language of Courts, for "no man reacheth to excellence with one tongue." My Spruce City English may be a trifle "woolly" sometimes, but it is at least intelligent. Alas! My Spruce City French is decidedly Ollendorf and will not pass muster. Of course these diplomats use much English which they speak with such accent and intonation, to say nothing of the gutturals, that it is often quite impossible for me to understand all that they say.

At this particular breakfast they got upon the subject of a certain Ambassador and his wife, whose Embassy they declared has never had any fixed habitation or name. When this theme was fully launched I had great difficulty in keeping up, for it was all in French and they all talked at once; but I gathered that the Embassy which these two elderly people represent, literally, has had its local habitat only in their trunks. Could anything be more delightfully like opera-bouffe than this? I suppose that while this gossip and the laughter it induced were going on I must have looked very helpless and out-of-it-all, for Baron ——, noticing me, tapped on the table and cried out good-naturedly:

"Anglais! Anglais! messieurs et mesdames, je vous en prie!"

They immediately resumed the abandoned English, but lapsed almost at once into French again, for they touched suddenly upon the pro-Boer demonstration which had just been held in one of our theatres, on which occasion some of our United States Senators in loud voices had given vent to their sentiments and had made charges against two English-speaking nations which, to say the least, were most astonishing. These foreigners at this breakfast almost fell over their words, they were so excited and amazed at the extraordinary performance of these public men, and as much as I sympathized in their disgust I could not let them go on in my presence with such open criticism of my countrymen and my Government. So when I got a chance I interrupted smilingly:

"But, messieurs et mesdames, much as I deplore the bad taste of the demonstration on the part of my countrymen, is it really any worse than when, during our late war with Spain, so many of you, accredited here to our Government, almost openly and under the very nose of our Secretary of State, and without being rebuked by your home Governments, gave vent to your sympathy with Spain? Come now, answer me this?"

And I smiled benignly around the table. There was a profound hush and then a general shrugging of shoulders and the conversation promptly took a less thunderous turn. Everybody began to chatter about the sudden departure from Washington of Alain de Courcelles. Many were the conjectures as to why he had gone home so mysteriously. I sat there, alone knowing the why and wherefore of it, and played the hypocrite most successfully by joining my voice to theirs in wonderment over his going. There were some vague allusions to "a lady in the case," but no one of course mentioned Page's name. I listened intently to every word that was said concerning M. de Courcelles, and could not help observing that he was spoken of highly, and it was entirely manifest that his family and title were all that had been claimed for them.

I had, only a few days before, sent to the State Department for a copy of the record of the status of foreign-born wives before the French courts. I did not send until M. de Courcelles was fairly out of the country, for I did not wish to be tempted into betraying my conviction concerning Page, which was, after watching her at the Bachelors' German with him, that if he cared for her, so did she likewise care for him, though her manner all throughout that evening had been gay almost to the point of daring flippancy. The day after that German he had departed after a formal leave-taking of both of us, during which I dared not turn my eyes upon Page lest I should surprise her secret, but when I was compelled to observe her she was as cool and nonchalant as possible and wished him bon voyage with all her usual gayety. She did not evince a particle of interest in his going. He, too, was calm and collected, and I was unreasonable enough to wish to shake both of them. They were altogether too fin de siècle for my taste. Afterward, when he had gone, a curious change came over Page. Her face took on a pinched look and she rattled off a lot of nonsense in a hard, contemptuous voice.

She began a witty tirade upon the execrable dancing among the foreigners the night before at the German. She told a funny thing about the Chinese, who, upon first seeing the rest of the world dance were so amazed by the exhibition that they asked naively why we didn't have our servants do it for us. Then she described a South American attaché who had persisted in dancing the two-step every time he could find anybody brave or unwary enough to risk life and limb with him. She asked if I had seen his performance. How he had first spun around with his partner like a teetotum, then had hurled her pell-mell into the fray, racing her, whirling her, dancing on her toes, backing her on her train until she was disheveled and out of breath. And Page illustrated the occurrence in my drawing-room so inimitably that we both were in convulsions of laughter over it, but alas! her laughter ended abruptly and it was almost with a sob that she rushed away from me and out of the house, leaving me with a heavy feeling at my heart.

It was then that I sent immediately for the record and made a study of it. I was lost in amazement at the complications and formalities that surround French marriages when one of the parties is foreign born. How easy it would be for any American girl knowing the simplicity of our customs, where the only necessary things are a license and a clergyman, to step into a marriage with a Frenchman which would be fast and binding on this side of the water but which would be practically null and void on French soil. I felt a very wholesome reverence for our own institutions after reading this record, and felt that it might be a good idea to go forth and preach to the rest of mankind, taking for a text what Emerson has said of our nation: "The whole history of our country appears like a last effort of Divine Providence in behalf of the human race."

When I laid the record down I was sure that I had the clue to M. de Courcelles' concern in securing his mother's consent. The legal age of marriage without parental consent in France is twenty-five, and I don't believe that Alain de Courcelles is twenty-five! I remembered, too, that he had spoken of having to wait in case of failure to gain consent, and naturally he would never have admitted that he was under age. I felt that I was becoming a second Sherlock Holmes, only in petticoats.

Meantime I have been trying to keep my eye upon Congress, and Robert says that if I try to run a love-affair and Congress both at the same time I shall come to an untimely end; but even in that event I should have my consolation, for according to an old saw, "Men may live fools, but fools they cannot die."

Over in the Senate there has been a merry war over the distribution of patronage. There are to be changes in the offices of secretary and sergeant-at-arms, and also many changes among messengers. The importance of this fight may be estimated from the fact that there are forty-eight messengers alone who get $1440 each per annum. The fight was led by the junior Senators.

HE TOLD ME IMMEDIATELY OF A FUNNY TILT BETWEEN SENATOR CHANDLER AND SENATOR TILLMAN

The question of secretary and sergeant-at-arms is already settled in favor of Mr. Bennett and Mr. Ransdell. Mr. Ransdell will succeed Colonel Bright, who is the present sergeant-at-arms. It seems that Colonel Bright has been uncommonly popular and has shown remarkable ability in various ways in the discharge of his duties. He can keep either the peace or the health of the Senate intact with equal skill and dexterity. He can run down a recalcitrant Senator and bring him to book when his party vote is wanted, or he can minister to a grumpy, moping Senator by doling out from his store of medicines and soothing appliances either a soda-mint or a dose of headache powders, as the case may require. Robert says he has seen Colonel Bright

Yerba Maté Tea

More delicious than tea or coffee. Used with or without milk and sugar. Invigorates body, brain and nerves. You will prefer it to all other breakfast, dinner or supper beverages. The national drink of South America.

"Hebe herself could serve no daintier cup"

The official analysis by the world-famous Philadelphia Commercial Museum is: "Yerba Maté Tea, a most valuable beverage. Especially beneficial for the stomach and nerves. It has great sustaining power, but does not irritate. Its effect is soothing and quieting, with no deleterious consequences. The almost total absence of essential oil in the results obtained from the analysis speaks volumes in this connection. Then let us look, also, at the tannic and gallotannic acid. This is a most serviceable astringent, when present in moderate quantities, as in Yerba Maté Tea, combined with a small percentage also of caffein alkaloid, which builds up the nerves and performs other good offices. It contains traces of manganese, which enriches the blood."

—TO PLACE MR. WEBSTER WHERE HE WILL HAVE TO BE A PERPETUAL BACKGROUND FOR GENERAL SCOTT

go to his little repository for drugs, and with an expression of wisdom on his face that would do credit to any celebrated practitioner, get out a package of soda-mints and solemnly count them out to some complaining statesman. I asked Robert if a part of the duty of the sergeant-at-arms was to inspect the tongues of the Senators when he prescribed? And why, with all these accomplishments, Colonel Bright should be displaced, for, from my standpoint of domestic management, it would not seem good policy. Robert's reply was what might have been expected:

"It is purely a matter of politics, my dear. Bright is a Democrat, Ransdell is a Republican."

"But can Mr. Ransdell do all the clever things that Colonel Bright can do?" asked I.

"Aye, that he can," laughed Robert.

I noticed, however, that he turned the conversation, for, manlike, he was afraid of an avalanche of comment from me on political methods. He told me immediately of a funny tilt between Senator Chandler and Senator Tillman, who it seems love to cross swords in the Senate. Mr. Chandler has a biting wit, while Mr. Tillman can emit a spark if touched. Mr. Tillman wanted Mr. Chandler to answer a question, "but," he exclaimed, "the gentleman from New Hampshire jumps around so like a grasshopper that I cannot catch him."

As quick as a flash came the retort from Mr. Chandler: "I never heard of using a pitchfork to catch grasshoppers with."

Among other things which happened in the House the Pension Bill was passed, and in connection with its passage I had a delightful surprise. Something in its discussion when it was before the House roused Robert and he arose to speak. It was some minutes before he could catch the Speaker's eye and all the time my heart was thumping loudly. I cannot of course remember all that he said, but one sentence, the closing one, I thought was well done:

"I would ask the gentleman from Kansas, who has just made such an arraignment, one thing which has not been brought out in this discussion, and that is this point: what becomes of the money? In all the workings of this Government there is nothing comparable to the pension payment in direct benefit to the citizens of the country. It is taxed from them as the mist and dews of evening and returned to them in the showers that fall alike upon the just and the unjust. There is no corporation, no business, from the greatest city to the lowliest hamlet, from the largest emporium to the peddler by the wayside, that may not benefit by it."

Robert's voice and manner commanded attention, and in his case it was not, as one disgruntled new member of the House said, that "every man is his own auditor and that is all." Evidently Robert is taking Senator P——'s advice and is going to speak often in the House. I observe that Robert and Senator P—— are becoming great friends, and I predict that at the first executive session our postmaster's case will be called up, put through, and not one word will have been necessary from us.

Senator P—— accompanied Robert and me to the unveiling of the statue of Daniel Webster the other morning, on which occasion Mr. Lodge made the speech of the day. Everybody seemed in high feather and figuratively threw bouquets at everything American. I cannot help a feeling of thankfulness that the giver of this statue, Mr. Hutchins, and the sculptor of the same, Chevalier Trentanove, did not elect to place the great statesman on a prancing horse. For all over this town, at many of the intersections of the streets, the pedestrian is regaled with uplifted hoofs which paw the heavens, while waving bronze hats and flowing bronze tails refresh the eye.

It was a relief, therefore, that Daniel Webster stands upon his own feet. As we were watching the fall of the flags which enveloped him, some bystander in the crowd remarked that it was cruel to place Mr. Webster where he will have to be a perpetual background for General Scott. And true it is, for the statue of General Scott, planted firmly on a bronze horse, stands about one hundred feet in front of Daniel Webster and to the extent of one hundred feet is that much nearer to the White House, which was his dream, and which he faces at the other end of Sixteenth Street.

Any one recalling the bitter struggle between these two men in 1852 for the Presidency will see at once the pertinence of the criticism of the positions of these two statues. When the nomination in 1852 went to General Scott, Daniel Webster, who had been striving for it for twenty years, exclaimed in the deep bitterness of his spirit: "A nomination not fit to be made," and he advised his friends and followers to vote for Franklin Pierce. The great statesman did not long survive his defeat, and with the closing of that year he laid aside his mantle. I do not think that Mr. Trentanove has apprehended the greatness of Daniel Webster, for he has not embodied in his face that grandeur which was his. He was said to have the deep, rugged lines of his father's face, which, with the additional imprint of his own intellectuality, made it, as Mr. Lodge quotes,

"The front of Jove himself;
An eye like Mars' to threaten and command."

—"WHAT HAVE THEY DONE WITH THE ROCKERS?"

After the ceremonies were over I drove Robert and Senator P—— back to the Capitol. On our way thither, Senator P—— told us a funny yarn about the statue of Andrew Jackson which we passed in Lafayette Square, and which is mounted on a huge, rampant horse. He said that when Thackeray visited this country, years ago, Senator Sumner was doing the honors of the town, and, having occasion to pass through Lafayette Square with the distinguished novelist, he hurried him past this statue, hoping that he would not notice it; but alas! when they were almost safely past the ungainly object, Mr. Thackeray asked slyly:

"Mr. Sumner, what have they done with the rockers?"

WHAT to READ

Mrs. Spofford's Dismal Tales*

WHY do authors deliberately strive to lessen the gayety of life? Why can they not realize that if they succeed in such a self-imposed task they have committed a crime, and that if they fail—through impotence—they are none the less guilty, inasmuch as they meant to do wrong. A handful of cheerful tales may not enthral the world, but they will brighten some half hours for somebody. A handful of thoroughly dismal tales, like Old Madame, and Other Tragedies, merely adds one shadow more to the murkiness of our mental atmosphere.

What is particularly exasperating in these stories is the haphazard nature of their catastrophies. Only in The Wages of Sin is the wretchedness a logical issue, an inevitable conclusion. When a strong woman gives up everything in the world—virtue and honor included—out of pity for a feeble and fibreless man, she need not hope to lay the foundations of happiness either for herself or for her lover. The very weakness she strives to shield is her undoing. But in the other sketches we cannot help feeling that the characters might have been happy enough if their author had been less determined to make them miserable. Madame's misfortunes are piled on her with a heavy hand. Ordronnaux spends long and laborious months in winning the affections of a cold-hearted wife; and, at the supreme moment of success, he steps out on a balcony, and an icicle falls from a parapet and kills him. Leonard and Helena, in A Lost Identity, are most satisfactorily married, when Helena is knocked on the head, washed out to sea, picked up mad, kept ten years in a French asylum, and sent home at last to find—naturally enough—another wife in her place. It seems a good deal to happen to one poor woman, and it doesn't make jocund reading.

As for Her Story, we wish that—even in a madhouse—she had forborne to tell it. The amorous golden-locked clergyman with his "proud lip," and "ivory forehead," and "fire burning in his hazel eye," is not a pleasant picture, especially when an adoring wife and a seductive cousin dispute for his affections. That the cousin should triumph is inevitable. She is not only wondrously beautiful, and can stand on her own hair, but she is a past mistress in the art of pious flirtation, and beguiles her victim to chatter about albs and chasubles and church architecture. So the wife, in her impotent jealousy, goes mad, and the siren has a stone fall on her head and goes mad, too, and what becomes of the clergyman we neither know nor care. It is enough for us that such tales do not stand for the cheerful thing called life.

—Agnes Repplier.

The Opportunity for American Writers

THE most successful books of the past year or two have been by American writers. Whatever the final critical estimate may be, and that is a question which does not enter into this article, the fact remains that readers have demanded some 425,000 copies of David Harum, some 300,000 of Richard Carvel, over 200,000 of Janice Meredith, and probably about 200,000 of When Knighthood was in Flower and the Dooley books.

Furthermore, of the 5321 books reported by the Publishers' Weekly for 1899, there were 3626 by American authors against 2908 in 1898. Of books by foreign authors, 571 were manufactured here against 834 in 1898, while the number of books or sheets imported was nearly the same in each year. The general figures, as well as those for special books, show the gain of the American author. Fifteen years ago, two of our publishers testified that in view of the number of cheap foreign reprints it was unprofitable for them to bring out American fiction. Even since the passage of the Platt-Simonds Copyright Act in 1891 we have heard it said that foreign authors would literally smother American writers. And now we find that a far larger number of our people are reading books by American authors, even authors in some cases previously unknown, than the new books of Kipling, or those by Hope or Doyle or Mrs. Ward.

This is merely a statement of facts, untinged by chauvinism or vainglory. It is a statement which needs to be emphasized because its significance has not been fully appreciated, and also on account of our long period of literary dependence, which, according to some of our English friends, continues and will continue. With such self-satisfied confidence, as with the English belief in the invincibility of their soldiers, it is quite unnecessary to argue. Facts speak for themselves. The sales of American books have controverted one tradition, and the Boer rifles have shattered another. In letters, however, there is no hostility. Our literary indebtedness to modern English historians, poets, critics, novelists will continue, but it is becoming very different from the subservience of the past. It is one thing to welcome Kipling's best verse as an addition to our great English heritage, and it is quite another to look to England for every new novel—to expect that the new book, whatever it be, must have the English stamp.

Another but closely related phase of the situation presented to American literary workers is due to the war between England and the Boers. Its effects upon all business in England are benumbing, and the English publishers are sharing the general depression to the full. All reports agree that English authors are producing little and English publishers are issuing no books that can possibly be postponed. The supply of English books, serials, magazine articles and short stories must fall far below the usual average for some time to come. Obviously this will apply with especial force to books. Our own public continues to demand new books, and the opportunity for American authors, especially the novelists, is apparent. If this seems a brutal deduction, let it be remembered that the same reasoning is applied in commercial life, and the sale of books is simply one branch of commerce. One may infinitely prefer peace at personal cost to profit due indirectly to a hideous war, but the facts must be accepted as they present themselves. These facts are far from warranting an inference that the untrained scribbler, the writer who has nothing to say, the writer who has never learned how to write, can expect to garner rich returns. But for the American writer who has learned his craft, for him who has something real to say, there is now an unequaled opportunity.

GLIMPSES OF NEW BOOKS

MR. EDWIN EMERSON, Jr., who won, perhaps, the unique distinction among war correspondents of reporting the Spanish-American War at his own initiative and at his own cost, has it that his constant companion was the late Samuel Pepys, deceased. Mr. Pepys, who has not lost his trick of confiding his thoughts to paper, has requested Mr. Emerson to transcribe his impression in legible, material print. This he has done in Pepys' Ghost: His Wanderings in Greater Gotham and His Adventures in the Spanish War. Richard G. Badger & Co.

It is some years since Mr. James Jeffrey Roche caught the public ear with the keen wit of his poem, the V-a-s-e. The work of more recent years, headed by the verses which give the title, he has gathered in a small volume called the V-a-s-e, and Other Bric-à-Brac. Richard G. Badger & Co.

Benjamin and Charlotte Martin have mortised the scattered Stones of Paris in History and Letters into an intelligible structure. The past is reconstructed; we meet and fall in with the influences that shaped Corneille, Racine, Molière, Bossuet and La Rochefoucauld, and that brought about the later reaction of Hugo and the romanticists of the thirties. Illustrations by Messrs. Pulleylove and Delafontaine, and the anonymous contributions of the camera are a great aid. Charles Scribner's Sons.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Among the new features of the POST is a great serial story by HAMLIN GARLAND, which will begin late in the spring.

The Eagle's Heart

The hero of Mr. Garland's powerful novel is a fearless, self-willed young man, who, on the wide prairies of the West, leads a life of wild adventure.

The young man's career, as herder, cowboy, "bad man" and sheriff, is a wonderfully fresh, manly picture of frontier life.

Memories of Moody

It was the wish of the late Mr. Moody that his biography should be written by his son.

Mr. W. R. Moody — who has in his possession all of his father's papers — is preparing a very complete life of the great preacher.

Much of this notable biography will appear in early numbers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, in the form of a series of anecdotal papers, profusely illustrated with hitherto unpublished photographs.

NEWS FROM BOOK-LAND

MR. HERVEY WHITE, author of Differences, a book which has been receiving more attention than is usually given to a new novel by a new author, has been variously described by the critics as an amateur philanthropist, a gentleman tramp, and as one of Walt Whitman's "powerful, uneducated persons." Mr. White, however, is none of these persons, nor is he, as two reviewers have supposed, a woman and a graduate of Wellesley College. He is a man and a graduate of Harvard in the class of '94. His novel is characteristic of the author. Perhaps its deepest note is that of the Middle West of to-day, where hard-working people are wresting a living from close contact with "things as they are." The style of the book, slow, quiet and almost solemn, is what one might naturally expect from the farm-raised man and the worker in the city slums, both of which the author is.

Mr. White was born in 1867 in Iowa. His father was a struggling farmer. The boy was taught up to the age of twelve in a country school. After that he moved to Kansas and made his home with his brother. Here he was the housekeeper, but his rule was as despotic as that of the better-paid cook of the more advanced East. Here it was that he acquired the experience which makes his John Wade so strong a character study. When he was sixteen, Mr. White had saved money enough to prepare for college. He began in Kansas and worked his way through academy and college and eventually through Harvard University. His first book was written while he was a Harvard undergraduate, during a trip to Mexico as collector of a scientific exhibition.

After he was graduated, Mr. White tramped on foot over Italy, and upon his return to this country settled in Chicago, where he made more than a local fame as reference librarian of the John Crerar Scientific Library. He has also taken up University Settlement work with his books and writing, and this fact led a few persons to try to connect some of the Chicago settlement residents with characters in his novel. Mrs. Charlotte Perkins Stetson has been said to be the original of Mr. White's Hester Carr. This, however, has been authoritatively denied by both the author and the poet. Other and equally improbable liberties have been taken with other friends of the novelist.

Last fall Mr. White resigned his post in the library and, after a long tramp among the Colorado Mountains, has settled down in Denver, where he is working on another novel.

THE HARD-LUCK DAYS OF FRANK BULLEN

Frank T. Bullen, author of The Cruise of the Cachalot, and other sea tales, is very proud of the struggles he went through to round out his life as an author. To an American politician, who was one of a number of clubmen to meet him, Mr. Bullen expressed himself as being partial to all self-made men.

"I was an office boy once," said the American with some pride, "and to this day I have a sneaking fondness for every office boy I meet or hire.

"I was a street gamin for a while in London," spoke up Mr. Bullen, "and I always study that type of humanity when I have the chance. It happened after I had been sent home from Havana, the vessel I had shipped on having been wrecked. I tried to get a job and failed, and so I had to work my way from Liverpool to London on almost nothing. When I got to London I scraped along on the few pennies which boys get for opening carriage doors and doing other services to pedestrians and the rich who drive to the theatres and the shops. I got down finally to my last penny, and one day I took a handful of periwinkles from an old man in the fishmarket. I had been running errands and doing things for him for some time and he hadn't appreciated them, and I didn't think it was wrong to take some of his fish. I ran as fast as I could with my booty, and after I was safely hidden behind a big hogshead I unclasped my hand and opened my mouth preparatory to making a good meal. To my disgust the things were alive. The next day I was hungrier, but more determined to live without eating periwinkles."

JOHN MACKIE'S INDIAN CRITIC

John Mackie, author of The Devil's Playground and The Heart of the Prairie, twelve years ago was a member of the mounted police force in Northwestern Canada. He is a masterful-looking horseman, and struck terror into the hearts of many a smuggler and delinquent Redman. For his fearlessness he was often put in charge of detachments in the most dangerous parts of the frontier. Besides his love of warfare he has leanings almost as strong both for sport and music.

A brother soldier says that once, when on a lonely trip, he carried with him a big mouth harmonica which he was accustomed to play. Late in the afternoon he reached an Indian camp where a feast was in progress. He joined the Indians in their meal, and when the banquet was over and the dancing began, he drew the harmonica from his pocket and started some lively airs.

The Indians stood still in amazement for a moment and then yielded to the influence of the strains. Mackie walked around the fire, which was the centre of the dancer's ring, playing at the top of his lungs and stopping now and then to roar out shouts of encouragement. At the end of an hour nearly every warrior was tired, as was the musician. He then joined the older men of the tribe who sat smoking some yards away.

One of them, the chief, stolidly removed the mouthpiece of his pipe from his lips and said:

"White Brother, if you could only fight as well as you play music you would make a good soldier, wouldn't you?"

MRS. HARBY'S CAUSTIC RETORT

Mrs. Lee C. Harby's Texas stories give no idea of their author's individuality. She is tall, fair-haired, hazel-eyed, and has that melodious Southern drawl which is enchanting to all who haven't it. Mrs. Harby's ideas upon the vexed woman question are what may be called diplomatic. She admires intellectuality in her own sex, yet she does not take so pleasantly to the political woman; but she never offends any of her feminine acquaintances, no matter what their type.

After a club meeting in New York, however, she gave a gentle hint as to what she did not like in some women's daughters.

A very bumptious matron from another city opened conversation with the author and said: "By the by, Mrs. Harby, I am thinking of sending my daughter to Europe. She wants to go alone and I want her to, for I wish her to know the world. Don't you think it's a good idea?"

"Perhaps it is," replied Mrs. Harby, "but aren't you a bit afraid of the world knowing her?"

WHERE THE TAX-COLLECTOR NEVER SLEEPS

Mrs. M. D. Hethrington, who is one of the few women writers on the South African peoples and their customs, has a lively sense of humor which makes her conversation sparkle. She once attended a peace meeting held in England which was rather pro-Boer in character. She sat through the proceedings and listened with rapt attention to all the arguments.

After the proceedings were over a member of Parliament who was present said to her: "I am so glad to meet you, and I wish you would give me your opinion of this Boer question. You probably have been much impressed with the energy and individuality which the people of the Transvaal possess."

"Yes," replied the author, "the first quality is one which no resident of their country can ever forget. I believe the Transvaal is a commonwealth where the tax-collector has incessant and incurable insomnia."

THE SMITH GIRL'S SLIGHT

By Opie Read

JEFF SLOGAN and old man Matterson sat at the kitchen table long after the remains of supper were cleared away. It was a night of reminiscence with the old man, and over his crabapple cider he told of the bears and wolves he had slain in the days when Tennessee was young. "My old granddad left me his rifle," said he, glancing toward a corner of the room, "and many a time I've been advised to have a percussion-lock put on it, but a flintlock was good enough for him and it's got to be good enough for me. Of course you've seen the gun, but I'll show it to you again."

"It's a beauty," said Jeff.

"Well, yes, unless you can find a better word. And let me tell you something, but you mustn't say anything about it. Granddad was beginning to get pretty old and little things had begun to bother him. One of his daughters married a no-account stage-driver, and his half-witted son cut a fellow all to pieces at a sawmill. So he fretted a good deal. Well, one night he was coming home from a muster, and a man named Bridge Peters with him. All at once granddad stops in the road and says to Bridge: 'If I only knowed which one of them stars up thar was my unlucky star, I'd shoot it out.' Bridge asked if he thought his gun would tote that far, and the old man hooted like an owl. 'Don't you worry about that,' said he. 'Just pick out the star you think is the cause of my bad luck and out she goes.'

"Bridge was a sort of reckless fellow, so he looks up, he does, and says: 'There she is, that star off there about fifteen feet from the moon.' The old man didn't hesitate a minute. He raised his gun—this here old one right here—and she cracked like a whip—and what do you think happened? Out went the star like snuffin' a tallow candle. Bridge he took to his heels, and it was enough to scare any man, but granddad didn't run. He walked off slow to show the other stars that he wasn't afraid, but he begins to git sick at his stomach, and by the time he got home he could hardly hold up his head. And, sir, he lay for four weeks, and then died.

Jeff looked hard at the old man and said: "I don't believe a word of it."

"How do you account for it?"

"I account for it by not believing it; that's how." Jeff was in a sorrowful mood that night, and was not prepared to believe even the most apparent truth.

"What are you thinkin' about, Jeff?"

"Liza Smith and her party."

"Sorter in the dumps because she didn't ask you?"

"Well, I don't like it."

"Why don't you kill her dog?"

"What good would that do?"

"Why, don't you know that the best way to git even with a high-headed woman is to kill her dog? It is—there's a sort of a charm about it, and if you kill a woman's dog and she don't find out who does it, she'll fall in love with you. It's a fact; she'll drap right down into pure love. Say, that Smith girl has a dog that she thinks the world of. Why don't you kill him as you go by there to-night on your way home?"

"I'm half a mind to. Got a pistol?"

"No, but you can take granddad's gun."

"Is she loaded?"

"With a double charge of powder and a slug an inch long."

"I'm half inclined to do it."

"I'll bet the gal draps down into the purest sort of love. I jest want to see it; there ain't nothin' puttier to me than a fust-rate article of love."

Only when he was out in the road did Jeff realize that he carried the old gun upon his shoulder. He halted and, bare of head, sat upon a rock to let the cool air fan him. From over the hilltop came the bark of the Smith girl's dog. Jeff got up and strode along until he came within sight of Smith's house. He could hear the merrymaking of the Smith girl and her guests. Through a window he saw the company dancing; and the Smith girl danced with a fellow named Ab Squat. Jeff hated Squat. He was cross-eyed and low of brow. He thought that he saw her smile at Squat and he gripped his gun. But there was no murder in his heart. He aspired only to assassinate a dog. Jeff saw him coming down the hill.

The dog came at a gallop, cut a caper of delight, and before Jeff could fire, had licked his hand. Then there came a gulp of remorse. He put down his gun, stroked the dog and hugged him in his loneliness. "I wouldn't hurt you, old fellow," he said. "They thrust you into the darkness, and they don't invite me out of it, and so we are brothers. Hello! there is the moon, brim full, just above the trees." The dog whined. "Just as well shoot at it as to bark at it, old fellow," he said. He took sight and touched the trigger. Off went the gun. And then Jeff's heart flew to his mouth. The moon exploded, and the sky was full of fiery snakes. The dog howled. Jeff dropped the gun and, over logs and through bushes, tore home.

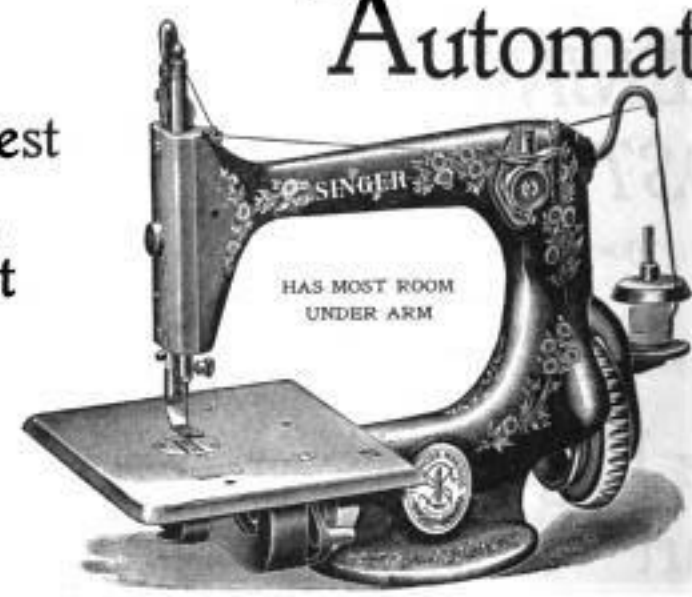
When Jeff reached home the world was dark save the pale stars slowly weeping out their light. He went to his room and, sitting at the window, strove to reason with himself. But it was of no use to reason. He had seen the moon fly to pieces and fill the air with snakes. "There's no use in talking, I've done it," he moaned. "The moon is gone. No use trying to reason—gone. And here I am sick at the stomach, and will keep on getting sicker till I die. People can't plant their potato crops in the dark of the moon, because there won't be any. And when I die the moon will come back, and all the people will be glad."

He went to bed and tossed for a long time; he slept finally, but what a sleep! Old women came and begged him to give them back the moon. They couldn't make soap without it. Maidens came and on their knees implored him. There was to be no more love-making. Poets flocked from afar to revile him; and the ocean stood dead, with no tide. When he awoke the sun was shining. And he smiled, believing that it was all a dream, but just then he heard his father talking in an adjoining room. "Yes, they were having a good time over at Smith's, but somebody shot out the moon, and——"

Jeff fell back, sick almost unto death. They called him to breakfast, but he moaned that he was sick, and they let him lie there. He was gagging when his father came into the room.

"What's the matter with you, Jeff?"

"I don't know, sir."



"What time did you get home?"

"I—I don't know, sir."

"Seem to be sorter short on knowin', don't you? Were you at Smith's when the moon was shot out? What's the matter with you? Why, you've got the ague. Well, sir, it was a funny thing. You know that Smith doesn't like for his company to stay late, so he told the boys that they might remain till the moon went down. Well, an ingenious fellow hit upon a plan. He got hold of a cheese box, put a kerosene lamp in it, pasted a piece of greased paper over it and, just as the moon was goin' down behind the hill, hung the box high up in a tree. The old man can't see very well, and it fooled him completely till some fellow came along and shot—what's the matter with you? What are you sayin'? Goin' to git up, are you? What makes you cut them capers? Folks say you look like me, but I never seed the day that I had as little sense as you've got."

The AMERICAN SOLDIER in the PHILIPPINES

The American Soldier in the Philippines

By Albert J. Beveridge

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

"SURELY," said a prominent English merchant of Iloilo, as we sat in his quarters one evening discussing the war and the world, "surely these troops of yours are your picked men. I am familiar with our soldiers in China and in India; I have seen specimens of Spanish soldiers daily for years; I am fairly familiar with German and French marines, but I have never seen such splendid specimens of military robustness and manly power as the American soldier in the Philippines." I assured him that though these soldiers of whom he spoke were of the finest youth of the nation, the Republic could, should the nation's life be imperiled, put five millions of such men as these in the field. The statement astounded my English friend, as, indeed, it is apt to astound all who have not thought of the unconquerable power in quality and number of the American people; but a careful study will show it to be far within the truth.

AN ARMY OF YOUTHS ENURED TO HARDSHIP

THIS physical masterfulness and excess of vital energy is the first thing that attracts attention to the American soldier in the Philippines. He is strong; he is alive; he is as restless as the currents of the sea, and as resistless. He is Youth. Even our old men in the army are young. A Regular Army officer hailing from New England, a Captain of cavalry, bearded and flecked with gray at the temples, rode with me and joked and endured like a boy of eighteen. Everywhere you are overwhelmed with this abounding sense of fine and fervent youth.

General Lawton, who was the typical American soldier, had all the energy, all the courage, all the dash, all the confidence, all the exhaustless endurance of the youngest member of his staff. Indeed, I have seen him endure hardships that wearied the younger subalterns. I remember well one young member of his staff saying, when I awoke at dawn one day and found the General already risen and gone, without a bite of breakfast, to a point of vantage where he might observe the country better, "This is the way we go all the time; no sleep, no food, no nothing, but fight. We literally live on combat." That sentence reveals the next great characteristic of the American soldier of to-day. He must have combat. Keep him fighting and he is happy.

On the road back from San Fernando, our extreme front, a young soldier, bearing a message from General MacArthur, overtook me. He could not have been over seventeen; but he declared he was twenty-one, and this is a point to which attention will be called later. It was not an intentional lie; it was merely a statement of capability. He was a volunteer from one of the Northwestern States, whose term of enlistment had expired, and who had a right to return home. He was remaining voluntarily. He was asked whether he wanted to go home.

"Oh, yes, of course," he replied, "but not until the end is over. I am satisfied to stay as long as the Government wants me, provided I can get a chance to fight."

And he threw back his head, his blue eyes dancing merrily, and laughed the joyous, confident laugh of the American soldier. He had only been continuously fighting for three months; he had only fought every foot of the way from Manila to San Fernando; it was true that, practically, he might be said to be under fire every hour even then. But this typical American soldier from the prairies of the Northwest was willing to stay in the tropic Philippines if he could only have a chance to fight.

An anecdote will illustrate this abnormal combative instinct of the American soldier as it is exhibited in the Philippines. On one occasion, around Iloilo, a regiment of regulars, the Eighteenth, as I remember, suddenly became engaged with the insurgents. Several boys of the First Tennessee happened to be off duty. The fighting that was then going on was not a part of their business. No matter; they seized their guns and ran like mad until they were on the firing line of the Regulars, whom they joined as though it was their own regiment. I asked one of them why he did it.

"Why," he replied, "we didn't want to miss the fun."

SOME VOLUNTEERS WHO WOULD RATHER FIGHT THAN EAT

AN OFFICER in command of the Eighteenth Regulars—in command at the time we had our liveliest fighting around Iloilo—told me the following story, which perfectly illustrates the peculiar atrophy of the faculty of fear with which the American soldier is afflicted:

"The Filipinos were shooting very rapidly," said the officer, "but not aiming well. Nevertheless, the air was full of bullets, and while nobody was being killed at that moment, there was danger. I didn't want to expose my men unnecessarily. They were ordered to lie down behind the rice ridges, and fire from them. In the midst of the action, and at the very hottest moment, I saw a flaxen-haired boy deliberately get up and coolly survey the whole scene. I ordered him down, asking, with an oath, I fear, what he meant by standing up that way to get killed. He turned upon me a face full of the sense of personal injury, and, as he slowly, very slowly, obeyed the order, said:

"'Why, there is no use of my lying down; I've shot away all my ammunition; I want to see this here show.'

"It was 'talking back,' of course, and should have been rebuked," continued the officer, "but what soldier could find it in his heart to rebuke a fine piece of spirit like that?"

The Philippine war has been full of dare-devil incidents that remind you of the days of the Three Guardsmen, or of the soldiers of Napoleon, or of the English seamen of Elizabeth's day. Reckless courage has always been, however, a characteristic of the American soldier in all wars.

Outside of Iloilo our line was on one side of a river, the insurgent line on the other side. An open space of perhaps a half a mile in diameter was on the Filipino side, beyond which were trees and other vegetation. Having learned the recklessness of the American soldier, the insurgents one night planted a flag over a trench in this open space. The evident purpose was to taunt the Americans to come and take the flag, thus alluring them into an absolute death-trap. An order was accordingly given that under no circumstances must any man attempt to disturb the flag. The very next day a soldier of the First Tennessee went beyond our lines, swam the river, and deliberately pulled up the flag and walked back with it, swam the river again, and entered our lines, escaping unhurt. What to do with that soldier was a serious question with our officers, since he had disobeyed orders, and was, technically, subject to court martial. But they had too much of the same spirit in their own breasts to discipline him, and nothing more, officially, was heard of the subject, though the incident was repeated with pride, and repeated again and again and again, in quarters and camps, and everywhere that Americans congregate.

BLUE-EYED, FLAXEN-HAIRED ANGLO-SAXON FIGHTERS

THE description of the young soldier who wanted to "see the show" as flaxen-haired, reveals another very remarkable and striking ethnological fact: the Saxon type prevails throughout our active fighting forces; at least it so appears to the mere eye-observer, whatever the records may show. A newspaper correspondent, now in Boston, called my attention to this at San Fernando, in the interior of Luzon, and I had myself noticed and spoken of it. Everywhere the pale blue or gray eye, everywhere the fair skin, everywhere the tawny hair and beard. In Cebu, Panay, Negros and Sulu the same phenomenon.

In many instances the beards have been allowed to grow, and observers were startlingly struck with the resemblance which these fierce-looking, bearded men—boys in years—bore to the old pictures in our primary school histories of twenty-five years ago, and of the descriptions which accompanied them. The Saxon type is as conspicuous in the Philippines as the flag itself. Of course the dark hair and eye are there, too. Three of the most daring and enduring soldiers I met were of that type, but the general impression is distinctly fairness in hair and lightness in eye.

AMERICANS BROTHERS, ONE AND ALL

THIS calls to mind the homogeneity of the people of the Republic. One might well expect the same type in the men from the Dakotas, Nebraska and Kansas; but he who has not followed ethnological currents in America would have expected that the Southern troops would have been quite a different type. And yet, in the Tennessee troops at Iloilo was found precisely the same type as in the Dakota troops at San Fernando. You might have said that they all came from the same section, the same State, the same county, almost the same family. It was an inspiring thought; the American people are indeed one people. The boys from Tennessee look like the brothers of the boys from Nebraska or Montana. The boys from Oregon and Washington look like the brothers of the boys from Pennsylvania. The boys from California look like the brothers of the boys from Minnesota. And brothers they are—brothers of the blood, brothers of the flag, brothers of battle, brothers of destiny. How mad must be the man who dares believe that by any temporary emergency these brothers can ever be divided against themselves.

THE AMERICAN SOLDIER OF THE THOROUGHBRED TYPE

ONE cannot resist dwelling longer on physical characteristics. These thoroughbred soldiers from the plantations of the South, from the plains and valleys and farms of the West, look the thoroughbred, physically considered. The fine line is everywhere. The nose is straight, the mouth is sensitive and delicate. There are very few bulldog jaws. There is, instead, the steel-trap jaw of the lion. The whole face and figure is the face and figure of the thoroughbred fighter, who has always been the fine-featured, delicate-nostriled, thin-eared, and generally clean-cut-featured man. This, too, is the type of the great fighting animals—the lion, the tiger, the puma—all with jaws as delicate in outline as they are powerful. None has the heavy jaw of the bulldog. The same is true of the great fighters among men.

Recall the medallions of Alexander. Remember the types of the Greek soldier, as they come down to us, the soldier most resembling the American soldier of any in history. Think of the delicate form and features of the great Cæsar and of his troops, of the mighty Napoleon and his, of the sharp-faced and victorious Wellington and his men. Think of Von Moltke, of Frederick the Great, of Richelieu, and of their men—sword-faced men every one. Even the face of General Grant, of whose square jaw we have heard so much, is said to have been comparatively delicate, and the square appearance of his jaw came very largely from the cut and style of his beard, and, if otherwise, it is the exception which emphasizes the general fact. But this is going into physiognomical and military disputation. Whether the theory is true or not, it is distinctly true that the American soldier in the Philippines, as a type, is the one with which Charles Dana Gibson has made us familiar in his illustrations.

I remember very well, one morning in the city of Jolo, in the Sulu Islands—Jolo, the marvelous creation of that exceptional Spaniard, Arolas—as Commander West, of the Princeton, Captain Febiger, of the army, and myself were walking along the street, a company of our soldiers came marching down the broad and perfectly paved roadway. They were being drilled by Captain Kobbé, of the Regular Army, son of the then Major, and now Colonel Kobbé, who was then operating toward San Luis, in Luzon, with his son, "born in the army," commanding a company in Sulu. We stood still in admiration as the company marched past us, and with the clear, quick commands of the officer in charge, ringing, bell-like, through the balmy air, was halted, marched back, and through all the evolutions of the drill. They were lithe, thin-flanked, broad-shouldered, delicate-faced "Gibson men," soldiers in the American Army, "regulars" at that, away down there in Sulu. Of course every man had not this fine, clean-cut combination of physical characteristics which goes to make up that human Damascus blade called the "Gibson man"; but the effect of all together was distinctly that; the majority of the individuals, as individuals, were that; and this majority so dominated the whole that the composite effect which the sight of them photographed upon the mind, was that of one of these fine, thoroughbred men of Gibson, taken out of his dress suit and put into the blue wool shirt, khaki trousers and gray hat of the most elegant soldier in the world, the American soldier of the end of the nineteenth century. Every movement was so clean cut. There was such verve in every personality. There was such boundless vitality coiled up in those splendid breasts. The three of us stopped by common impulse and made the same comment.

Let me here throw in a paragraph to say that if I had written an article on the American Navy in the Philippines, with which I became singularly familiar, all of the above might be duplicated with a variety of incident from the decks which have now begun, and at no distant time will achieve, the sovereignty of all the seas.

Let it not be understood that all of the men in our army are of the excellent type in courage and endurance and physical perfection described above. Unfortunately, no; but the vast majority are; and so great is this majority that the few exceptions are worthy of note only to preserve entire truthfulness in the picture, and to avoid the charge of exaggeration. There are a few men in every organization who are disturbers, disorganizers and cowards. The fact that we are Americans, though that means nearly everything, is not sufficient to remove entirely defects occasionally encountered the world over. There are a few unworthy men in our army.

Two of these were met at half-past two o'clock in the afternoon of a blazing day, eight miles from San Fernando, walking back to Manila, as they said. Asked what was the matter with them, they declared they had been "touched by the sun," although they were walking at a rapid pace, in the hottest portion of the day, and looked as vigorous as bullocks. An outpost, their comrades, a little further on, were cursing them for being what is known in our army in the Philippines as "cold feet."

THE COTILLON LEADER'S CASE OF "COLD FEET"

ANY man who, for any reason, good or otherwise, avoids actual danger of death in action is under suspicion of being a case of "cold feet"; and once that suspicion is confirmed, he has lost caste with his companions forever, and is literally ostracized. Occasionally, too, you will find a chronic grumbler, a natural disorganizer. But they are rare. I ran across only three in all the islands. One I met on a ship. He was just leaving. He had stories of indescribable suffering to relate, of hardship, of abuse, of poor food, of harsh treatment. It was a tale of woe unrelieved. Curiosity was aroused and his record has since been investigated. He was the poorest soldier in his regiment, and undoubtedly would not be able to get into the service again. He was not a volunteer, but an enlisted Regular.

Another was a Lieutenant in the Regular Army. He had been stationed all his life in the most favored quarters in this country. I questioned him casually, but with care. His chief duties had been attendance on balls, and his most prominent command the leading of cotillons. This was the first time he had seen a soldier's service since his graduation. He wanted to get back. He was full of criticism of his Government. He complained of the rain when it rained, and of the sun when it did not rain, and of the food when he ate, and of no food when he didn't eat. Whatever happened, or did not happen, he was always ready with his criticism. The man was made for a clerk in a ladies' millinery establishment. He had simply gotten into a wrong profession when he "went for a soldier." The third disorganizer was in the hospital (and of the men in the hospital let me make special mention further on). I remember him well. He was sitting up, reading. He looked very well to me, and yet, "if I only knew the treatment he endured," declared he. His record also was looked up. He had seen no service. He was always causing difficulties. He was constantly falling ill, and yet never being really ill. Out of the thousands of men whom I met face to face, these three are the only instances of the complainers and the grumblers—only three in many thousands; it is a glorious proportion. Not that the men were satisfied all the time, by any means. No. If they didn't get what they wanted, they said so, and said so hard; but they grumbled in fine, manly, American fashion, and for things which full-blooded men in the lust of youth are wont to grumble at, such as a chance to get out and fight, and things like that.

HOW THE BOYS IN THE HOSPITALS FARE

LET me go back to the hospital. Impressions there formed will never be erased from my memory. How proud the men were of their wounds! They insisted on showing you their poor, mangled limbs. And never a whimper, never a whine, never a complaint. At the hospital at Manila one man was sitting in a chair outside. He was still very weak, but his wound was nearly healed, and he was convalescing. He stood up straight as an arrow as we came up, saluting with that fine air of mingled dignity and spirit which is characteristic of the salute of the American soldier.

"How are you, my boy," said I, "and where were you wounded?"

"At Malabon," he said; "shot through the leg here, and I am getting along fine. I think I shall be able to be out on the firing line in a couple of weeks now."

He said it as a schoolboy might say, "There are two weeks more of school, then vacation, by Jove!" Another young fellow said, "I am good and well. I am going to join the boys to-morrow." He was nineteen years old. How proud they make one feel—those matchless children of courage who are fighting for the flag in the Philippines. What types they are of the American spirit of the twentieth century! One looks into their fearless eyes and sees our manifest destiny personified and vital.

I cannot get away from the impression of youth—a youth that seems as if it would be youth forever—that fairly gleams with virile light from the faces of these boys of ours. At Iloilo, as the officers of the First Tennessee and myself were making our ride, we galloped past a clump of three soldiers stationed at a bridge. They sprang to their feet, presented arms to their Colonel, and I noticed the peculiarly boyish appearance of two of them. Whirling the horses, I rode back and said: "My men, how old are you?" The child in command replied, with a grin and a sheepish look and a flash out of the tail of his eye: "We're eighteen, all right—I guess—sir."

The little villain was not over sixteen. It was not a truth he told, but one was forced to love him for the patriotic and American indirection by which he could win the chance to fight—and maybe to die—for the flag which, before he was born, his father had assailed; for he was the son of a Confederate soldier, and yet that old soldier to-day would give his blood for the Stars and Stripes, for which his son is fighting.

THE TIES THAT BIND THE STATES TOGETHER

ANOTHER incident, to show how inseparable this country of ours is, and how God has made this far eastern work of ours the means not only of union, but of unity.

I landed in Iloilo at the end of the first typhoon of the season. Even in the harbor and on the river the waves made

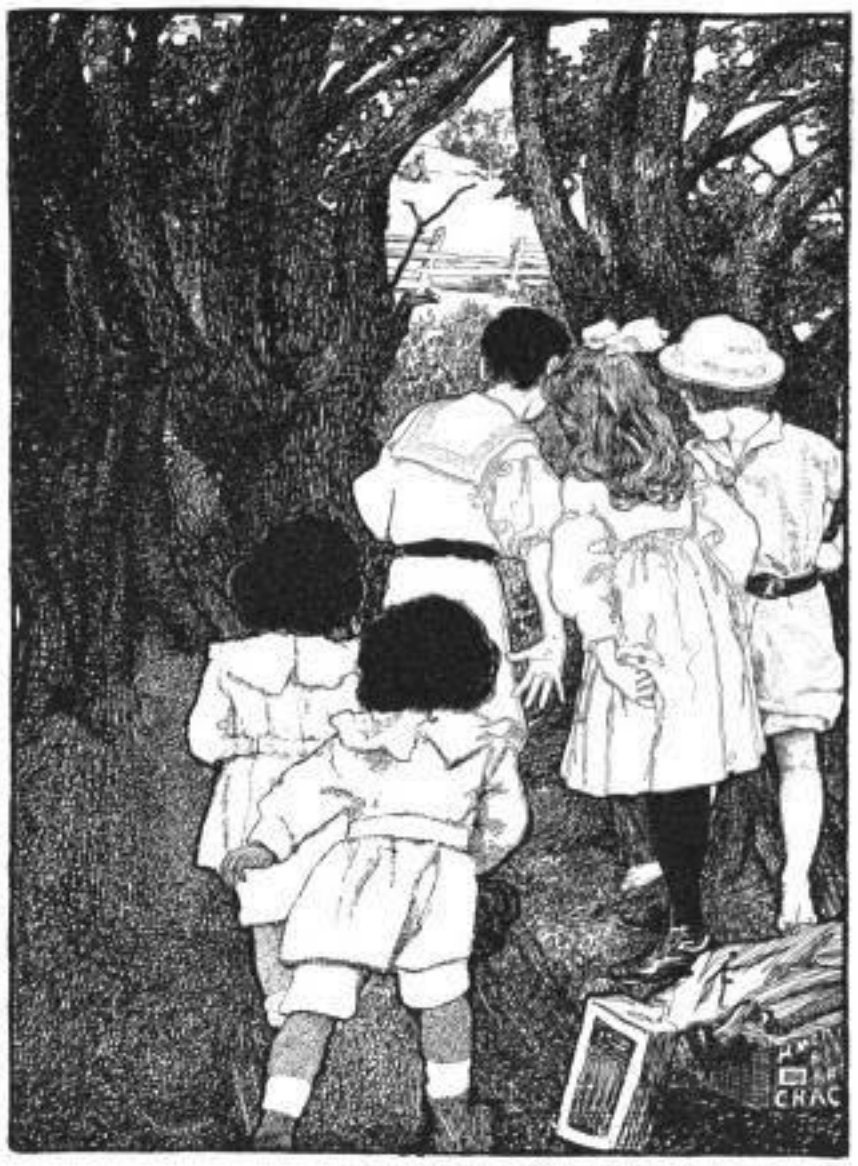
The Swiss Family Robertson



By Stanley Waterloo

WHEN I look back across the years—I am nearly thirteen now—the vision which arises of trying adventure with my sister and three brothers seems like what I have seen somewhere alluded to as the baseless fabric of a dream, or, if not that, at least some freak of the waking imagination. Yet certain it is that the five of us, John, Mary, Francis, Herbert and Elwyn Robertson, aged respectively eleven, nine, eight and six years—Herbert and Elwyn being twins—had such strange experiences in a strange land as can never be forgotten by any of us. Hard indeed to undergo were some of our vicissitudes, and always thankful am I, when the memory of that time returns, that my greater age and possibly greater force of character enabled me to become guide and mentor when certainly a counselor was needed.

Strangely enough, all our adventures were the indirect result of an earnest perusal of a most fascinating volume entitled The Swiss Family Robinson, in which was related the story of a family named Robinson, cast away upon a lone island in the Pacific Ocean. The family was a remarkable one, and the character of the father I admired especially. Not only was he a man of extended general information, but one who regarded thoughtfully the circumstance that almost any condition may be improved by the diligent, and who was truly grateful for something in every chapter of the book. The mother and children each displayed traits almost as admirable. The island, too, was as remarkable as the family, since, though it was but a small place, the castaways were fortunate enough to discover almost every useful plant, bird and beast known to the torrid, temperate or frigid zones. Taken altogether, the tale was such as to arouse a spirit of something nearly akin to envy in the minds of all of us save the twins, who were, of course, too young to understand. It was no wonder, since our great-great-grandfather on our mother's side was said to have come from Switzerland, that the three oldest of us called ourselves the Swiss Family Robertson and imagined many things. There came a time when the fancy became a grave reality, even to the twins.

It is with no little feeling and hesitation that I approach any allusion to the causes which led to the practical expatriation of five people—in the prime of youth, it is true, but inexperienced—and their subjection to a manner of existence such as they had never imagined could be real. Even now the matter so affects me that I must be pardoned by the reader for not relating the unpleasant details. Suffice it to say that occasions arose when the views of our parents unhappily failed to coincide with those of Mary, Francis and myself, and that our conduct was held, by those who had the power, to merit corporal punishment, a punishment which, it has always seemed to me, was inflicted with far more vehemence than any possible occasion could demand. Our spirits revolted at what occurred, and the three of us, who, as explained, had just finished reading The Swiss Family Robinson, held inflamed but deliberate counsel together and determined resolutely upon a course which should give us liberty of conscience and of action. I admit frankly that, being of a self-respecting disposition, and it may be to an extent a natural leader, I was foremost in these councils and mapped out the general plan of action. Increasing years have given me more philosophy and taken from my impulsiveness, but at that time I did not hesitate. In short, under my inspiration we resolved to seek a more congenial clime, where, if we did not luxuriate in all the so-called advantages of a super-refined civilization, we should at least have the more quiet and assured happiness which obtains where Nature is primeval. Our resolution became fixed. That Herbert and Elwyn, the twins, became of the emigrating party was but an incident, they having discovered our plans for departure and insisting upon accompanying us. Their wish was reluctantly granted lest the clamor they would inevitably raise in the event of a refusal should reveal our plans.

Not only were we determined upon the new life, but we resolved to isolate ourselves so completely from the unpleasant recent past as even to change our names, it being decided that each should select a new one for himself or herself. As for me, having lately read a story of the Norsemen, I selected the name of Wolfgang; Mary chose that of Abyssinia, and Francis, for what reason I cannot imagine, adopted that of Chickum. The naming of Herbert and Elwyn was left to Abyssinia, who, after looking over a newspaper, called one Krag and the other Jörgensen. Then began in earnest our preparations for departure.

Could the man have been placed there to exercise a distant surveillance over us?

It was, of course, necessary, as I endeavored to impress upon my fellows—if Abyssinia may be included in such a term—to observe the utmost secrecy and discretion in all our movements. This injunction was observed faithfully by all save Krag and Jörgensen, whose course was frequently such as might, I feared, attract the attention of our parents. Fortunately they appeared all unknowing of our designs.

The first thing to be accomplished was the getting together and bestowal in a safe place of such stores as we could carry away and as would be most serviceable to us in an uninhabited and possibly barren region. In this difficult task Abyssinia, Chickum and I shared about equally. The place of concealment finally decided upon was a small shed which had formerly been a henhouse, and which stood against a board fence on the eastern side of the kitchen garden. Here, beneath a heap of straw, we concealed our accumulations. I pondered deeply over what the nature of our stores should be, and I trust I may say, with a pride not altogether unbecoming, that my selections were justified by the result. Slowly but surely the material accumulated until there came a time when we felt that we were fairly equipped for our departure. It was just after the beginning of July, and the weather was sultry, but with an eye for the future Abyssinia secured from the extra household supplies four quilts, five large sheets and six jars of raspberry and strawberry jam. She contributed also a bag of salt, pepper, some old knives and forks, half a dozen tin plates and as many tin cups, a breadpan, a frying-pan with a broken handle, and two tin pails. I added a light but excellent ax, several boxes of matches, a great ball of stout cord, an enormous slab of dried beef, two boxes of crackers, a box of candles, some large potatoes, an old carving-knife, some fishhooks, a steel trap, and at least half a barrel of flour in bags not too large to be carried by Chickum or me. Chickum brought two jars of butter, another ax, and his bow and arrow. Of course we had our pocket-knives, and Abyssinia had needles and strong thread. The hour came when we only awaited an auspicious occasion for departure.

It had become apparent that not a third of our stores could be removed in a single journey, and, after considering the matter most thoughtfully, I resolved that the only wise course was to determine upon the site for our new home, complete it, and to it carry our goods from time to time. Upon Chickum and me must necessarily fall the burden of this initial labor, and we set about it at once. Our homestead sloped from the roadway to the north and was bounded in that direction by a grassy expanse through which flowed a small creek, crossed by a plank. The creek separated this green area from a wild and comparatively deserted region known as the Wooded Pasture. Some hundreds of yards distant from the creek rose an extremely wide and dense growth of willows, and in the midst of this miniature forest, as we had at one time discovered, was a small open space, dry and bare of growth. Here, after new exploration in company with Chickum, I decided should be established our tranquil home. The site was not discernible from the home of our parents, nor indeed from any part of the place we were leaving except from an elevated point in a meadow to the west, and even from this station the view was indistinct.

We bided our time impatiently now; but we did not have long to wait. A day came when our parents were away upon a visit, the hired girl was occupied indoors, and the hired man busy in the cornfield where the dense growth of the valued cereal prevented him from seeing us or being seen. Quietly Chickum and I departed, burdened with the quilts, sheets, our axes, and the ball of twine. Our journey to the willows was uneventful and our labors there were unmolested.

The plan of our shelter had already been designed by me, and we lost no time in trivial debating over details, Chickum submitting without question to each suggestion of the stronger mind. Under my direction we cut down eight small willows as straight as we could find, and cut from each a length of nearly six feet, four of which we sharpened at one end. These, one of us standing upon a dead uprooted stump which we rolled about, we drove into the earth at distances of six feet apart, the stakes, rising some five feet, forming the four corners of a square. The remaining four poles we tied firmly so that they extended from the top of one stake to another, and upon the frame so constructed we stretched one of the sheets, cutting holes close to the hems and through them tying the sheet to the cross-pieces. Our dwelling was now roofed. The four remaining sheets, similarly tied, made the four sides of the structure, one being left partly unattached so that it might be lifted, thus serving for a door. Upon the grassy floor of the house one of the quilts was spread, and there was our Tented Home! Chickum was wild with delight and capered about hilariously, but I reminded him that the time for an exhibition of such exuberance of spirit had not arrived. Much yet remained to be accomplished. Days passed before all our stores were, with exercise of the greatest caution, safely bestowed within the tent.

It was six o'clock one pleasant evening, when we had just finished dinner, that our parents again absented themselves to make a call upon a neighbor. Our time had come. Quietly all of us, including Abyssinia and the twins, slipped down through the kitchen garden, across the creek, across a part of the Wooded Pasture and into the Willow Grove. There was what I may call a certain tremulousness, but no faltering. We reached our place of refuge. "Welcome to this sylvan grove!" shouted Chickum—quoting, I firmly believe, something he had read in a story, for Chickum's ordinary mode of expression was not such as I could in many respects desire—and all entered the tent and made themselves at home. Here were peace and happiness at last! We chatted and planned until darkness fell, and then, digging a hole with my knife into a potato, I inserted one of the candles we had brought and found the place illuminated finely. But we did not remain long awake. It had been a season of labor and excitement, and a sense of drowsiness soon overcame us all.

It was nearly midnight when I was aroused by an exclamation from Abyssinia and the sobbing of the twins. "What is it?" whispered Abyssinia, and as she spoke there came a strange, gulping cry from a marshy strip beside the creek, and then, nearer us, one more musical but quite as mournful. The creatures of the night were calling. From my wider experience I recognized their harmlessness; I knew the voices of the bullfrog and the whippoorwill, but with the others it was different. Though my rest had been disturbed, I could not but explain all graciously, and soon the three were sleeping again, though fitfully. As for Chickum, he had not awakened. When we awoke, morning had come and the birds were chirping all about us. We ate heartily of jam and crackers, and felt the blood coursing in our respective veins as it had never done before. How glorious the sense of freedom!

How unstable, too, are sometimes the happiest of conditions! Little did I imagine that bright morning as I noted idly the performance of a red-hooded woodpecker, Melanerpes erythrocephalus, who was eating a long white grub in sections, little, I reiterate, did I imagine that before nightfall all our hopeful plans would be disarranged, and that, like some weakling tribe compelled ever to flee before an encroaching power, we must decide, in self-protection, to risk all the dangers of a wilder home.

It was noon when, looking to the southwest, I perceived far in the distance our hired man working about a stump on the elevated spot in the meadow from which could be obtained the only glimpse of our white home amid the greenery. I have not, I hope, one of those minds ever open to suspicion, but I may say that it is one somewhat more than ordinarily keen in the formation of deductions. Why was the hired man there, chopping about a huge stump which he could not possibly remove unaided? Were we discovered? Could the man have been placed there to exercise a distant surveillance over us? The idea grew upon me, and an apprehension I could scarce explain—an apprehension shared by Abyssinia and Chickum, with whom I at once consulted. Under the circumstances, with me to think was but to act. "Come," I said to Chickum, "there is but one course to pursue. We must face the issue as courageously as we can. Abyssinia and the twins will remain here while you and I must venture farther in search of a place where, no matter what may surround us, our isolation will be complete." To this even the sometimes thoughtless Chickum assented promptly. "I am ready, brother," was his answer. "Let us start at once."

Little preparation was required. We provided ourselves with crackers and dried beef and set forth immediately, I carrying one of the axes and Chickum arming himself with the carving knife.

The country for quite a distance, as we found, was partly bare, though there were occasional small oaks and tangles of hazel and blackberry bushes. As we advanced, though, the trees became taller and grew more closely together, and finally, as we ascended a gradually sloping ridge, we found ourselves in what must have been almost the forest primeval. We knew not what we should discover. The shadows were deep, and the wind made a constant sighing overhead. Descending the ridge upon the other side, and pursuing our course far to the northwest, we emerged at last upon a small open glade through which tumbled a noisy creek and near the centre of which grew a few small elms, four of them, as I noted, forming the angles of a square. We advanced and looked about us. From the glade there was an opening in but one direction, to the northeast, through which could be seen far away part of a hillside field. My heart beat fast. I recognized the advantages of the site at a single glance. "Here," I said, "shall be our home!"

Chickum assented gladly and we took up our long homeward march, reaching the tent in time for the evening meal. We were informed by Abyssinia that the day had been uneventful save that Krag had stooped too closely in examination of a bumblebee upon a clover blossom. One of his eyes was closed, but he appeared in his usual spirits. I have ever admired the wonderful recuperative powers of youth. Abyssinia told us, also, that the twins had devoured one entire pot of our limited supply of jam.

For two days Chickum and I labored in the distant forest upon the erection of our new and more substantial home. Sheets would no longer suffice for roof and walls. We cut strong cross-poles and tied them from tree to tree, and, finding great heaps of hemlock bark cut for the tanneries in a small abandoned clearing some distance from our glade, we brought all that we required of the great slabs and, leaning them against our cross-poles, made sides to the dwelling which promised to be wind and rain proof. The roof was constructed of the same material. We now had a home solid and roomy and offering pleasant contrast to the frail tent amid the willows. Laboriously our stores were carried in repeated journeys over the long route, and three days later all of our little company were contentedly at home in Hemlock Castle, a name suggested by Abyssinia, who declared that, like the people on the Pacific island, we should certainly have names for the objects and localities about us. The open space in the forest was christened Haven Glade, the creek received the title of Skelter Water, and the deep, wooded land about us was known as Darkland.

We were now most happily established. Our only possible anxiety, and that as yet a light one, related to our food supply, which was gradually diminishing. But we had plenty of flour, and Abyssinia now began making bread.

Thoughtful and far-seeing as I had proved myself in the earlier preparations for our flight, I had forgotten one thing. I shall never cease to reproach myself with not having requested Abyssinia, while we were still under the dominion of our parents, to ingratiate herself with the hired girl and acquire at least some rudimentary idea of the art of bread-making. As it now appeared, she was, though hopeful, absolutely unacquainted with the manner of preparation of this so generally popular article of food. We elders held a council on the subject and each expressed an idea. Abyssinia thought that to merely mix some of the flour with water and then put the dough in the frying-pan was all that was required for bread. Chickum asserted that he had seen the hired girl mix a little salt in the dough. I, personally, was confident that butter was added. It was resolved to experiment on a small scale, and Abyssinia took up her household duties, I must admit, with bravery.

Some of the flour was mixed with water and salt and a little butter and put into the hot frying-pan. It soon browned upon one side and was then turned over with some difficulty because of its extraordinary adhesiveness. When finally extracted it resembled nothing I had ever seen before, but was certainly baked. It was buttered and we all ate. The food was tenacious in quality and its flavor proved exceedingly novel to us. Chickum, later, complained of pain. But we had no other bread, and after I had reasoned calmly with all upon the merit of resignation, we accepted the situation daily. What a wonderful organ is the human stomach!

I am not exaggerating when I relate that the days now passed with blitheness. To our food was added an almost unlimited supply of wild gooseberries and blackberries, and the mandrake apples were ripening. There were deep pools in Skelter Water, and there, with the hooks my foresight had provided, we caught many of the fish known as the common bull-head, which we wrapped in clay and cast into the open fire. When the clay appeared well hardened, we drew it from the fire, cracked it open, and therein found the fish, cooked to a turn, and even a delicacy when eaten with butter and pepper and salt. How inevitably does intelligence, when in stress, arise to the demands of circumstance!

One day Abyssinia came running in, jubilantly crying: "Bees! Bees! I've found a hive of wild bees! Let us tame them, as did the people on the island, and so have all the honey we can eat!"

This, assuredly, was glorious news, and we all accompanied Abyssinia to the scene of her discovery. There were the bees and their home. Suspended from the swaying end of a beech bough, hanging so low that it was only four or five feet from the ground, appeared a great oval object which looked as if made of grayish paper. There were orifices in the bottom about which the insects were humming in great numbers. They seemed somewhat longer than domesticated bees, and had yellowish rings around their bodies, the difference in appearance from the ordinary honey-gatherer being, I assumed, due to their environment and different mode of life. I at once resolved to secure the hive and bring it to Haven Glade, where it would afford a most desirable addition to our daily fare. I determined that the only way to accomplish this was to come at night when the bees were at rest, cut off the limb above the hive, and so carry it to our home. This was easily accomplished. The end of the limb where it had been cut away was inserted in a hole made through the bark of our rear wall, and there, on the outside, hung the hive for the honey-making.

Some days passed and the bees appeared to be working industriously, no one going very near the suspended hive lest they be disturbed. It chanced, however, that we had one morning an exceedingly early breakfast, and Chickum, who always had a taste for sweets, suggested that, as the bees were not yet astir, he go out, cut a hole in the side of the hive and secure a lump of comb for our delectation. Impelled by curiosity, I followed, observing Chickum's operations from a distance. Chickum, using his pocket knife, cut around a piece about six inches square from the side of the queer hive and then removed it to look within for the honey. Never shall I forget what then occurred immediately. How remarkable are some of the traits of the insect world! From the opening that Chickum had made there burst, fairly in his face, a whirling, venomously buzzing cloud of the great bees. He leaped backward and fled along the creek. Very fleet of foot has Chickum always been, and I have never felt it humiliating to be defeated by him in our friendly races, but never before had I seen accomplished, even by him, such an amazing burst of speed. His career, so far as I may infer from pictures I have seen, resembled that of the antelope of the arid wastes, but the bees kept pace with him. With each leap Chickum gave vent to the remarkable cry of "Hep! Hep!" At first I thought him shouting instinctively for help, but it was not that; it was, I have since concluded, but a spasmodic exclamation, the result of his alarm and pain and of his violent physical exertion. I followed, first calling to Abyssinia to bring the twins from the house, for I knew the flight must be a brief one. Suddenly Chickum, in his desperation, plunged into one of the pools of the creek and sank down until only his nose was visible. That organ, as I could see, received at once most violent attention from the hovering pursuers, but by splashing water Chickum finally drove the bees away and they returned scatteringly to their desecrated home. When Chickum emerged from the creek his appearance was such that had I not been witness to the transformation I could scarcely have identified him. Each eye was closed so that, as he walked, he was compelled to hold the lids of one apart with thumb and finger, and his nose, but for its hue, resembled some monster puff-ball of the fields.

Suddenly Chickum, in his desperation, plunged into one of the pools of the creek

That day our forest home was temporarily abandoned, and when night came I removed the hive with the utmost care a long distance into the forest. Days later I found it abandoned and, examining it, found breeding-cells, but not a trace of honey. I recognized at once and, as is always my way, admitted to myself that I had erred. The hive was not that of the wild honey bee, Apis mellifica, but of the aggressive tree wasp, Vespidæ. I could not understand why I had been so mistaken. I had been most carefully instructed in natural history, and Miss Clitherose, my teacher for several terms, had been kind enough to speak of my remarkable aptitude in that direction. I had acquired not only the common but many of the Latin names of the soulless creatures, and, indeed, rather preferred the Latin. I well remember the day when I puzzled even Miss Clitherose, who prided herself somewhat on her acquirements. I asked her to give me the old Latin names for turkey and potato and she failed in the attempt. Little did she guess how I had reasoned that as there had been no turkeys nor potatoes in the Old World there could have been no Latin names for them! But I digress.

Time passed and all went well until one afternoon, looking through the one small opening to the glade which gave a view of the distant hillside field, I saw distinctly the form of a man. He was chopping, and something about the figure and its movements reminded me irresistibly of our hired man, Eben Westbrook. What could it mean?

Happy am I to turn to a subject more exhilarating—to a novel incident of our forest life. One day Chickum and the twins went berrying in the direction of our former home, venturing—as we rarely did—even as far as the Wooded Lot. They were in the midst of the hazel and blackberry bushes when there was a sudden cackle and flutter in the undergrowth, and a cry from Jörgensen which brought Chickum hurriedly upon the scene. What he saw caused the impetuous youth to shout with joy. There, beneath a bush, was the nest of a hen, Gallina Americana, and in it were no less than seven eggs. Berrying was suspended promptly, and all the eggs save one were transferred to the pail, and then began a wild search for more. It was well rewarded. A dozen or more nests were found, the spoil of which was added to that already secured. It was a great discovery.

A prouder trio than entered Hemlock Castle that evening, bringing their burden of eggs, could not be conceived by any sort of person, nor could any imagine a more enthusiastic reception than was accorded them. Not only were we now relieved from immediate danger of a food famine, but the variation in diet was good for all of us. There was a most riotous consumption of eggs for days, until a startling tendency toward biliousness, exhibited by little Krag, induced me to counsel greater moderation. So many eggs, coupled with Abyssinia's bread, were necessarily trying to the system. It was now that Chickum developed a great idea. He proposed to capture a number of the fowls, bring them to Haven Glade, and there establish a hennery.

The proposition was received with general approbation, and next day the construction of the hennery was begun. It was not a difficult task which faced us. Since the fowls must have gravel and water, it was decided that the hennery should extend a little into the creek, and close beside its sloping bank the structure was erected. There but remained the capture of the fowls, and Chickum was riotous over the prospect. He announced his ability to catch a dozen chickens in a single day, and with the assistance of Krag and Jörgensen he made good his boast, the three running down into the bushes and bringing home just the number of hens he had promised.

Our life continued in its placid way until one night, when a tremendous commotion in the chicken-house caused both Chickum and me to rush out to the rescue. Chickum had seized the carving-knife as usual, and I a handy bludgeon. As we neared the place some dark-colored animal clambered hurriedly up the side of the enclosure, and as its head appeared through a hole in the roof I dealt it a heavy blow and it fell stunned. Chickum descended through an opening in the roof and the animal was put out of its misery. It resembled a miniature bear, save that its color was grayish and that it possessed a long and remarkably ringed tail. I at once recognized the common raccoon, Procyon lotor, and made an address to the others upon its many curious traits and habits of life. One of the hens was found killed. A day or two later there entered from the water side an enemy which we saw on two or three occasions but could not destroy nor capture. It proved to be the fur-producing animal known as a mink, Putorius vison. Within a week we had not a single fowl alive. All had fallen before the rapacity of this bloodthirsty creature. Hunger stared us in the face!

How nearly am I approaching now to the end of this narrative of trial and adventure! How vividly recall themselves to me the scenes of one fateful afternoon! There had not been a storm since before our occupancy of Hemlock Castle, and almost a drought prevailed throughout the country. But a change was near at hand. There came an afternoon, airless, close and heavy until nearly evening. Then white clouds appeared in the west, growing rapidly into woolly mountains. Soon these assumed a darker hue, and a great wind arose before which the sturdiest trees were bent, while an awful roar resounded through the forest. A darkness came upon everything, and we huddled in the shelter of Hemlock Castle, even Chickum alarmed, Abyssinia crying, and the twins in an agony of terror. The rain began to fall in such torrents as I had never known before. Now the wind increased almost to a hurricane, and a sudden blast carried away the roof of our house as if it had been a thing of paper. In a moment we were wetted to the skin. The creek became a spreading torrent which swept away the ruins of our house just as we had barely escaped from it. In the darkness we clambered blindly toward the ridge, when I heard a loud shout near us and recognized the voice of Eben Westbrook. Never did human voice sound sweeter! "Hurry!" he shouted, "Hurry home!" and came rushing up to seize the hands of Krag and Jörgensen and take the lead. Wet and bedraggled, we hurried on, over the ridge, into the open, across the hazel country, across the Wooded Pasture, across the creek, up through the kitchen garden, and into the house by way of the kitchen door. A fateful moment had arrived.

I felt something in my throat, but I did not shrink. I had decided what I would say. I would naught extenuate, but would fall back upon the theory of the sacredness of human rights. My address was not to receive a hearing.

Our parents were about sitting down to the evening meal, and, to my surprise, our plates lay all in their accustomed places, as if we had not been absent for a day. My father looked up and nodded cheerfully and mother only said: "You'd better all go up and get dry clothes on before you eat." The hired girl peeked in from a side of the kitchen door and drew her head back suddenly with a gulp. Eben Westbrook maintained what I have heard called in relation to others an impassive countenance. We went up, changed our clothes, and all came downstairs together. What a meal it was! There was not much conversation, though father mentioned something about the beginning of the school term. How Krag and Jörgensen did eat! But oh, the incomprehensible apathy of Parents!

Tales Told by Handwriting

By Wm. J. Kinsley

THE employment of professional handwriting experts as witnesses in court cases that often involve enormous sums of money, or the liberty or even lives of suspected malefactors, has awakened widespread interest in the methods of this class of experts, their resources and capabilities in conserving the ends of justice.

Many uninformed people appear to look on the handwriting expert as one who, by intuition or the possession of some mysterious occult power, is enabled to distinguish at a glance the true and the spurious in any questioned handwriting. Nothing could be further from the fact.

The secret of his power—as in any other line of scientific research—lies wholly in his intimate familiarity with the innumerable physical details which comprise the written line or word or letter—sometimes so slight a matter as the dotting of an i or the placing of a comma. It is precisely the same specialized sense, born of acute observation and minute scrutiny that enables an expert chemist to take two powders of like weight and color, identical in appearance to the common eye and perhaps in taste to the common palate, and say: this drug is harmless, wholesome; that is a deadly poison—and to specify not only their various individual constituents but the exact proportion of each. The trained eye of the handwriting expert (as in another case could that of the expert chemist) can often detect at a glance certain distinguishing earmarks of submitted writing that enable him to fix the identity of the writer almost offhand. In the great majority of cases, however, the cunning of the forger calls for deliberate, painstaking study and investigation before the conscientious expert is willing to announce with absolute surety an opinion so often fraught with tremendous possibilities for good or for evil.

Nothing else that a person does is so characteristic as the handwriting, and the identification of the individual can be established by it better than by portraits or almost any other means. As lawyers and laymen and courts are finding this out, the handwriting expert is more and more called upon to untangle snarled questions and to right wrongs.

It is only when attention is directed to this interesting science by the wide publicity given to some great case in which handwriting plays an important part that the notice of the general public is drawn to it. The average person would be surprised to know of the great number of cases that find their way to the office of the handwriting expert. The man who has made a success in this line is constantly in demand, and makes frequent trips to distant points to appear as witness in courts.

THE EXPERT AND THE CHARLATAN

Though nearly every large town has some one who devotes some attention to handwriting, there are but five or six men in this country who give to it practically all of their time, and who have gone very deeply into the subject.

To allow any person to qualify as an "expert" and to testify as such is a matter wholly within the discretion of the court. Unfortunately, courts frequently are lax in determining this question. Almost any one who can write is permitted to give alleged "expert" testimony regarding handwriting. In one case within the writer's experience—a case, too, involving life and death—the court unwittingly accepted the "expert" testimony of a witness who, it was afterward proven, was unable to write even so much as his own name. In the litigation attending the disposal of large mining interests held at Butte, Montana, the court permitted testimony in regard to the handwriting of the testator from a witness who admitted that he had seen the testator write but once, and that in lead pencil over twenty years before.

Any one accustomed to writing is usually allowed to qualify as an "expert." To the lay mind it is natural to confound experts who have studied the subject deeply in all its various phases with those who have had occasion to examine it casually, or who may possess uncommon facility with the pen without ever having had occasion to investigate scientifically just those little illusive points upon which the professional expert places his reliance.

Hence, when we read of "experts" being mistaken, or of an equal number of them appearing on opposite sides of the same case, it will nearly always be found upon investigation that they are of the class described above, whose lack of thorough special training and specialized experience really should have disqualified them from giving testimony. Though any one may call himself an "expert," or a "professional expert" for that matter, thus opening the door to charlatanism in exactly the same manner that it is opened more or less in all vocations, yet, as a matter of fact, it is very rare that professional handwriting experts testify to a contrary state of facts, and the cases in which they have been proven mistaken are remarkably few.

THE WEIGHT OF THE ANTI-DREYFUS TESTIMONY

A case such as the Dreyfus affair has a tendency to confuse the public mind and leads to wrong conclusions. In initiating the prosecution of Dreyfus the French Government submitted the documents to expert Gobert, of the Bank of France, who is considered the leader in this line in France. Gobert reported that Dreyfus did not write the incriminating documents. The prosecutors then placed the papers in the hands of Bertillon, the inventor of the anthropometric system of measurements (used principally on criminals) which bears his name. It mattered not that Bertillon had never appeared in a handwriting case before, or that his skill in this line was unknown. He was a man of science, of great renown in other lines, and the Government relied on these facts to bolster up its claim that Dreyfus wrote the incriminating papers. Bertillon reported in favor of the Government's contention, and it was an easy matter to get some alleged experts—weak as to will and ability—and one or two honest but misguided men to agree with him. Some of these afterward changed their opinions when better standards of writing were given to them.

Dreyfus' friends sent engraved reproductions of standards and disputed documents to the best-known experts all over the world, and without exception these reported that Dreyfus was not the writer of the disputed papers. On the side of the French Government were a few so-called "experts," headed and dominated by a man with no experience whatever. The experts of skill and experience in France and the world over were practically unanimous in favor of Dreyfus. The writer's critical examination of the documents in question produced an absolute conviction that they could not possibly have been written by Dreyfus.

Unless the individual is fitted by nature and inborn liking for investigations of this character, no amount of education and experience will fit him. But, given natural equipment and inclination, it is necessary first of all that the expert have a good general education. He should have a sufficient command of language to make others see what he sees. He should have a good eye for form and color, and a well-trained hand to enable him to describe graphically as well as orally what his trained eye has detected. A few strokes on a blackboard or large sheet of paper will often make a clouded point appear much plainer to court, jury and lawyers than hours of oral description. The ability to handle the crayon and to simulate well the writings under discussion is a great aid.

THE HUNDRED AND ONE STUDIES OF THE EXPERT

Making a collection of the handwritings of all nations, classes and conditions of people; collecting autographs; collecting and testing thousands of samples of paper and the various makes of inks; visiting paper mills and ink laboratories; investigating ordinary lead pencil and indelible pencil writing and the manufacture of these pencils; studying rubber-stamp impressions; collecting all kinds of pens and experimenting with them—these are some of the things the writer has found of use to him in his studies. His experience as student, bookkeeper, teacher of penmanship and bookkeeping, and editor has also been drawn on for many helpful ideas. In this, as in other callings, the expert keeps his eyes and ears open and makes use of anything that will be of use in reaching a conclusion.

Editor's Note—This is the first of two papers.

The services of the expert are required in a wide range of civil and criminal cases. Where handwriting is questioned on notes, checks, drafts, receipts, wills, deeds, mortgages, bonds, anonymous letters, money orders, registered letter receipts, "green goods" letters, pension papers, and in smuggling and (a strange and gruesome thing) names of jurors on coroners' inquisitions—in short, on any kind of document where it becomes necessary to establish the identity of the writer, the expert is called in. Life, liberty, honor and property are frequently balanced on a pen point—a few marks of a pen being the determining feature in many a case.

The handwriting of the schoolboy and schoolgirl, though crude, is conventional and idealized. It has but few characteristics so long as the school model or copy-book hand is the goal. The pupil gives constant attention to the handwriting as well as to the thought. A number of students of about the same grade, under the same teacher, will write much alike. Fifteen or twenty of these students could each write a line on a page and it might baffle a layman, and perhaps puzzle an expert, to tell whether or not more than one person wrote the page. This constant striving after one ideal, and putting thought on the handwriting, had drawn them all toward that ideal and away from individuality.

THE GROWTH OF A MATURE HANDWRITING

A glance at Plate 1, presented herewith, will illustrate this point. Each line is written by a different student, ages from seventeen to twenty, who have been under the same school influence from five months to a year.

In a twelvemonth these students will be scattered and their occupations and environments will be totally different. One will be a banker, another a lawyer, another a teacher, another an insurance policy writer, another a farmer, another a blacksmith, another a bookkeeper, another an editor, and so on through the various occupations of life. The conditions of life and the manner and frequency of writing will be as varied as the individuals. Temperament, too, will assert itself, and whereas in the student-writing all gave thought to the mechanical or handwriting part of putting thoughts on paper, now the whole attention is focused on the thought itself and not the means of expressing it. By countless repetitions of the various forms and combinations of letters in each person's handwriting they become fixed unconsciously and irrevocably, and the handwriting is really without thought—reflex action.

So gradually do we depart from the conventional standard or copy-book hand that we scarcely realize it. By degrees we lop off here and add there until we have a handwriting that suits us, so far as our skill will go, and one that is peculiarly characteristic of us. It bears the stamp of our personality in every angle and turn in i dot and t crossing, in shade and alignment—in every part of it.

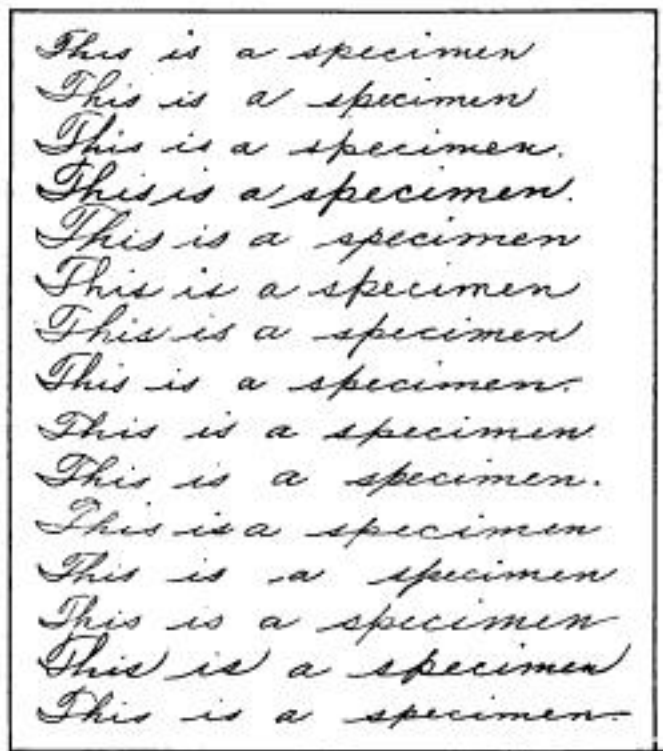

PLATE 1—EACH WRITTEN BY A DIFFERENT PERSON

DIFFICULTIES THAT CONFRONT THE FORGER

In ten years this same group of students—now bankers, lawyers, and so forth—if asked to write the word This would likely write it about as it appears in Plate 2. In this plate we have specimens of handwriting of mature persons who have been applying their writing to various occupations.

When a handwriting once becomes settled and firmly fixed it is an impossibility to throw it aside like a cast-off coat and put on a new one at will. It is here that a person who attempts to disguise his own writing or to simulate that of another meets with insuperable obstacles. No one knows of the characteristics of his own writing. They are so common and have been acquired so unconsciously that the writer himself is usually unaware of their presence.

Even did the writer know his characteristics he could not throw them off. When a person attempts to simulate the handwriting of another he doubles his difficulties. He imagines that he knows all of the characteristics of the other hand and that he has the skill to imitate them. To simulate characteristic handwriting, full of departures from the copy-book style, is far more difficult than to produce conventional or copy-book hand. In simulating the handwriting of another your hand and mind would be doing double duty—endeavoring to avoid your own and trying to copy the characteristics of the other.

Emerson has pointed out that "every man is a prisoner to his powers." Once our handwriting passes the formative period and becomes settled it has departed from the standard, and these departures are termed characteristics. These characteristics are the hall-marks of identification.

FIXING THE IDENTITY OF A WRITER

Disraeli has said: "Nature has given to every man a peculiar handwriting, as she has given him a peculiar countenance, voice and manners." Believing that this is true, the expert, when beginning to study a case, critically examines the "standard" or "exemplar," as the known writing is called, and notes the characteristics in it. In this study he takes into account: size, slant, shape, shade, speed, spacing, movement, proportioning, alignment, pen-pressure. Some of these may be disguised successfully, but it is not possible to disguise all. Each of the fifty-two letters and the ten digits gives opportunities for display of personality, and when the connections and various arrangements of the letters are taken into account, the combinations that can be formed from the strokes are so numerous as to be almost beyond the power of figures to express. It makes a difference whether or not a letter is used at the beginning, the end, or in the middle of a word.

Some characteristics are more markedly peculiar than others—more individual and personal. Of course a characteristic peculiar to one hand alone would and should be given much more weight, because of its very personality, than a characteristic common to many hands.

No particular number of characteristics is needed to enable the expert to reach a conclusion. It depends upon how strongly marked the characteristics are. If two striking characteristics are found, it is obvious they should be given more weight than twice one. And if three are found, it much more than trebles the strength of the opinion.

The expert studies and investigates until he discovers a lack of similarity, or finds a sufficient number of characteristics to render it almost mathematically certain that the same person wrote both the standard and disputed writings. It would be considered a strange coincidence if two human beings were found with two body marks identically the same. If the number were increased to five or six marks (cast in same eye, moles in same place, loss of same fingers and toes, etc.) it would be considered miraculous; and if increased to twenty, an impossibility. This is a fair illustration of the reasoning followed.

Marks that are strong and peculiar to the individual are given more weight than characteristics common to many, and fewer of these peculiarly personal marks would be needed to reach a conclusion than where the departures from the copy-book hand are of a more frequent kind.

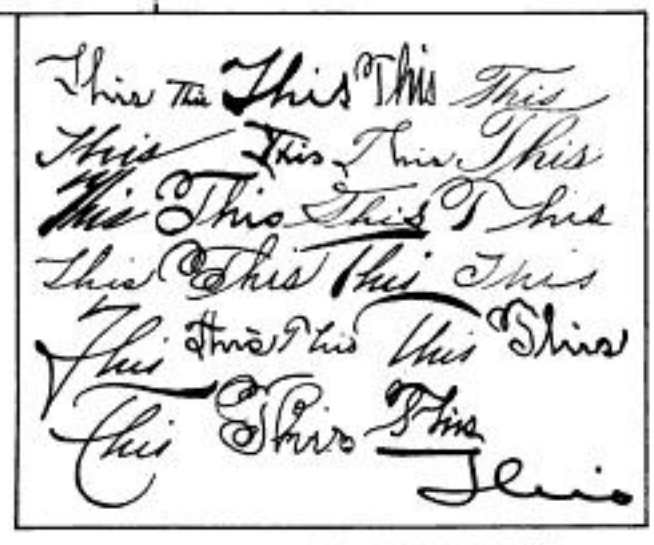

PLATE 2—EACH WRITTEN BY A DIFFERENT PERSON

HOW THE PICTORIAL EFFECT DECEIVES

Pictorial effect—or the writing picture as a whole—is what deceives laymen and pseudo-experts frequently, especially if they are obliged to make an offhand decision. A skillful forger can imitate the general arrangement in such a way that the piece of writing has a very puzzling appearance. It is this pictorial appearance that misleads bankers and others who do not get below the surface.

The expert places no reliance whatever on the pictorial resemblance of a piece of disputed writing to the standard. Of course there must be some resemblance or unlikeness, otherwise there would be no need of an expert investigation. The pictorial resemblance between standard and disputed writings may be compared to the likeness existing between stage impersonations of Gladstone, Bismarck, Blaine, and other noted men and the originals themselves. The impersonator is "made up" to look like the distinguished individuals he poses to represent, but a careful scrutiny of him, in which the beards and wigs are removed and the grease paint washed off, proves not only that the personator is a base imitation, but reveals his own identity as well. This is what a scientific examination does in the case of forged and simulated handwriting. It demonstrates the forgery first, and in nearly every case unmasks the forger.

WHAT THE WRITING TELLS OF THE WRITER

It is possible to tell with fair degree of accuracy the nationality, sex and age (approximately). A study of the handwriting of the different nations makes it comparatively easy to recognize in any questioned specimen the nationality of the writer. The aggregate characteristics of a nation are reflected in the style of handwriting adopted as a national standard. The style most in use in the United States is the semi-angular, forward-slant hand, although the vertical round-hand is now being largely taught in the public schools and will affect the appearance of the writing of the next generation quite appreciably.

Frequently educational and newspaper critics compare unfavorably American writing with that of other nations. The writer has investigated the subject by collecting from many countries copy-books and specimens of writing from leading teachers of writing, students in various grades of schools, clerks and business men.

America is so far in advance of any other country in artistic and business penmanship that there is really no second. Americans as a whole write at a much higher rate of speed and with a freer movement than any other nations, and, consequently, many critics stop when they have criticised form alone, not making allowance for quantity. Nervous, rapid writers (and such the Americans are) produce writing more or less illegible, but it is not the fault of the standard so much as the speed with which the writing is done.

THE COPY-BOOK OF THE NATIONS

The writing of England is either angular (for rapid business style), or the civil service round-hand—too slow for the every-day rush of business. England's colonies, influenced by her copy-books and teachers, write about as England does. Canada is an exception, as her proximity to the United States causes her to mix the English and American styles, with the American gaining ground.

The German and French write two radically different styles. Hence the identity of the nation producing the writer as well as the identity of the writer himself usually can be established. Before the writer is known this frequently is of great benefit to the cause of justice, as it narrows down the search.

In the Baby Clark abduction case in New York, in the summer of 1899, the nurse girl advertisement which secured the place for the nurse was submitted to the writer. He gave as his opinion that the writing was (1) that of a woman; (2) of a person of more intelligence and higher station than the average nurse girl; (3) of a woman accustomed to do much writing—likely a newspaper writer, judging from style; (4) of a person between twenty-five and thirty years of age with a settled handwriting. The arrest and confession of the abductors proved this analysis to be correct.

Dr. Dwight's Message

THE thousands of Yale men who, not many months ago, read in their newspapers of the resignation of Dr. Timothy Dwight as President, have never even guessed that it was a kindly thought for them in the heart of the President that gave them the news with such celerity.

It was in the New Haven office of the Associated Press, one of those nights when news is so dull that even the "flimsy" curls up superciliously, and the telegraphers doze over their keys. The man in charge, if he had any wish at all, was hoping that, as he had to stay up, something would happen to keep him awake. It was into this calm that the dear old President shuffled, with that walk of his which is known to generations of Yale men. He looked about for a moment at the unfamiliar surroundings, and then, while the young man was standing rigidly at attention, he drew out a big leather pocketbook and took a slip of paper from it.

"I have a little notice here," he said in his precise way, "that I wish you would send out for me, so the boys can know about it."

As he spoke he handed the slip over. The young man took it mechanically. When his eye rested on the first sentence his hair went up. It was the President's resignation, information which the Press Association was only too glad to get and to telegraph over the country.

"Yes, yes, Mr. President," he said, his fingers itching to send out the biggest piece of news of the night. "Is there anything else, anything else we can do?" His words were overlapping in his eagerness.

"Nothing," said the famous old scholar, "but give me the bill for it."

The task was a long one, but it was explained to Doctor Dwight that far from there being any expense to him, the office was his debtor for the news.

He felt uncertain even as he left, though, and intimated that if it wasn't as important as they thought, he stood ready to pay all charges.

He has never been called on to pay the bill.

The Ordeal of Isabel

By Ellen MacKubin

A CONCERT in the morning, a gay little luncheon, the committee meeting of a charitable organization, the earliest studio tea of the winter, and afterward a visit to an old governess. It had been a day which would have seemed crowded to some of the toilers of the world, but to Isabel Vinton, an idle woman of fashion, it was merely the usual round. Intending to go to a ball later, she went to her room after dinner to lie down, read the letters brought by the last post, and look over the evening paper.

Her letters were circulars. She opened the paper and sprang up, gazing with shining eyes at a black headline:

PARTHIAN'S PLUM

ITALIAN PORTFOLIO GOES TO BRILLIANT YOUNG EDITOR

WILL ACCEPT THE POST

No doubt now that Noël Parthian will be new Minister to Italy
Successful career of the young author-editor

Neither did Isabel doubt his decision. Successful as he already was, she knew the ambition he cherished to be in the service of his country, and the serene dignity of this appointment befitted the sensitive pride which would have shrunk from a position whose winning involved the personalities of a political contest.

"His heart's desire has come to him in the best years of his manhood." She flushed vividly. Self-remembrance rushed across her first selfless rejoicing.

"His heart's desire!" she repeated softly. "And mine?"

She sank back among the pillows, while memory and instinct assured her that this was the crisis of life for her as well as for him.

At eighteen, half a child and dazzled by the dawn of her triumphs as a beauty and an heiress, Isabel Vinton had refused with airy peremptoriness the penniless young lover whom summer chances had brought in her way. During six years she did not see him, and only thought of him when a poem of his recalled him to her remembrance. Then, after an absence in Europe, she found him conspicuous among her favorite clique, editor of a leading magazine, a poet of eminence as poets rank nowadays. The renewed acquaintance thus forced upon them had long since reached the point again where love had been exiled, and in the months which intervened Isabel had grown to believe that the exile of the past would return to become the sovereign of the future if——

It was a mighty "if" which at times darkened all the horizon of the woman's dreams with the shadow of the girl's folly.

He loved her, but he had not forgiven her. If some day he could offer her a fortune or a position greater than she possessed he might come to her again; never otherwise; and she, searching her own heart, knew that she justified him. To-night—which had crowned his ambition—would it glorify her belief in his love?

She was dressing for the ball when her maid brought her a note from him:

> "I missed you everywhere this afternoon, and this evening I am forced to fulfill an engagement which gives me no hope of seeing you! Will you be so gracious as to let me come to you, alone, to-morrow afternoon?"

The bold writing had faltered. Isabel could almost divine the passionate entreaty of his eyes.

> "You have by this time heard part of that which I desire to tell you, and you must understand that I am half mad with the longing to tell you the rest of it, but pen and ink will not utter it; and so, because a madman dares ask what a sane man would not venture, I beg you to keep all your dances for me to-night at the ball, where I shall not see you."

Her reply was a couple of lines:

> "This is your day of days when nothing is refused you. Nor is to-morrow likely to withhold anything worth having that to-day would have given you."

When her maid returned after taking the note to the messenger Isabel sat gazing into the fire. "I shall not go to the ball," she said softly. "Good-night."

Isabel Vinton was a woman appreciative of the responsibilities of her wealth, and she would not shrink from a business appointment next morning, though she would rather have idly contemplated her tender assurance of happiness.

As she drove homeward up Fifth Avenue about noon she paled with a curious presage of evil. Madame de Roux's Victoria waited before a certain publishing house, while Parthian talked to that charming person and popular author with such interest that Isabel passed unseen.

Now Madame de Roux had been an influence of uneasiness to Isabel during recent months because her intimacy with Parthian seemed but scantily explained by their assertion of collaboration in a play. Bitter, therefore, was it that he who last night had desired to possess all her thoughts—even such as are bestowed on chance waltzes—should be to-day so far from remembrance of her that she could pass unobserved.

The next instant she assured herself that he and Madame de Roux had, of course, important affairs to discuss, as that lady was about to sail for Europe. And was not the earnestness of his attention to every present interest a characteristic charm?

He had not asked for a special hour of the afternoon, and though she had fancied he would come early, five o'clock sounded before she grew impatient. At six impatience had lapsed into anxiety, and between six and eight she endured that torture of impotence which women suffer, with fear for men in whom they have no authorized possession which could seek news of them to whom their hearts belong.

But if she could not seek news, she could go to meet it. At eight she drove to a dinner where he also was bidden. Every tick of the clock hurt her while the hostess waited for a tardy guest, and she knew that laggard to be Parthian.

Finally, with a shrug of her white shoulders, the hostess put her hand on the arm of her chief guest.

"Mr. Parthian's new glories seem to have destroyed his memory, or his manners," she said somewhat tartly. "I have given him full measure of grace and he has neither come nor written."

"Did we wait for Parthian?" her escort demanded with the frank regret of a hungry man for that quarter of an hour's futile waiting. "I could have told you he would not turn up. As I passed the Union Station he dashed from a hansom, making an evident spurt for a train."

Drawn by John Rickard Adams

The next day to Isabel was a flutter of expectancy for a letter or telegram from him. The day following was devoured by a growing flame of resentment.

Was this ignominy of suspense the penance imposed by that unforgiveness she had always divined in his love for her? If she were but sure, she would refuse her life to the keeping of such a tyrant, even though her heart should break as the price of her freedom.

The newspapers, meantime, teemed with flattering paragraphs on Parthian's work or his personality; a new edition of his poems was advertised by his publishers; but there was never a word of his whereabouts or his movements.

With her first glance at the columns of an evening paper on the third day the feverish atmosphere of suspense and anger in which she had lived for days grew suddenly chill. Those staring headlines which for hours Isabel saw whenever she closed her eyes announced that Parthian had declined the ministry to Italy, and that at the office of his magazine it was stated that he had resigned the editorship on the same plea of urgent private affairs which he had assigned to the President. Further, it had been ascertained that a cabin was reserved in his name on the Cunard steamer sailing next week, and it was assumed that these vitally important private affairs were taking him away from the country he had no desire to serve. The article ended with regret for the sacrifice of a career which promised brilliantly along either of two such widely different lines, and with the conclusion, final as an epitaph on a tombstone, that poets were incomprehensible to their less highly endowed fellow-creatures.

Isabel, sitting with hands clasped to numbness and her face grown old and stern, told herself that she did not find this poet incomprehensible. Poets were doubtless more prone than their fellow-creatures to the mad abandon of repute and advantage for the gratification of a passion.

Did not Madame de Roux also sail in next week's Cunard steamer? If this were more than a coincidence, was it not incumbent on the man to resign the rewards of publicly appreciated talents without other uttered excuse than urgent private affairs?

The power of feigning developed by even the frankest women in one special need is a wonder as old as the first love-story. Isabel was never more radiant than at a dance that night when she serenely ascribed Parthian's extraordinary conduct to an improvident poetical temperament which preferred leisure for literary work to the solid benefits of the two positions from which he had withdrawn. And nobody guessed, unless perhaps some other woman, that her vivid face and brilliant eyes were lit by burning humiliation.

Several days elapsed, during which, much mention as she heard of Parthian, she gained no personal news of him except that visitors at his lodgings had been told that he was absent from the city.

These were days for which Isabel afterward made a grave in her memory—days when every faith tottered with the wreck of her love, and when, beneath even the bitter memory of her reply to his note, the very dregs of misery to her was the degradation of the man she had set so high.

Friday came without sight or sign of Parthian, and he was to sail on the morrow. It happened to be her afternoon at home, and she was talking and making tea when "Mr. Parthian" was announced.

Even in the half light of shaded lamps he looked worn and ill, but he barely touched her fingers, and his voice was cheery as he exclaimed:

"Please accept, for various broken engagements, the heartfelt regrets of a man who has not left his bed since nearly a week."

"We heard that you were out of town."

"I am blessed with a servant who lies with so honest a countenance that he would deceive the Father of Lies instead of merely the average newspaper reporter," he answered lightly. "And my physician insisted upon solitary confinement for me if I intended to sail to-morrow."

A chorus of questions broke from the group about the fire.

"Are you really off to-morrow?"

"What has been the matter with you?"

"Is your health the 'urgent private affair' which has made you cast aside two such pretty baubles?"

Isabel alone was silent as she gave him a cup of tea, and with a gay gesture of protest against the onslaught of inquiry he emptied the cup hurriedly before he replied.

"My illness was mostly overwork," he said, dropping into a chair. "My private affairs are still exclusively my own, and I really start for Europe to-morrow."

"We are snubbed!" a pretty woman laughed, uttering the resentful dumbness of the others.

Parthian glanced quickly about the circle with the smile which made charming his thin, clear-cut countenance.

"Forgive some abruptness, my friends. I hate going away too much to like talking about it," he exclaimed, and turned to the pretty woman who lamented that a winter in Europe was to be bestowed upon one who did not desire such a good fortune.

Everybody rose presently with a flutter of farewells.

Then Parthian and Isabel were alone.

He made no movement toward a chair, and she also stood motionless during an instant, in which she saw that speaking was yet more difficult to him than to herself.

"If you do not return within a few months you will not see me," she began formally.

Digitized by Google

"I shall not see you!" he repeated, just aloud.

Her words had been the utterance of plans she had scarcely considered, and merely announced a final severance from any anticipation of his return.

But the tone of his low voice pierced her love of him through her armor of contemptuous jealousy.

"What has happened to you? Tell me!" she entreated.

He caught her hand in one of his own, while with the other he lifted the silken shade from a lamp near by.

Of the remembered looks which stir a woman's heart to youth when she is old, Isabel will most cherish that with which his haggard eyes adored her when the white, unshielded light fell full upon her. Such longing, such despair was in those eyes—the eyes she loved—that she forgot all but her impulse to comfort him.

"Nothing should take you away if it is so great a grief to go!" she whispered.

He shut his eyes and dropped her hand.

"Good-by!" he murmured.

Half a dozen people bustled gayly into the room, and while she was greeting them he went away.

A couple of hours later Isabel sealed into her heart an anguish of debate as she drove to a dinner.

If ever love and surrender had gazed at a woman from the eyes of man she had seen them in Parthian's eyes that afternoon—yet no shame? Ah, yes! she reminded herself with scornful lips, men called it honor to keep a shameful bond and sacrifice their highest love to it.

He was gone. She had done with love and happiness. In the thirty or forty years that stretched before her there remained much she might find worth doing, and time for heartache over every glance and word of his. But now she must so play her part among curious critics that none should dare say that she had been forsaken.

The dinner was a small one. Eight friendly people gathered about a round, rose-crowned table. The women were pretty and clever; the men eminent in ways which contrasted without clashing. Even Isabel was roused to a fitful pleasure in the gay talk, and her attention was at last fixed by the celebrated physician who was her neighbor.

"It is a monopoly which is good for us," he replied to the laughing self-pity of the host, a well-known judge, who had lamented that his profession left him scant time for sympathetic contemplation of the world's progress. "Neither mind nor heart could bear the addition of outside sympathies to the demands our professions make upon us."

"You are right, as I prove more strenuously than you," the judge agreed gravely. "To pronounce a death sentence is a strain even upon accustomed nerves, unguessed by those who hear."

"I maintain my work to be beset with severer tests," the doctor said. "You pronounce sentence on a wretch whose crimes have made him a menace to society, which, through your lips, decides to be rid of him. Your flesh shivers, perhaps, with pity for his flesh, but your spirit approves that he is to be rewarded according to his deeds. Whereas I may pronounce sentence not upon a criminal's body, but upon the innocent happiness of a girl, or upon the noble ambition of a man whose strong hands grasp the great prizes of talent and energy. For, as you know, I am an oculist, and blindness in most cases limits as finally as death either happiness or ambition."

Such words spoken with such solemnity were not to be answered quickly. In the silence which followed, Isabel woke for the first time in a week from the absorption of her own life's crisis to an aching pity for the weltschmerz which throbs through the centuries.

"A few days ago," the doctor went on, "a man came to me—a widely known man in the early prime of life, with the world at his feet—and I delivered a sentence which bereft him of all he had won and all he yet hoped to win. I believe I speak with authority on the disease from which he suffers, and, so far as my knowledge goes, he will be blind within a few months."

A shock as from electricity thrilled Isabel. She was again in her drawing-room, saying with forced steadiness, "If you do not return within a few months you will not see me."

Again she heard Parthian's low echo of her words, "I shall not see you!"

Again he thrust the shade from the lamp and gazed at her with such eyes as a lost soul might gaze upon the blessed.

Presently the hostess arose. "Talk of something more cheery, if you can, you men," she exclaimed. "We women are too well aware of the lumps in our throats to talk at all!"

Isabel looked up at the doctor as he stood while she passed.

"Come to me soon," she murmured. "My need is vital."

"I see that it is," he answered. "I will follow you in a moment."

A plea of headache permitted her to escape to the comparative solitude of a bow window at the farther end of the drawing-room.

She had no doubt that she had heard the story of Parthian's doom. For a moment her spirit was at his knees, repenting the base motives with which her jealousy had poisoned her judgment of him. But the shame of her injustice was swept away by her yearning to the misery which overwhelmed him, whose capacity for suffering she knew to be more intense than that of tougher-fibred natures.

What was there that he had striven for all the years of his manhood which had not been torn from him in the instant of realization?—ambition, usefulness, love——

"No! No! Not love, my dear!" Isabel murmured with passionate pardon for his doubt of her tenderness which she now believed to be the reason of his silence.

She quivered with eagerness. The evening was going. The steamer was advertised to sail at dawn on the morrow. Would the doctor never come to make her guessing certainty?

Drawn by John Wolcott Adams

He walked down the room to her with simple directness.

"I was unprofessional to allude to a case even so vaguely," he said with a smile which was like the reassuring pressure of a strong hand. "But my patient is persistently in my thoughts."

"What you said would only betray him to one to whom it explains his sudden sweep of his future," she answered with soft vehemence. "I know that it is like Noel Parthian so to resign the dignities to which he had meant to add honor—like him to stand aside from a happiness he had meant to claim on equal terms—like him to rush away to hide his hopelessness as if he were some savage, hurt creature——"

"He is not quite hopeless," the doctor interposed. "The oculist to whom he went in Boston confirmed my view. But I have sent him to a German specialist who is more experienced in such cases than I, and whose word I will accept with conviction should he give it against mine."

Isabel's hands were flung out to him, and he patted them as though she had been one of his children.

"You guess—you understand," she murmured presently. "Why do I not mind?"

"Doctors are the confessors of all creeds," he said gently. "And this doctor must confess himself also. After Parthian had written his letters of resignation to the President and to his magazine people, on his return from Boston, he was prostrate with fever for several days, and I heard your name many times when he was unconscious of its utterance. Will you forgive me that, meeting you here, I have used strategy hoping to gain for him that which may save him to happiness and usefulness—even if the German specialist decides against him?"

Isabel rose. "You have saved me in trying to save him," she murmured. "God bless you for both!"

Isabel's mood had passed beyond the consideration of conventionality when she stepped into her carriage. She gave Parthian's address to her footman as mechanically as if she had said "Home," and she confronted Parthian's servant, when he opened his master's door, with a like forgetfulness of curiosity or conjecture.

"Mr. Parthian is in?"

"Yes, Miss Vinton, but——"

She passed him, and entered the sitting-room, where she had made tea for many a gay assemblage.

Parthian, who leaned idly on the high mantel-shelf, lifted his head from his folded arms and stared at her dumbly.

The haggard helplessness of his silence was more eloquent to her than many words.

"Noel—I know," she faltered, and stretched out two trembling hands to him, but he stood passive.

"All these years I have meant to come to you with my triumph," he said. "You shall not come to my defeat with pity."

"If your triumph was to be mine, your defeat must be mine also," she said. "And only love could bring me to either."

With a sob he caught her in his arms, and his head sank on her shoulder.

"My defeat will be so entire—the years of it may be so many," he murmured presently. "How can I not doubt that your youth, your brilliance will some day regret——?"

"Some day I will forgive your doubts and you shall forgive my injustice," she whispered, her wet cheek close to his dark hair. "But now—and then—and always—no defeat shall be entire to either of us if I may be—your eyes to you!"

Slow Work in Chicago

WHEN the Chicago Anarchists were hanged great preparations were made by Amos J. Cummings, then editor of the New York Evening Sun, to get the news ahead of the other evening newspapers. A direct wire ran from the jail in Chicago to The Evening Sun office, and an alert operator was at each end of the wire. The form of the first page was made up and ready to print, with the single exception of a line giving the time of the hanging. That line was to be inserted as soon as the news flashed from Chicago. Then the form would be locked, turned over to the stereotypers who would make a matrix, stereotype the plates, rush them down to the presses, and in a minute or two more the papers would be in the hands of the newsboys on the street.

About ten o'clock in the morning, however, a boy rushed into the office with a copy of an evening newspaper containing an alleged account of the hanging of the Anarchists.

Cummings grabbed the paper from the boy and rushed with it over to the operator.

"Look at that," he cried.

"They have not been hanged," answered the operator calmly. "I have this minute been talking over the wire to our man in the jail at Chicago and he tells me they haven't yet left their cells for the scaffold."

Then Cummings scanned the newspaper more closely and realized that it had anticipated the news. He picked up a bit of copy paper and scribbled on it these words:

"BEWARE OF BOGUS EXTRAS!"

"Here," he said to one of the office boys; "have a bulletin made of that and put it up in front of the office."

Then for two hours Cummings and every one else in the office waited for the news of the hanging. The suspense became almost unbearable, for all the time the rival paper was selling in the streets and the newsboys' cries came in through the windows. As the time dragged on Cummings became more and more nervous. He hung around the operator and asked him a hundred times if he was sure everything was all right. His excitement was intense. At last, when the editor was so wrought up that it was not safe to speak to him, the instrument clicked and the operator yelled out:

"Mr. Cummings, the drop is falling!"

Cummings, who had been walking to and fro, suddenly stopped stock-still. His form was rigid. His face worked and his eyes blazed. Then he roared out at the frightened operator:

"How long does it take a drop to fall in Chicago?"

A roar of laughter from the reporters in the office relieved the tension, the operator shouted the exact time of the hanging, the foreman of the composing-room inserted the line in the form, and in five minutes the paper was out.

MEN & WOMEN of the HOUR

MRS. JOHN SHERMAN

Why John Sherman Declined a Nomination

Soon after former Secretary of State John Sherman married Miss Margaret Stewart, the only child of Judge Stewart, of Mansfield, Ohio, he wrote to a friend: "You ask me about my wife. I married an ideal woman whom I have known a long time, and the longer I know her the better I love her."

And this statement is to-day the best index to Mrs. Sherman's character. Her education was the most advanced afforded at the time of her girlhood. She studied at the Female College of Granville, Ohio, and her schooling was finished at the Patapsco Institute of Baltimore, which was then one of the most fashionable schools of the country. The bride and bridegroom made a never-to-be-forgotten trip to Niagara Falls, Montreal, Quebec, Saratoga and other places. Then she settled down to her home duties, and she threw herself so much into her husband's public and private life that her friends said she had lost all her individuality, and Mr. Sherman called her his "memory" and his "conscience."

In May, 1879, the Senator prevailed upon her to take their adopted daughter, Mary, and some of her friends upon a tour of the Continent, and Mrs. Sherman and the party went to Switzerland, France and other countries which she had expressed a desire to visit, and where her health and strength were renewed. She placed her daughter in a school in Switzerland and returned to Ohio. During her absence the Senator was offered the nomination for Governor of Ohio, and in answering the leader of his constituency he paid his wife one of the greatest tributes which he possibly could have done. He wrote a reply which was in part as follows: "In ordinary circumstances an election as Governor of Ohio after my life in the Senate would be flattering, but I have many reasons for not accepting the honor. One, perhaps rather personal, is that my wife has gone to Europe on a visit of recreation greatly needed by her, and the nomination would require me to recall her to open my house."

The New Senator from California

Hon. Thomas Robert Bard, the new United States Senator from California, was born at Chambersburg, Franklin County, Pennsylvania, December 8, 1841. He is of Scotch-Irish extraction, and was educated at the Chambersburg Academy. When only seventeen years old he began the study of law, but before completing his course entered an engineering corps. Afterward he became assistant superintendent of the Cumberland Valley Railroad, with headquarters at Hagerstown, Maryland. During the Civil War he served as Government scout in Maryland. Mr. Bard went to Ventura County in 1864, as the agent of Colonel Thomas A. Scott, where he took full charge of Colonel Scott's California interests, consisting mainly in the development of the oil industry. At twenty-three he was sole manager of 350,000 acres, and four years later was made county supervisor. He was a delegate to the National Republican Convention at Chicago in 1884 that nominated Blaine. In 1880 he was a Presidential elector-at-large, and in 1892 an elector, being in that year the only Republican elector from California seated. His interest in politics has been steadfast and keen.

Senator Bard has always been active in oil development, and is a large owner in the Union Oil Company of California. He is president of the Bank of Hueneme, and founded the town of Hueneme. His big place near Hueneme evinces his passionate love of flowers. In 1876 he married Miss Mary Gerboding, of San Francisco.

What Madame Sembrich Did for Miss Bridewell

Miss Carrie Bridewell, contralto in the choir of Doctor Parkhurst's church in New York, is not only beautiful and young, but she has made a reputation with marvelous rapidity. Miss Bridewell is one of a number of Southern women who have won fame recently in New York. She belongs to an old Creole family in New Orleans. She spent her childhood and early womanhood in Birmingham, Alabama. She went to New York a short time ago to study music, and her sweet, rich voice soon attracted attention in church circles. Her place in Doctor Parkhurst's choir is reported to be one of the best paid positions in New York.

Miss Bridewell owes her rapid rise in musical circles to the part she took in the Maine Music Festival held in Portland and Bangor last summer under the direction of Mr. Chapman. Madame Sembrich, whose genius and generosity are synonymous terms, was the star singer of the Festival, and after the opening concert she became the warm friend and patron of the young New York vocalist. She advised her as to her method and her teacher. She laid plans for her future and interested herself in her present needs. The result of it all is that Miss Bridewell, although a choir and concert singer of renown, is studying hard under the best masters to be found in New York, and next fall she will go abroad to complete her studies and step into a place already waiting for her on the lyric stage.

The Masterly Silence of Mayor Van Wyck

Since his inaugural as the first Mayor of the Greater New York on January 1, 1898, Robert H. Van Wyck has not given an interview to a single newspaper reporter, has not answered an inquiry for publication, and has not attended a public function of a social character. It is true that he acted as Admiral Dewey's host when that officer was entertained by the city, but as the ceremonies did not include a dinner he was not forced to break his self-imposed rule. The Mayor's life is as regular as clockwork. His bachelor's home up town is as systematically arranged as his office in City Hall, and he never allows anything to interfere with his method in either place. While a City Judge, the Mayor was prominent as a diner out and theatre goer, but neither amusement apparently has any attraction for him now.

When he took office, the Mayor received the reporters of the city newspapers in a body.

"During the next four years," he said, "I shall never speak to any of you for publication. You will all have an even chance, for I shall refuse interviews to every one impartially. There is no use in coming to me with questions propounded by your editors, for I shall not answer them. But," he added, "anything that you may overhear in the Mayor's office is public property. If I talk on business to a man so that I can be overheard you are welcome to make use of it."

That was more than two years ago, and the Mayor has held to his promise to the letter. Scores of reporters have been obliged to put certain questions to him or lose their places, but he has invariably listened to them courteously and turned away in silence. All of his public utterances take the form of comments or speeches in the public proceedings of the various boards he is a member of, or in peppery and pointed remarks, made in his high-pitched voice, to visitors who call upon him during office hours and provoke him to speech.

Of all New York's Mayors none has been busier than Judge Van Wyck. He is regularly in his office at ten and often earlier, and leaves for his luncheon with Colonel Ladd, his legal adviser, usually at one. After an hour's absence he returns and remains until the last vestige of business is cleared away. Most men have some peculiarity as to their dress. Mayor Van Wyck's runs to neckties. He always wears a flowing black tie such as artists used to affect.

Honorable Champ Clark's Autobiography

Not long ago one of Mr. Clark's friends asked him for a short autobiographical sketch. The following characteristic communication was the response:

"Your request that I tell you all about myself and throw in two or three stories, all in seven hundred and fifty words, reminds me of an introduction I heard a rural chairman give an ambitious candidate: 'Ladies and gentlemen, Mr. Vere de Vere will now tell you all he knows—in ten minutes.' When I was a boy back in the hill country of Kentucky I heard a man preach who knew much more about theology than about grammar. After reading his text, he said: 'Brethern and sisters, the whole Gospel is all squz up in that one little verse.' When Abraham Lincoln was asked by the compiler of the Congressional Directory for particulars of his early life, he replied: 'They may all be compiled in one poetic line—"The short and simple annals of the poor"—an answer literally true and full of pathos. If my biography were 'all squz up' in a few words it would run thus: 'Forty-odd years of unremitting toil.' I can't remember back to a time when I was not at hard labor of some sort—on a farm, in a store, teaching school, editing a newspaper, practicing law, serving as a legislator. I began teaching before I was fifteen and was president of a college at twenty-three.

"The happiest hours of my life were when I graduated, when I married, and when my children were born; the saddest, when two of them died. A sweet baby is the greatest luxury in Nature.

"I have been defeated once for a nomination and twice at the polls. Have been elected several times. A newspaper reporter once asked me how it feels to be defeated. That depends on circumstances and temperament. The first sensation is that produced by an ice-water bath. Then one of anger. Then a determination to pick your flint and try it again. That's the effect on a healthy, robust, resolute man. Some have had their hearts broken by defeat—Horace Greeley, for instance.

"Nothing is so dreadful in prospect or so unimportant in the retrospect as defeat for office. The people give; the people take away; blessed be the name of the people.

"I knew a man who was candidate for Probate Judge; but the people defeated him for that position and the same day elected him Justice of the Peace. He was happy as a clam at high tide—he got an office, and to him an office was an office just as, according to Tennyson, 'A lord is a lord.'

CHAMP CLARK

"A Pike County man ran for the Legislature in an early day, on the platform that he would have a law enacted causing the east half of the Mississippi to run north and the west half run south, so the people could have flatboating both ways the year around. He was elected to stay at home. In that campaign he also proved to his own satisfaction that instead of Pike County having three County Judges she really had one hundred. Here is his modus operandi: 'Judge A is 1; Judges B and C are two naughts; 1 and two naughts make 100—Q. E. D.'

"The sweetest recollection of my professional life is that while Prosecuting Attorney, though I sent a good many persons to the penitentiary, I let twenty-five off with fines or jail sentences whom I could have sent to the penitentiary. They were boys indicted for their first offense. Of the twenty-five, twenty-four are good citizens to-day. The other was an incorrigible, natural-born thief, and served a term.

"The longer I practice criminal law, the more firmly I believe in two theories: 1. Any man is liable to commit homicide; 2. He is liable to do it about nothing, practically. For instance, I cleared a man for killing his brother who had killed another brother. Those two killings were produced by a quarrel growing out of the rent of four corn rows. The man I cleared is now a preacher in good standing.

"Later, I cleared a celebrated evangelist for nearly killing a man by sticking a knife into him. That cutting was caused by a contention about fifty cents.

"In the first case cited none of the three brothers cared much for the rent of four rows of corn; in the second case neither of the men cared much for the half dollar. I believe that criminal law is the highest branch of the law.

"What was the greatest fee I ever received? The love of men whose lives I saved and the gratitude of their wives and children. Yours, CHAMP CLARK."

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES" That are Making HISTORY

The Big Problems of a Larger Navy

Admiral Sampson says that the United States Navy should be twice as large as it is now. Honorable John D. Long, the Secretary of the Navy, pleads for an increase, and, on his recommendation, Congress is asked to authorize the construction of three armored cruisers of 13,000 tons displacement, of twelve gunboats of 900 tons displacement, and three protected cruisers of 8000 tons displacement. The protected cruisers were suggested a year before, but the new recommendation increases their size from 6000 to 8000 tons, showing one feature of the growth of the modern navy. In all of these recommendations President McKinley concurs, and both Senator Hale, the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, and Representative Foss, the Chairman of the House Committee, are quoted in favor of a larger navy.

It is hard to express even in figures just what this increase means or how many large problems it involves. There are in the present navy of the United States 314 vessels of all kinds, including those now being built. Of these more than 190 belong to the regular navy, and the others to the auxiliary force. According to an excellent authority the existing naval fleet represents an expenditure for construction of about $125,000,000, and those being built or awaiting acceptance will cost, exclusive of armament, $40,000,000; so, all told, it will be no exaggeration to say that we have in our present naval strength an investment of about $200,000,000. Even with this we are scarcely a first-rate naval power. At best we stand only third in the lists of the world. What it will mean to take our position in the front rank can be quickly gathered from Great Britain's experience.

For this year alone Great Britain is spending over $150,000,000 on her navy. She has nearly 500 vessels, and the cost of the whole navy is placed at almost $600,000,000. Besides that, there are nearly thirty new vessels under construction, and if these be included the total would be increased almost another $100,000,000.

There are several interesting problems connected with the increase of new ships, the main one being the price of armor plate. Congress passed an act limiting the price to $300 the ton, though the great mills which manufactured it want nearly $600 the ton. For a time the Harvey plate was preferred, but now the Krupp plate has the call. In view of the sensational disclosures as to the enormous profits made by the big steel mills, the progress of this question will be watched with more than ordinary interest. The steel companies assert that they can not and will not supply the plate for $300 the ton, and they point to the fact that the latest British battle-ship will be supplied with Krupp plates at $587 the ton.

Representative Cummings, a member of the Naval Committee, explains the difference between the two plates as follows: "A Krupp plate, no matter of what thickness, will harden to one-third of this thickness. A Harvey plate, no matter how thick, will harden only to the extent of three-fourths of an inch. It therefore follows that a Krupp plate of twelve inches thickness will be equal, if not superior, to a sixteen-inch Harvey plate."

As the armor of the modern battle-ship is of vital importance this problem is one of the very first in the building of a larger navy. Of course, the higher price of the material will add enormously to the cost of the ships.

SENATOR EUGENE HALE, OF MAINE

Coal Bins All Over the World

In the late war with Spain the standing order of the Secretary was that all the ships should be kept full of the best coal obtainable. The controversies that came after the war referred largely to the question of a coal supply. Since then the department has been laying in supplies in every part of the world where the fuel may be needed by our ships of war. We are acquiring coaling stations in islands wherever it can be done. In our new colonies thousands of tons are being stored. Take, for instance, the Dry Tortugas and Key West, the points which command the entrances to the Gulf of Mexico. There will be piers and coal sheds with a capacity of 20,000 tons, and the channel will be dredged so that the largest ships will have no difficulty. By extending the chain of stations this country will be in control of the entire Gulf. On the Pacific Coast buildings will be erected with a capacity of 100,000 tons of coal. More buildings and piers will be constructed at Honolulu, at Guam and in the Philippines, and thus gradually there will be built up a complete system of coal depots in various parts of the world.

The Largest Naval Bill in Our History

The Naval Appropriation Bill will be the largest ever known. As it came from the Navy Department it called for $75,000,000. This, of course, will be changed and somewhat modified in the Committee and by Congress. It will probably be scaled down $10,000,000 or more. Included in the amount is $12,000,000 which will be spent for new buildings for the Naval Academy at Annapolis, and for dry docks at League Island Navy Yard, Philadelphia; Portsmouth, New Hampshire; Boston; Algiers, Louisiana, and Mare Island, California.

It happened, several years ago, that when some of our largest ships needed to be cleaned we had to send them to British docks, and the country was mortified by the fact. We had dry docks in this country, but they were either not large enough, or bad construction or too much politics had made them valueless. Great dry docks are absolutely essential to a larger navy, and thus the docks which Civil Engineer Endicott has designed, and which will be placed at the available points on the three coasts, will be the most perfect of their kind in the world. They will be of stone and will be as strong as masonry and granite can make them. They will be 750 feet long, and two of our present battle-ships may be docked in each at the same time. There will be 600,000 cubic feet of granite, 60,000 cubic yards of concrete, and a million pounds of steel in their construction, figures which give a faint idea of their magnitude.

A great many things go with these new improvements. For instance, at the League Island Navy Yard, which will probably become the greatest naval station in the country, new headquarters at a cost of over $50,000, officers' quarters costing over $25,000, the new storehouse for ships' equipment costing $36,000, and other different buildings, costing in all from one to two hundred thousand dollars, will be erected. The place will be beautified also, so that our navy yards will look like attractive parks and will afford a wealth of interest to those who visit them.

Training for the Men Behind the Guns

In order to work these marvelous machines to the best advantage the Government must have experts not only in every branch of the service but practically in every position on the ships. The writer of this spent a very pleasant afternoon with Captain Gridley, who afterward was one of the heroes and one of the victims of the battle of Manila, when he was in command of the receiving ship at League Island. Those who knew him recall his charming personality and his deep interest in the welfare of the men. In the course of the afternoon he took his visitors through the ships at the station and pointed out the fine quality of the seamen. "We have," he said, "the very pick of the strong manhood of the country. The slightest physical defect turns a man down, because with such a large number of applicants we can afford to be particular. Look at those men! They are like race-horses, sound in every bone and nerve of their bodies."

And after that, in the general conversation there were pleasant comments of what such men would do if they were ever called upon to defend their country's flag. No one then had the remotest idea about any possibility of foreign war, but it was not many months before the social words spoken in easy compliment were fully realized.

The simple fact is that the American Navy has set a standard for its men which is even greater than the superexcellence of its machinery. The country which has surpassed the world in mechanical merit, whose ships are acknowledged to be the best afloat, and whose guns represent the most powerful and the most accurate implements of war, has also furnished the most effective men, and it is necessary that this standard should be maintained.

Thus it is that the Naval Academy is being remodeled, increased and improved. Thus it is that there are training ships at all the important ports. At San Francisco there is a naval station with barracks 300 feet long by 260 feet deep, accommodating 500 boys who are being trained for the navy.

And if there are any latent possibilities in a boy or young man who gets into the American Navy of to-day, the experience gives him a physical strength and power possible in no other public service of the Government.

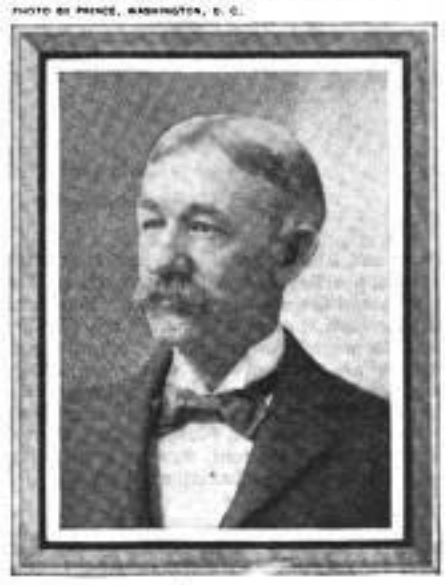
JOHN D. LONG, SECRETARY OF THE NAVY

New Types of the American War-Ships

There have been many interesting efforts to add curious craft to the modern navy. The submarine boat has been built in both hemispheres. A Frenchman has a boat that sinks and makes its way successfully beneath water. An Englishman has invented a submarine arrangement which acts on the same principle as a telescopic satchel and fires torpedoes at the unsuspecting foe. In this country Mr. Holland unquestionably demonstrated that a boat of his type could disappear and reappear at command and could travel intelligently under the surface. So successful were his demonstrations that a bill was introduced into Congress for twenty submarine boats of the Holland type. But the naval men neither of this country nor of Europe look upon the submarine boat with favor. A curious reason is given by the critics of these experts. They say that the old officers object to them mainly because they have no luxurious rooms or quarter-decks.

Be this as it may, there is no questioning the fact that the new battle-ships have officers' quarters that are luxurious beyond all precedent. The new Kearsarge, a battle-ship of 12,000 tons displacement, which is the heaviest in our navy, awakens the enthusiasm of all the officers who are to sail in it, for the quarters are said to be the finest of any battle-ship in the world. The new Kearsarge is the first of five magnificent vessels; the second, the Kentucky, is practically completed, and the Illinois, the Ohio and Alabama are in course of construction. Three others that will come along later are the Maine, Missouri and Wisconsin.



But though all these boats will largely increase the standard of size in our navy, still larger things are planned. Admiral Hichborn, the Chief Naval Constructor, is looking forward to battle-ships of 15,000 tons that will make twenty-one knots an hour. These would be finer and more powerful than any ships afloat, and would increase the speed greatly. Hitherto our battle-ships were required to make only sixteen knots—the Kearsarge exceeded this—but in the Maine, Missouri and Wisconsin eighteen knots are demanded. Abroad, the fastest battle-ships now being built will make twenty knots.

All this is enormously expensive, of course, but a big navy means millions of increase every year. The present generation will live to see our navy costing us over one hundred millions a year, and possibly the next century will not be very old before it may reach two hundred millions.

Other nations are limiting their navies only by the abilities of their exchequers. Emperor William's consuming ambition is that Germany shall have a navy equal to the best. He has announced his determination to "unerringly carry on and carry through the work of reorganizing my navy in order that it may be justified in standing by my land force," and this means millions and millions of taxes wrung from the people. A great navy costs.

Three MEN on Four Wheels

By Jerome K. Jerome

Copyright, 1899, by Jerome K. Jerome. Copyright in Great Britain

George, Harris and the author are making a holiday bicycle tour through Germany. After numerous wild adventures, they reach the Black Forest. A safety and a tandem are the mounts.

Lost in the Black Forest

THERE was one night when, tired out and far from town or village, we slept in a Black Forest farmhouse. The great charm about the Black Forest house is its sociability. The cows are in the next room, the horses are upstairs, the geese and ducks are in the kitchen, while the pigs, the children and the chickens live all over the place.

You are dressing, when you hear a grunt behind you.

"Good-morning. Don't happen to have any potato peelings in here? No, I see you haven't; good-by."

Next there is a cackle, and you see the neck of an old hen stretched around the corner.

"Fine morning, isn't it? You don't mind my bringing this worm of mine in here, do you? It is so difficult in this house to find a room where one can enjoy one's food with any quietness. I have always been a slow eater, and when a dozen—— There, I thought they wouldn't leave me alone. Now they'll all want a bit. You don't mind my getting on the bed, do you? Perhaps here they won't notice me."

While you are dressing, various shock heads peer in at the door; they evidently regard the room as a temporary menagerie. You cannot tell whether the heads belong to boys or girls; you can only hope they are all male. It is of no use to shut the door, because there is nothing to fasten it by, and the moment you are gone they push it open again. You breakfast as the Prodigal Son is generally represented feeding: a pig or two drop in to keep you company; a party of elderly geese criticise you from the door; you gather from their whispers, added to their shocked expression, that they are talking scandal about you. Maybe a cow will condescend to give a glance in.

This Noah's Ark arrangement it is, I suppose, that gives to the Black Forest home its distinctive scent. It is not a scent you can liken to any one thing. It is as if you took roses and Limburger cheese, and hair oil, some heather and onions, peaches and soapsuds, together with a dash of sea air, and mixed them all up together. You cannot define any particular odor, but you feel they are all there—all the odors that the world has yet discovered. People who live in these houses are fond of this mixture. They do not open the window and lose any of it; they keep it carefully bottled up. If you want any other scent you can go outside and smell the wood violets and the pines; inside, there is the house; and after a while, I am told, you get to miss it, and are unable to go to sleep in any other atmosphere.

You are dressing, when you hear a grunt

Editor's Note—Three Men on Four Wheels was begun in the Post of January 6. Each chapter is practically an independent story and may be read without reference to preceding installments.

We had a long walk before us the next day, and it was our desire, therefore, to get up early, even so early as six o'clock, if that could be managed without disturbing the whole household. We put it to our hostess whether she thought this could be done. She said she thought it could. She might not be about herself at that time; it was her morning for going into the town, some eight miles off, and she rarely got back much before seven. But possibly her husband or one of the boys would be returning home to lunch about that hour. Anyhow, somebody should be sent back to wake us and get us our breakfast.

As it turned out, we did not need any waking. We got up at four, all by ourselves. We got up at four in order to get away from the noise and the din that was making our heads ache. What time the Black Forest peasants rise in the summer time I am unable to say; to us they appeared to be getting up all night. And the first thing the Black Forester does when he gets up is to put on a pair of stout boots with wooden soles and take a constitutional around the house. Until he has been three times up and down the stairs he does not feel he is up. Once fully awake himself, the next thing he does is to go upstairs to the stables and wake up a horse. (The Black Forest house being built generally on the side of a steep hill, the ground floor is at the top and the hayloft at the bottom.) Then the horse, it would seem, must also have its constitutional around the house, and, this seen to, the man goes downstairs into the kitchen and begins to chop wood; and when he has chopped sufficient wood he feels pleased with himself and begins to sing. All things considered, we came to the conclusion we could not do better than follow the excellent example set us.

We had a frugal breakfast at half-past four and started away at five. Our road lay over a mountain, and from inquiries made in the village it appeared to be one of those roads you cannot possibly miss. I suppose everybody knows this sort of road. Generally it leads you back to where you started from; and when it doesn't you wish it did, so that at all events you might know where you were. I foresaw evil from the very first, and before we had accomplished a couple of miles we came up with it. The road divided into three. A worm-eaten signpost indicated that the path to the left led to a place that we had never heard of—that was on no map. Its other arm, pointing out the direction of the middle road, had disappeared. The road to the right, so we all agreed, clearly led back again to the village.

"The old man said distinctly," so Harris reminded us, "keep straight on around the hill!"

"Which hill?" George asked pertinently. We were confronted by about half a dozen, some of them big and some of them little.

"He told us," continued Harris, "that we should come to a wood."

"I see no reason to doubt him," commented George, "whichever road we take." As a matter of fact, a dense wood covered every hill.

"And he said," murmured Harris, "that we should reach the top in about an hour and a half."

"There," said George, "I begin to disbelieve him."

"Well, what shall we do?" asked Harris.

Now, I happen to possess the bump of locality. It is not a virtue; I make no boast of it. It is merely an animal instinct that I cannot help. That things occasionally get in my way—mountains, precipices, rivers, and such like obstructions—is no fault of mine. My instinct is correct enough; it is the earth that is wrong. I led them by the middle road. That the middle road had not character enough to continue for any quarter of a mile in the same direction, that after three miles up and down hill it ended abruptly in a wasps' nest, was not a thing that should have been laid to my door. If the middle road had gone in the direction it ought to have done it would have taken us to where we wanted to go; of that I am convinced. Even as it was I would have continued to use this gift of mine to discover a fresh way had a proper spirit been displayed toward me. But I am not an angel; I admit this frankly; and I decline to exert myself for the ungrateful and the ribald. Therefore it was that I washed my hands of the affair and Harris entered upon the vacancy.

"Well," said Harris, "I suppose you are satisfied with what you have done?"

"I am quite satisfied," I replied from the heap of stones where I was sitting. "So far I have brought you with safety. For all you know, you may be just where you want to be."

"Do not misunderstand us," said Harris. "Both George and myself feel that without your assistance we should never be where we now are. For that we give you every credit. But instinct is liable to err. What I propose to do is to substitute for it science, which is exact. Now, where's the sun?"

"Don't you think," said George, "that if we made our way back to the village and hired a boy for a mark to guide us it would save time in the end?"

"It would be wasting hours," replied Harris with decision. "You leave this to me." He took out his watch and began turning himself round and round.

"It's as simple as A B C," he continued. "You point the short hand at the sun; then you bisect the segment between the short hand and the twelve; and thus you get the north."

He worried up and down for a while, then he fixed it.

"Now I've got it," he said; "that's the north. Now give me the map."

We handed it to him and he examined it.

"Todtmoos, from here," he said, "is south by southwest."

"How do you mean 'from here'?" asked George.

"Why, from here, where we are," returned Harris.

"But where are we?" said George.

This worried Harris for a time.

"It doesn't matter where we are," he said at length; "wherever we are, Todtmoos is south by southwest. Come on; we are only wasting time."

"I don't quite see how you make it out," said George, as he arose and shouldered his knapsack; "but I suppose it doesn't matter. We are out for our health."

"We shall be all right," said Harris with cheery confidence. "We shall be in at Todtmoos before ten, don't you worry. And at Todtmoos we will have something to eat."

He said that he himself fancied a beefsteak, followed by an omelette. George said that personally he intended to keep his mind off the subject until he saw Todtmoos.

We walked for half an hour, then, emerging upon an opening, we saw below us about two miles away the village through which we had passed that morning. It had a quaint church with an outside staircase; a somewhat unusual arrangement.

The sight of it made me sad. We had been walking hard for three hours and a half, and had accomplished, apparently, about four miles. But Harris was delighted.

"Now, at last," said Harris, "we know where we are."

"I thought you said it didn't matter," George reminded him.

"No more it does, practically," replied Harris, "but it is just as well to be certain. Now I feel more confidence in myself."

"I'm not so sure about that being an advantage," murmured George. But I do not think Harris heard him.

"We are now," continued Harris, "east of the sun, and Todtmoos is southwest of where we are. So that if——"

He broke off. "By the by," he said, "do you remember whether I said the bisecting line of that segment pointed to the north or to the south?"

"You said it pointed to the north," replied George.

"Are you positive?" persisted Harris.

"Positive," answered George; "but don't let that influence your calculations. In all probability you were wrong."

Harris thought for a while; then his brow cleared.

"That's all right," he said; "of course it's the north. It must be the north. How could it be the south? Now we must make for the west. Come on."

"I am quite willing to make for the west," said George; "any point of the compass is the same to me. I only wish to remark that at the present moment we are going dead east."

"No, we are not," returned Harris; "we are going west."

"We are going east, I tell you," said George.

"I wish you wouldn't keep saying that," said Harris; "you confuse me."

"I don't mind if I do," returned George; "I would rather do that than go wrong. I tell you we are going dead east."

"What nonsense!" retorted Harris. "There's the sun."

"I can see the sun," answered George, "quite distinctly. It may be where it ought to be according to you and science, or it may not. All I know is, that when we were down in the village that particular hill with that particular lump of rock upon it was due north of us. At the present moment we are facing due east."

"You are quite right," said Harris; "I forgot for a moment that we had turned around."

"I should get into the habit of making a note of it if I were you," grumbled George; "it's a manœuvre that will probably occur again more than once."

We faced about and walked in the other direction. At the end of forty minutes' climbing we again emerged upon an opening, and again the village lay just under our feet. On this occasion it was south of us.

"This is very extraordinary," said Harris.

"I see nothing remarkable about it," said George. "If you walk steadily around a village it is only natural that now and then you get a glimpse of it. As for myself, I am glad to see it. It proves to me that we are not utterly lost."

"It ought to be the other side of us," said Harris.

"It will be in another hour or so," said George, "if we keep on."

I said little myself; I was vexed with both of them; but I was glad to notice George evidently growing cross with Harris. It was absurd of Harris to fancy he could find the way by the sun.

"I wish I knew," said Harris thoughtfully, "whether that bisecting line points to the north or to the south."

"I should make up my mind about it," said George; "it's an important point."

"It's impossible it can be the north," said Harris, "and I'll tell you why."

"You needn't trouble," said George; "I am quite prepared to believe it isn't."

"You said just now it was," said Harris reproachfully.

"I said nothing of the sort," retorted George: "I said you said it was; a very different thing. If you think it isn't, let's go the other way. It'll be a change, at all events."

So Harris worked things out according to the contrary calculation, and again we plunged into the wood; and again, after half an hour's stiff climbing, we came in view of that same village. True, this time it lay between us and the sun.

"I think," said George, as he stood looking down at it, "this is the best view we've had of it as yet. There is only one other point from which we can see it. After that, we can go down into it and get some rest."

"I don't believe it's the same village," said Harris; "it can't be."

"There's no mistaking that church," said George. "But maybe it is a case on all fours with that Prague statue. Possibly the authorities hereabouts have had made some life-sized models of that village and have stuck them about to see where the thing would look best. Anyhow, which way do we go now?"

"I don't know," said Harris, "and I don't care. I have done my best; you've done nothing but grumble and confuse me."

"I may have been critical," admitted George, "but look at the thing from my point of view. One of you says he's got an instinct, and leads me to a wasps' nest in the middle of a wood."

"I can't help wasps building in a wood," I replied.

"I don't say you can," answered George. "I am not arguing; I am merely stating incontrovertible facts. The other one, who leads me up and down hill for hours on scientific principles, doesn't know the north from the south, and is never quite sure whether he's turned around or whether he hasn't. Personally, I profess to no instincts beyond the ordinary, nor am I a scientist. But two fields off I can see a man. I am going to offer him the worth of the hay he is cutting, which I estimate at one mark fifty pfennigs, to leave his work and lead me to within sight of Todtmoos. If you two fellows like to follow, you can. If not, you can start another system and work it out by yourselves."

George's plan lacked both originality and aplomb, but at the moment it appealed to us. Fortunately we had worked around to a very short distance away from the spot where we had originally gone wrong, with the result that, aided by the gentleman of the scythe, we recovered the road and reached Todtmoos four hours later than we had calculated to reach it, with an appetite that took forty-five minutes' steady work in silence to abate.

From Todtmoos we had intended to walk down to the Rhine, but having regard to our extra exertions of the morning we decided to promenade in a carriage, as the French would say, and for this purpose hired a picturesque-looking vehicle, drawn by a horse that I should have called barrel-bodied but for contrast with his driver, in comparison with whom he was angular. In Germany every vehicle is arranged for a pair of horses, but drawn generally by one. This gives to the equipage a lopsided appearance, according to our notions; but it is held here to indicate style. The idea to be conveyed is that you usually drive a pair of horses, but that for the moment you have mislaid the other one. The German driver is not what we should call a first-class whip. He is at his best when he is asleep. Then, at all events, he is harmless; and the horse being, generally speaking, intelligent and experienced, progress under these conditions is comparatively safe. If in Germany they could only train the horse to collect the money at the end of the journey there would be no need for a coachman at all. This would be a distinct relief to the passenger, for when the German coachman is awake and not cracking his whip he is generally occupied in getting himself into trouble or out of it. He is better at the former.

Once I recollect driving down a steep Black Forest hill with a couple of ladies. It was one of those winding corkscrew roads. The hill arose at an angle of seventy-five on the off side, and fell away at an angle of seventy-five on the near side. We were proceeding very comfortably, the driver, we were happy to notice, with his eyes shut, when suddenly something—a bad dream or indigestion—awoke him. He seized the reins, and by an adroit movement pulled the near horse over the side, where it clung, half supported by the traces. Our driver did not appear in the least annoyed or surprised; both horses, I also noticed, seemed equally used to the situation. We got out and he got down. He took from under the seat a huge clasp-knife, evidently kept there for the purpose, and deftly cut the traces. The horse thus released rolled over and over until he struck the road again, some fifty feet below. There he regained his footing and stood waiting for us. We reëntered the carriage and descended with the single horse until we came to him. There, with the help of some bits of string, our driver harnessed him again and we continued on our way. What impressed me was the evident accustomedness of both driver and horses to this method of proceeding down a hill. Evidently to them it appeared a short and convenient cut. I should not have been surprised had the man suggested our strapping ourselves in, and then rolling over and over, carriage and all, to the bottom.

HE TOOK OUT HIS WATCH AND BEGAN TURNING HIMSELF ROUND AND ROUND

Another peculiarity of the German coachman is that he never attempts to pull in or to pull up. He regulates his rate of speed not by the pace of the horse, but by manipulation of the brake. For eight miles an hour he puts it on slightly, so that it only scrapes the wheel, producing a continuous sound as of the sharpening of a saw; for four miles an hour he screws it down harder, and you travel to an accompaniment of groans and shrieks, suggestive of a symphony of dying pigs. When he desires to come to a full stop he puts it on to its full. If his brake be a good one, he calculates he can stop his carriage, unless the horse be an extra powerful animal, in less than twice its own length.

At Waldshut, one of those little sixteenth-century towns through which the Rhine flows during its earlier course, we came across that exceedingly common object of the Continent: the traveling Briton, grieved and surprised at the unacquaintance of the foreigner with the subtleties of the English language. When we entered the station he was, in very fair English, though with a slight Somersetshire accent, explaining to a porter for the tenth time, as he informed us, the simple fact that though he himself had a ticket for Donaueschingen, and wanted to go to Donaueschingen to see the source of the Danube, which is not there, though they tell you it is; he wished his bicycle to be sent on to Engen and his bag to Constance, there to await his arrival. He was hot and angry with the effort of the thing. The porter was a young man in years, but at the moment looked old and miserable. I offered my services. I wish now I had not, though not so fervently, I expect, as he came subsequently to wish this. All three routes, so the porter explained to us, were complicated, necessitating changing and rechanging. There was not much time for calm elucidation, as our own train was starting in a few minutes. The man himself was voluble—always a mistake when anything entangled has to be made clear; while the porter was only too eager to get the job done with and so breathe again. It dawned upon me ten minutes later, when thinking the matter over in the train, that though I had agreed with the porter that it would be best for the bicycle to go by way of Immendingen, and had agreed to his booking it to Immendingen, I had neglected to give instructions for its departure from Immendingen.

Were I of a despondent temperament I should be worrying myself at the present moment with the reflection that in all probability that bicycle is still at Immendingen. But I regard it as good philosophy to endeavor always to see the brighter side of things. Possibly the porter corrected my omission on his own account, or some simple miracle may have happened to restore that bicycle to its owner some time before the end of his tour. The bag we sent to Radolfszell; but here I console myself with the recollection that it was labeled Constance; and no doubt after a while the railway authorities, finding it unclaimed at Radolfszell, forwarded it to Constance.

But all this is apart from the moral I wished to draw from the incident. The true inwardness of the situation lay in the indignation of this Britisher at finding a German railway porter unable to comprehend English. The moment we spoke to him he expressed this indignation in no measured terms.

"Thank you very much indeed," he said; "it's simple enough. I want to go to Donaueschingen myself by train; from Donaueschingen I am going to walk to Geisengen; from Geisengen I am going to take the train to Engen, and from Engen I am going to bicycle to Constance. But I don't want to take my bag with me; I want to find it at Constance when I get there. I have been trying to explain the thing to this fool for the last ten minutes; but I can't get it into him."

"It is very disgraceful," I agreed. "Some of these German workmen know hardly any language but their own."

"I have gone over it with him," continued the man, "on the time-table, and explained it by pantomime. Even then I could not knock it into him."

"I can hardly believe you," I again remarked; "you would think the thing explained itself."

Harris was angry with the man; he wished to reprove him for his folly in journeying through the outlying portions of a foreign clime, and seeking in such to accomplish complicated railway tricks without knowing a word of the language of the country. But I pointed out to him the great and good work at which the man was unconsciously assisting.

Shakespeare and Milton may have done their little best to spread acquaintance with the English tongue among the less-favored inhabitants of Europe. Newton and Darwin may have rendered their language a necessity among educated and thoughtful foreigners. Dickens and Ouida (for your folk who imagine that the literary world is bounded by the prejudices of New Grub Street would be surprised and grieved at the position occupied abroad by this at-home-sneered-at Lady) may have helped still further to popularize it. But the man who has spread the knowledge of English from Cape St. Vincent to the Ural Mountains is the Englishman who, unable or unwilling to learn a single word of any language but his own, travels purse in hand into every corner of the Continent. One may be shocked at his ignorance, annoyed at his stupidity, angry at his presumption, but the practical fact remains: he it is that is Anglicizing Europe. For him the Swiss peasant tramps through the snow on winter evenings to attend the English class open in every village. For him the coachman and the guard, the chambermaid and the laundress, pore over their English grammars and colloquial phrase books. For him the foreign shopkeeper and merchant send their sons and daughters in their thousands to study in every English town. For him it is that every foreign hotel and restaurant keeper adds to his advertisement: "Only those with fair knowledge of English need apply."

Did the English-speaking races make it their rule to speak anything else than English the marvelous progress of the English tongue throughout the world would stop. The English-speaking man stands amid the strangers and jingles his gold. "Here," he cries, "is payment for all such as can speak English." He is the great educator. Theoretically, we may scold him; practically, we should take our hats off to him. He is the missionary of the English tongue.

United States Senators by Popular Vote

THE Fifth Article of the Constitution provides that, "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in every case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof."

The fifteen amendments that have been made to the Constitution were adopted on the initiative of Congress itself.

The alternative method has never been employed. It is now, however, seriously proposed that the Legislatures shall make use of the power which the Constitution unquestionably gives to them. Public sentiment in the country seems to be overwhelmingly in favor of electing United States Senators by popular vote. Numerous Legislatures have adopted resolutions to that effect. The Legislature of Iowa last month passed such a proposition with only four negative votes. In California some years ago, when the question was tested by popular vote, every county favored it, and the whole vote was 187,958 in the affirmative to 13,342 against.

One of the most ingenious efforts to adapt the present method to a popular vote and to combine the two was made by Georgia about four years ago. The feeling ran high and there was the usual lack of confidence in what the new Legislature might do. In that State the Democratic nomination is equivalent to election, and so the Democrats agreed to a plan by which the voters in each county expressed their choice as to who should be the next United States Senator. There was a vigorous contest. The plan was successful.

Twice the House of Representatives has passed a resolution proposing that the Constitution be amended so that the Senators should be elected by popular vote. Each of these resolutions was ignored by the Senate. There is in the present House of Representatives a similar resolution which will doubtless share the fate of its predecessors. The power that stands in the way of the change is the Senate itself, and as far as Congress is concerned little might be hoped for, but the alternative plan provided for by the Constitution can make the Senate take the action whether it wants to or not.

Notorious conditions in Pennsylvania led the Legislature last year to appoint a joint committee to consider this whole question. It has done something more than can usually be expected of the average legislative committee. It has communicated with the Governors and Secretaries of all the States asking that legislative committees be appointed to a national convention in Philadelphia. The result of this organized effort will appear later. If two-thirds of the States can be favorably influenced, and if their Legislatures take the necessary action, the whole change will be as good as made, although it will necessarily take several years to complete the formalities. It has been very cleverly suggested, however, that when the Senate realizes the force of public opinion and sees the inevitable, it will not persist in its present policy.

In fairness it should be stated that there are many who believe that a change in methods will not necessarily mean an improvement in Senators. These point to the fact that the Governors are elected by popular vote; and as a rule the Governors are not any better men than the United States Senators. In many cases which they name they are distinctly worse. The argument for the popular vote is that Senators with money could not buy their way in as readily as they do with corrupt Legislatures. The whole situation is a fine reflection upon the condition of our suffrage and of our legislative morality, and the best and most hopeful sign in it all is the aggressive sentiment of the good people whose votes cannot be bought at any price. This, indeed, is the strength of the movement, for it is moral as well as political.

—LYNN ROBY MEEKINS.

One man elected United States Senator admits that he spent $152,000, and others charge that he spent several times that sum. The era of high prices has reached politics.

Motive in Public Spirit

PUBLIC spirit may be defined as doing the right thing in public affairs for right's sake at the right time. These are the three constituent elements. Many a person does the right thing for policy's sake on the principle that "honesty is the best policy." The politician contributes to a church fund or other benevolent object to make himself popular with those interested in it. He is doing a right thing; but only for policy's sake. The motive is lacking to make it an entirely acceptable gift. We are constantly hearing of the generosity of the "district leader," or the "ward boss." How he is sending coal here and food there, and visiting the sick and the bereaved. He obeys the Scriptural injunction so far, but he fails to keep within the spirit or to observe the part about keeping one's self "unspotted from the world." And what does he exact in return for all his kindness and sympathy? Unquestioning obedience to his political orders; an unswerving support of his political course. No matter if he is supporting corrupt measures; no matter if he is aiding rich and unscrupulous corporations to filch valuable franchises; no matter if he is saddling heavy burdens on posterity and squandering the public funds—so long as he is good to the poor in his district he is said to be generous, and by some, public-spirited. He is doing a right thing, but for what base and despicable motives!

Something more than proper motive is needed in public spirit. Wisdom is essential. Wisdom tells you when to do the right thing for right's sake. How much good and well-intended advice and admonition has gone astray because given at the wrong time. Through his negligence and foolhardiness a boy falls into the river. He cannot swim. Your first duty is to rescue him, not to lecture him on his shortcomings or his heedlessness. For while you are doing that he may drown. The same is true with regard to a rebellious child. There is a right and a wrong time to correct it. There can be no question as to the need of the remedy. There is a question as to the time of applying it.

The same principle should be applied in public affairs as in private. The right of petition, of free speech, of discussion, should never be abridged. Healthful criticism of the Government should always be invited and tolerated; but there is a right and a wrong time to apply it. The public-spirited man is he who applies it at the right time and for the good of his country. Governor Roosevelt put the case in a nutshell when he said: "Criticism is undoubtedly necessary, though less so than many other things. The men who criticise most severely are rarely those who work effectively to destroy the evils complained of. Excessive and indiscriminate scolding, fretting and faultfinding are even more injurious than excessive and indiscriminate laudation." In short, criticism is not necessarily public spirit. We must not mistake the mere critic for the patriot.

—CLINTON ROGERS WOODRUFF.

The trust claims to be a growth. So is a wart.

Voluntary Slaves and Their Slavery

WHAT would be the social and economic condition of the United States could another Lincoln issue an Emancipation Proclamation which should sever the ties that bind some millions of white people to their taskmasters, some of whom are suspected, some hated, only a few respected or loved? Quite as much work would remain to be done, and there would be quite as many people competent to do it, but the masters—or employers, if the term be preferred—would be at their wits' end to find workers, and most of the workers would be incompetent to take any places but those which they had already filled and abhorred.

Most men are so incompetent, or so unwilling to seek new surroundings, no matter how bad their circumstances may seem to be, that their condition is literally that of slavery. Not all of them are stupid or devoid of aspiration, and all wish that their condition might be bettered, but they lack the indefinable something that causes a man, no matter how few his abilities or how humble his position, to be in the higher sense his own master. Absolute dependence on their employers for the time being is the condition of the great majority of the employed, and reluctance and inability to work in any other place or for any other man is a common confession of all classes of workers; and almost as common is a willingness to remain in whatever position they chance to be.

It is currently supposed that vacancies in the higher departments of any business can easily be filled from the men below, but employers know to their sorrow that this is not true. That a man does stated, automatic work for stated wages, and does it well, too, does not necessarily imply that he has ever given a thought to the duties of the position next above him, much though he would like the higher position's pay. It is a common complaint of men in mills, stores and offices of all kinds, that frequently some "rank outsider" who has not been long at the business gets the best position that becomes vacant. Yet what are employers to do?

A few weeks ago a large business corporation in New York suddenly needed a head clerk for a room containing about fifty other clerks, about half of whom had been in the same room for several years, and all of whom did their work sufficiently well. The abilities of each of the fifty were fairly canvassed, for it was greatly desired that the new head clerk should be a man who already knew the members of the working staff, but in the end one of the "rank outsider" class had to be chosen. Doubtless some of the men in the room had the necessary ability, but they had never displayed it in the office; as the general manager said, "None of them ever manifested special interest in anything but pay-day."

The same corporation issued a general notice, more than a year ago, that suggestions on improving any department of the business would be welcomed from any employee, and, if used, would be paid for liberally. From seven hundred clerks, none of whom is a fool, only five suggestions had been received before the present year began, yet in the same period the clerks had indulged in hundreds of complaints to one another, any one of which had in it the basis of a practical business suggestion.

According to employers, similar stories might be told about the working force of almost any house in the land. Unconsciously, yet absolutely, most men who work for wages are as dependent on their employers as were the Southern slaves on their masters. Most of them are honest and industrious; some are of high moral character, but their interest is so fixed upon what they get that they have little to spare for what they do; therefore they never increase their value to their employers or to themselves. Many of them think, and rightly, that they are the superiors, mentally, of the men above them; but nothing is hit by the bullet that is never fired, nor did anything but trouble ever come of the talent that was hid in a napkin. When, through changes of business, such men lose their places, they are as helpless as the slave who has lost his master. If their condition is not that of voluntary slavery, what is it?

—JOHN HABBERTON.

Failure, to the man who learns, means experience, and experience is equipment, and equipment is wealth.

Variegated Monotony

HEARING the wind booming abroad in a pine wood, or the surf pounding a spit of lonely and shifting sand, may be taken as typical of monotony; but at times one feels that a large part of life is keyed to an unvarying level of expression as strangely meaningless as any natural feature of things can be. Our daily labor has its sing-song hum, like the buzz of a bee or the purr of a drowsy cat, when there is no interruption, and we easily admit the impression that because work is the same all the year round it must of course be uninteresting, the business of a droning intelligence and a mechanical existence.

Looking steadfastly into life's countenance, however, is apt to disclose to us a deeper significance flowing under the placid surface of our experience. What passes before a casual gaze as a dreary monotony, a depressing sameness of sound and motion, appears to the earnest eye a splendid exhibition of our power—a fine mode of human energy making for the perfect destiny of the race.

Naturalists tell us that the wind in the tree-tops, making the lonesomest of moans, has for a function the gentle swaying of the tall boles, which communicate their motion to the deepest roots in the ground, thus assisting in aërating the soil and adding racy vigor throughout the complicated subterrane tangle which feeds the whole mighty plant. It is not different with us; the continual monotony of the business of life, with its droning sameness from day to day, somehow stirs the spiritual part of us to the profoundest depth.

Indeed, we may distinguish genius from the lesser endowments by its ability to make the most of what common minds deem the merest surface drift of opportunity, too ordinary and plentiful to be of any value. What we call invention is but a fresh setting together of verities as old as the stars, and as monotonously beautiful. Discovery is nothing more than surprising a hidden link in a uniform chain. Not a machine of all man's mighty wonder work of mechanism has in it a single departure from the law of force and motion.

Habit enforces regularity, which is but another name for monotony, and we may safely assume that what we call "good breeding" is the outward manifestation of an inward habit, the result of undeviating example, precept, practice; in a word, the monotony of culture. Even the gorgeous surprises of epoch-making genius have flashed upon the world with a rhythmical, recurring beat, so that in reading history we mark time by them, and keep pace with the centuries by even and regular steps. The great poets, painters, musicians, the statesmen, soldiers and philosophers, who have stirred up the deeps of human life and changed the current of civilization here and yonder, appear, as we look back at them, surprisingly to correspond with a certain splendid plangency in the current of time which throbs as regularly as the pulse of a strong, calm man.

And what a fine, stimulating sight it is to see the brave column of to-day pressing right on up the same monotonously laborious incline toward the winking and still infinitely distant star of destiny! What Pythagoras heard as the music of the spheres was but the rhythm of human activities, the steady, onward, undeviating and regular throbbing of life's changeless current. Law is method in operation, and method is monotony.

At the English Capital

THEY are telling a rather good story told of Mr. Bradley-Martin and his encounter with a London cabby. The cabby is easily the quickest-witted and glibbest-tongued occupier of the Queen's highways in this capital; he is clever at sarcasm, and when he begins to use bad language the very Landseer lions in Trafalgar Square turn tail and quake. Talk about the British soldier being "Duke's son, cook's son"—her Thomas Atkins is nothing like so universally related as the British cabby. When a certain sort of man, the horsey dare-devil who loves London and lights, "goes broke," he takes to cab driving as naturally as a duck to water, and the streets swarm with cabbies who have received university educations and have been in their day well to do and of good social positions.

The Londoner knows that he cannot score off cabby under any circumstances, and so leaves him to fight his never-ending battles with brother cabbies, 'bus drivers and policemen. The other morning Mr. Bradley-Martin was crossing Pall Mall near the Carlton Club, and a cab coming down the street at a good pace came within an ace of spiking the wealthy American with one of its shafts. The cabby pulled up only in time to save the situation. Mr. Bradley-Martin leaped to the pavement and, turning in anger to the cabby, shouted angrily, "Who the deuce are you trying to run down?" Cabby gazed in contempt and sorrow upon the flushed pedestrian and replied: "Blest if I know, Gov'nor. You're a new species to me."

A MUCH-PROMOTED PRISONER

THE Seventh New York officers who came across to this little island last year and had a few words with the Queen will well remember the hospitality shown them by the "London Scottish." The London Scottish is a volunteer regiment, perhaps the smartest in all the service, fine men in gray-yellow uniform and, to be sure, the kilts. The regiment is kept fit and on a "war footing"; there is great competition among the young men eligible to join, and no man who is not physically sound and in spirit keen at his work is allowed to remain on the roll. The London Scottish scoop in every American soldier or volunteer they can lay hands on, and to quote Prade:

"If he departed as he came
With no new light on love or liquor,
Good sooth, the traveler was to blame
And not the London Scot, by jigger!"

It will amuse your volunteers to hear that the London Scottish's adjutant has been in a peculiarly mortifying position. Colonel Scott, the adjutant, was second in command of the Second Battalion of the famous Black Watch, now in South Africa. In one of the fights his senior, Dick Cunningham, was severely wounded, so Scott was promoted. Then the command of the First Battalion fell vacant and Scott got the filling of that position. This was followed by the death of General Wauchop, and of course Scott went to the head of affairs. Now, all this time he was "sitting on a tar barrel" in Ladysmith, utterly unable to get out to assume any of the commands that by seniority fell to him. It is said that his brother officers in Ladysmith took to humming when in Scott's presence, "Oh, for the wings of a dove," until the situation became too pathetic, for Scott is very ambitious and loves to lead in a fight.

BOER REPARTEE BY HELIOGRAPH

THERE have been frequent little chats between Briton and Boers by means of the heliograph, and in one of them the latter scored a decided hit. Speaking to the Boers crowning the steep hills that confronted Buller's army, the Englishman at the end of a conversation flashed, "Well, when we do get up there at you, may God help you."

The answer came back, "Oh, He will!"

Genial Dr. Conan Doyle, who has gone to the front, made an equally witty retort the other day. "I hear you are going to dramatize your earliest work and play a principal part," said a friend of his, meeting him on the street.

Doyle shook his head. "I know nothing of it," he said.

"But you're going to the front, are you not?"

"Yes."

"Well, the first time you get into the thick of it I'll bet a new hat yours will be The White-faced Company."

"No, sir," retorted Doyle, "I'm a doctor, and am going out to make A Study in Scarlet, if you want to know."

Conan Doyle is a splendid athlete, firm in the saddle, a quick and sure shot, and an all-around sportsman. And as he will be attached to the medical corps to act on the field of battle he will run a first-class chance of seeing the fighting in its warmest corners. Strong as a giant, he is just the man to render first aid and then to take a wounded man under each arm and walk off the field with them.

THE EXPLOITS OF THE SEVENTEENTH LANCERS

THE "Death or Glory" boys have sailed for South Africa and by this time are in the field. This regiment, the Seventeenth Lancers, is considered quite the smartest in the British Army, and the officers and men have a long history of glorious service to spur them on in the coming campaign. It may not be generally known in "the States" that this regiment—which, by the way, led the charge of the Light Brigade at Balaklava, going in 145 strong and coming out with 35 survivors—begins its history with your War of Independence. In 1776 the regiment happened to be stationed at Halifax, and they were, I believe, the only British regular cavalrymen that took part in the war. They were at the capture of New York, they forced the passage of the Bronx River, and were in many little "scraps" in which they had their work cut out for them—and a bit more. To-day in County Down, Ireland, there is a monument to the Seventeenth Lancer, Corporal O'Lavery, who lost his life in America. The circumstances were these. It became necessary to send a dispatch of urgent importance to Lord Rawdon. As in the Transvaal, carriers of dispatches had a warm time of it, for Washington's men were supreme as sharpshooters, and so the business required a man of bravery and resource if it was to stand a reasonable chance of success. To accompany the dispatch-bearer the authorities picked upon Corporal O'Lavery of the Seventeenth Lancers. The two had not gone far before bullets began to zip about their ears and presently the dispatch-bearer fell from his horse, dead. O'Lavery dismounted, seized the paper and rode for all he was worth. But at length he was sore hit; he rode for a time with his arms around his horse's neck, and finally, weak from loss of blood, fell to earth. Although in intense agony, the lancer, fearing his important paper might fall into Washington's hands, folded it into small compass and shoved it deep into the ragged wound the bullet had made. Next day he was found stretched out by the roadside, and with only life left in him to point to the secreting place of the precious paper. He died shortly after and the County Down monument tells the tale of his unflinching courage. "Death or Glory" boys did not return to England until 1783. Later they campaigned in South America, so that the Western Hemisphere should take interest in their doings, now that they are again afoot.

MR. WHISTLER'S PARDONABLE MISTAKE

HERE is a tale of Mr. James McNeil Whistler which may be true. Every one knows in what contempt the famous expatriated American artist holds our Royal Academy. To be an "R. A."—a member of the Royal Academy—is, in his eyes, to be held in eternal disgrace by all true artists. The body of the Royal Academy could never tell what Whistler's pictures meant, and of course Whistler looks upon that as the smartest feather in his artistic hat. He was in a "smart" restaurant in the West End not long ago and was not successful in getting exactly what he wanted. The waiter, after various attempts to satisfy him, said, referring to a dish Whistler wanted, "Well, sir, I can't make out quite what you mean."

"Gad, sir," shouted Mr. Whistler in astonished tones, "are you an R. A.?"

YOUNG MARLBOROUGH'S SHORTCOMINGS

Miss Consuelo Vanderbilt's husband, the Duke of Marlborough, is in South Africa in charge of a large body of yeomanry. It will be interesting to see how this latest descendant of the hero of Blenheim shapes in the face of the enemy. When his appointment was announced at the Army and Navy Club, a crusty old Indian officer, who had evidently heard the Duke speak at some Primrose gathering of women, blurted out, "By Heavens, if he comes to a halt as often in a charge as he does in a speech, his men may as well dig their graves before they start." But his deed may be better than his word.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

All human laws are grounded on the high and immutable laws of Nature and the laws of revelation; at least they should be so; and the Business Combinations or Trusts that were so ably advocated by Mr. Charles R. Flint in a recent issue of your valuable and interesting journal are nothing more nor less than imperium in imperio—that is, the act of creating a government within a government, and præmunire, on the same order, was held under the ancient law to be treason, and punishable by decapitating, drawing and quartering.

Therefore it is a very good thing that Mr. Flint lives in the age of statutes in the stead of an age when all laws were grounded on immemorial customs and the Scriptures, or, in other words, in an age when the colossal power of corporate capital is apparently stronger than the "Laws of Nature and of Nature's God," which Thomas Jefferson sent ringing through the ages from old Independence Hall in your own fair city of Philadelphia, on the Fourth of July, A. D. 1776.

In Governor, now United States Senator, A. J. McLaurin's recent address to the Mississippi Legislature, occurs the following language in regard to the matter under consideration: "A great evil and danger threatening the State is found in what is termed trusts. Combinations of corporate capital have been formed to strangle all kinds of competition. Corporations that have been authorized by statutory enactment to organize and operate independently of each other, for reciprocal advantage to themselves and the public, have combined to practice the most tyrannical extortion upon the people. They demand authority to exercise their despotic sway over the laborer employed and the consumer of their wares. By the formation of trusts they cut down the number of laborers and employees and compensate themselves by extortion in the price of their products. By these unlawful aggregations of corporate capital all consumers and nearly every class of laborers and employees suffer."

All of the foregoing is absolutely true. I desire to ask Mr. Flint a few questions and respectfully to solicit a reply: "If the principal advantage of business combinations is that raw material can be purchased in large quantities and secured at a lower price, and the total grand result is a lower market price which accrues to the benefit of the consumers at home and abroad," etc., then what benefits do such Business Combinations or Trusts confer upon the producers of the raw material? And if low markets are as beneficial generally, as he says in one place, then why does he contradict himself by saying in another place that "Nothing in the past has more demoralized industries than overproduction in times of prosperity and the scramble for markets in times of adversity, resulting in the cutting of prices to such extent as to necessitate the reduction of wages?"

Now, Mr. Flint, is it not a fact that as America is the greatest producing country on the face of the globe, she needs more markets and better markets, and higher prices for what she produces, and less of monopolistic corporations and combines and trusts?

J. R. LINDSAY.

Capell, Mississippi.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

There is no question about the "rightful existence of aggregations of capital." It is regarding wrongful incorporations, in restraint of trade; regarding the kind of legal person the legislature shall create; regarding the restrictions that shall be placed upon the conduct of corporations that the American public is now exercised.

It would seem to be a self-evident truth that a legal person should not have privileges or powers exceeding those of a private individual, and it has now become plain that such legal person, having no heart on which the moral law may be written, should be subject to such written commandments as shall give substantial honesty to his conduct. Otherwise he may greatly injure the people who created him.

Every State has recognized the benefits of "rightful" combinations of capital by authorizing persons to incorporate, and even giving them a premium by exempting their private property from payment of the corporate debt; yet the patronage of the public is very greatly influenced by the financial standing of the incorporators as individuals, and this very influence has often resulted in loss to the public.

Then Mr. Flint's article points out the "best examples" of these combinations as those who have "increased their reserves in times of prosperity so that they might be able to pay dividends in times of financial depression." It further points out that the combinations organized in the last five years are mainly based upon the earnings of that period.

Then it would appear that the "best examples" are those whose capital stock is based upon net earnings so conserved among the years as to be available every year to pay a dividend. If these are the best examples of corporations we may well be looking for improvement. These suggestions doubtless refer to combined corporations and the capital stock of the combine, at least regarding the lately formed companies.

It appears that the real value of the property that is taken into the combine is not the guide for capitalization. Nor does the real cost of the railroads referred to seem to have much relation to their capital stock.

It probably denotes total want of acquaintance with the methods of corporations and very defective business acumen to suggest that capitalization should only be equaled by investment and growth in value of property. The mass of the public have until late years supposed that capital stock represented a money investment of equal amount. Late years many have discovered something wrong. Wealth has seemed to come with remarkable rapidity to members of some companies.

People to-day find it more difficult to engage in any remunerative business than formerly. They are looking for the cause, and appear to have found at least one great cause in the methods of corporations which trusts are seeking to carry out on a larger scale and with hope of monopoly to make their plans effective.

The statistician's allowance of twenty-three dollars per capita is, to the general public, a fiction. It may show the resources of corporations, but great masses of individuals have counted their family, multiplied by twenty-three, counted their money, and been discouraged that they failed even of an average.

They have looked over their little town, and see that if the one company should move away the per capita of the town would not be fifty cents.

Competition does not adjust the matter. Failures only transfer the assets to the bondholders—placing the property in fewer hands.

Population does not produce the dearth of paying business opportunities for the masses. There is wealth and money abundant for all, but it has reached the hands of comparatively few people.

Publicity might help the matter, but some wholesome legislative restrictions to guard against errors of the past and prospective future errors will be most apt to control these skillful manipulators.

We are proud of our country and its industrial progress, and want and need for each citizen an active and responsible part in its industries, and want to correct business evils without crippling any worthy enterprise, and would like to see all citizens work for the most rapid advancement of all, letting the welfare of each and all Americans stand first.

Tenth Chapter

THE night fell on three of the most unhappy people in the world; yet to each had been vouchsafed a partial realization of a cherished hope. Coventry should have been luxuriating in the thought of his approaching marriage to the girl he loved; Elizabeth should have been overwhelmed with joy at the reappearance of O'Neill, after his two years of absence; and O'Neill, during that time, had asked for nothing but an opportunity to stand once more in the presence of his divinity. The desire of each had been granted, and yet all three were completely miserable: Coventry, because he more than suspected that Elizabeth loved O'Neill; Elizabeth, because she felt that honor compelled her to marry Coventry, to whom she was deeply attached, but toward whom her feelings were vastly different from those which had flooded her being with new life at the sight of the young Irishman. Her years of waiting and dreaming had unconsciously developed a passion for him which had broken all barriers at the mere sound of his voice, the sight of his face. As for O'Neill, he found her fairer than he had ever thought, even in his most extravagant dream, and it was in an agony of despair that he contemplated her as the bride of another. There was this saving grace in his position, however: he would probably be condemned to death forthwith, and he was in no mood to balk the executioner; if ever death were welcome, it would be so to him.

The only one who was completely at his ease, and who, in fact, extracted a certain satisfaction from the situation, was the Admiral. Naturally he did not enter very deeply into the matrimonial schemes of the young, and, with the indifference of the aged and the present, he doubted that it would be a matter of any great difficulty either to make Elizabeth forget, if necessary, the Irishman, in whom even his obtuse vision had detected that she was greatly interested, or, in case it suited his purpose better, to make his son forget Elizabeth in the presence of some other charmer whom he might select.

His purpose was, as ever, the paramount consideration with the Admiral. He had conceived a brilliant idea which he fondly hoped would result in the capture of the notorious Paul Jones, who was the object of consuming desire on the part of every military and naval man in the Three Kingdoms. So enchanted was the old man with his own idea, and so desirous was he of bagging the game, that he would not have hesitated to sacrifice the affections of his son, the happiness of his ward, or to brush aside almost anything save his honor which might stand in his way.

The young Irishman had clearly forfeited his life by his action; nay, more: now that he recalled his name he remembered that he had been found guilty of high treason, and, like his father, was under sentence of death for that as well. He had a double hold upon him, therefore. The powers of the Admiral, who was one of the leading men of the realm, were unusually large, and as a state of martial law had been proclaimed on the coast he was supreme as to life or death in matters where any military exigency could be urged.

He chuckled to himself at the thought that he held in his hand two of the master cards: love of life and love of woman. The third, love of honor, which O'Neill was possessed of, was a high one, to be sure, but he trusted by clever play to win the game. Elizabeth had become a State paper—a pledge in pawn—to him; O'Neill, another piece, or player. He had not yet formulated any plan for carrying out his great idea, but one was already germinating in his mind, so that in the end, under the stimulus of the splendid opportunity he saw before him for rounding out an already brilliant career in the service of his country by effecting the capture of the famous Paul Jones, his hours were as sleepless as were those of the others.

The poor Irish Lieutenant had caused a great deal of trouble to every one with whom he had come in contact. Even Paul Jones himself, who loved and cherished the young man with all his generous heart, was filled with deep anxiety as to his probable fate when he heard the report of old Price the next day; and the more so as the hours fled away and his Lieutenant did not rejoin the ship. In spite of the absence of the rest of his squadron, the Commodore at once hastened to the rendezvous with the Richard alone, and there determined to take a small hand in the game himself while waiting for the Pallas, the Alliance, and the others to assemble. Cautious inquiries which he caused to be made on shore had informed him that O'Neill had been apprehended; a heartless kindly man than Paul Jones would have left him to his fate—but that was not his way.

Early the next morning—Wednesday, September 22—O'Neill arose and went down on the terrace of the castle overlooking the ocean and the ships in the harbor. There he found Lady Elizabeth gazing listlessly over the causeway at a horseman galloping along the road.

"Do I interrupt reminiscences of a tête-à-tête, madame?" said he, saluting her.

"Reminiscences such as mine are better interrupted," she replied.

"You were——"

"Saying good-by to my—my—cousin."

"Has Your Ladyship no dearer title than that by which to designate him?"

"Not yet," she answered wearily.

"Ah! I perceive," he continued jealously: "the natural regret at the absence of your betrothed, for——"

"No, no; not that. How can you trifle so with me at this moment? He reproached me because I—— Why do I tell you these things? You constrain me, sir; I——"

"Forgive me; you need not finish, Lady Elizabeth," he said with sudden gravity. "As for me, I must needs trifle, or die. Life in the freshness of the morning, the white-capped ocean stretching before us in the sunlight, is sweet to think on; with youth and rank and station it would be heavenly, spent with you. Without you, I welcome the death your guardian will inflict upon me."

"Yet you waited so long—two years—why did you not come? I——" She stopped. She had spoken in a low, tender whisper, looking down at the sea beneath them and plucking nervously at the loose plaster of the old wall. Death so imminent for love and lover—nay, not for love; that is eternal—broke down petty convention. Where were death and love there should truth and honesty be—and honor.

He laid his strong hand gently down on the small white one outlined upon the gray, weather-beaten rock of the parapet; with upturned palm she met his grasp. Her eyes were lifted now; she drew strength from his strength; a dawning hope flickered into being in her torn heart. He was so strong and true, he surely could do something—there must be some other way. It was the tribute woman pays to man.

He read aright, with eyes keen from affection, the piteous appeal in her sweetly lifted face; but he could only smile sadly with a silent shake of the head. There was no other way then—in the marked path she must walk.

"Was it long to you, dearest?" he queried, his dark face aflame. "To me—I have been a fool. Nothing should have kept me from you. To trust to messengers, letters—a fool—too late!" Silence. The hands unclasped, ties were broken. "Too late!" He turned bitterly away.

"Would that we had met in happier days!" she murmured sadly, making a brave effort at self-control.

"No reproaches, Lady Elizabeth," he answered, the touch of formality in the address showing his own equal strife. "What must be, must be! At least I have met you before I die, and for two years have thought of you, and dreamed of you, and held you the lady of my heart. E'en death itself cannot rob me of that sweet joy—for it is past."

They looked apart and heard above the voice of the great deep, the unfathomable sound of the moaning surge far beneath them chafing against the pebbles in the still morning, the wild beating of their hearts; after a little pause he continued more softly:

"And you—you will forget the young Irishman, the soldier of fortune, whom untoward fate threw across your pathway, and in your own English home and in the love of your noble husband may you be happy."

"Nay, not so," she said softly, taking his hand again, her eyes filling with tears—this time she was the stronger—"my heart is not made of such fickle stuff. I shall do my duty—keep my plighted word—even you would have me do no less than that—but not more steadfastly than I shall keep you within my recollection. But do not talk of death; you must not. I know the Admiral—he has a kindly heart——"

"I would not live," replied the young man, "for life is death when the heart is dead."

"Tell me," asked the girl, nervously breaking the almost insupportable silence, "were you there when my mother's picture fell last night?"

"Yes, so near to it that it almost fell into my arms," he answered, smiling.

"A bad omen," she murmured, shaking her head.

"What, that it should fall into my arms?"

"No, that it should fall at all."

"Well, I do not believe in omens, and 'tis in the arms of another that you fall, at any rate. He gets the substance, I the shadow—the illusion—and even that is broken."

"And so even the shadow is lost," said Elizabeth.

"Not yet. Open my heart and you will find it there," he answered quickly. "But how like you the portrait was!"

"Yes, I am said to look like my mother," she answered, striving as we all do in tragic moments to reach the height of the commonplace. "In the dress I now wear under the changing fashions the likeness is not so striking, but when I am gowned as she was, in the identical costume—which is still in existence, by the way—and sit as she did in the dim light in that old chair, the resemblance is even more striking."

"Would that I might see you thus—in that dress of the olden time. Nothing except your actual presence in the hall has ever startled me so much as that image of the past did last night. You are so like the picture, but more beautiful, I think."

"Ah, yes; youth and the present are always the more beautiful. The Admiral says I cannot hold a candle to her—he loved her, I think; she was his cousin; they tell me she married very young, unhappily, too, and died when I was born, many years after. My father, too, died; I can scarcely remember him. I am alone."

"There should be a warning in this, should there not?" he asked softly, an idle question Fate had determined.

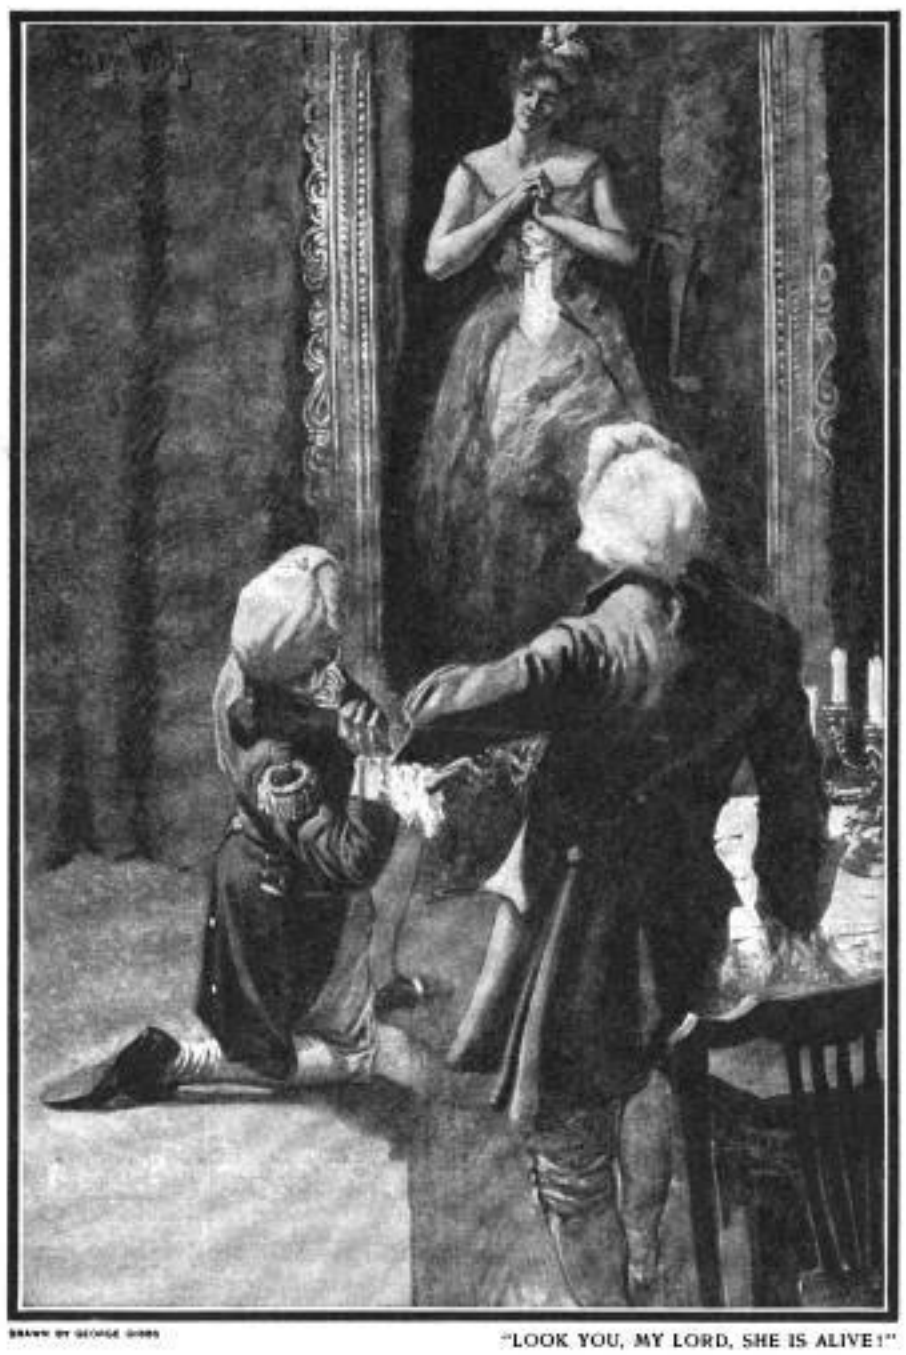
"I suppose so," replied the girl wearily, "but what was I to do? The arrangement was made when I was a child. I have grown up with Edward Coventry; he loves me; he is a noble fellow; I respect—esteem him highly. It is a long-cherished wish of the Admiral's; it was my mother's wish as well. I put him off, in spite of the engagement, for a year—for six months again," she said, with a glance the fond reproach of which cut him to the heart. "I promised him on my word of honor if he would only wait that time I would make no further objections. I cannot break that word now."

"Not even for me?"

"No, not even for you," replied Elizabeth.

"But you do not love him?" queried O'Neill.

"Yes," she answered slowly, "I do—in a way, that is."



"But not like——"

"'Tis not generous of you," she answered proudly, "to press me further. I—we have decided. I can stand no more. Forgive me—have mercy!"

"I respect your decision; nay, more, I honor you for it, Lady Elizabeth," he answered gravely. "I kiss your hand and go to my death smiling. Forget me."

"Your death!" she cried in alarm; "what mean you?"

"The Admiral, sir, would speak with you in the office at once," interrupted the Sergeant, who had approached with a file of soldiers.

DRAWN BY GEORGE GIBBS

"LOOK YOU, MY LORD, SHE IS ALIVE!"

"You see—the summons," said O'Neill to Elizabeth. "Friend, I come—good-by."

Eleventh Chapter

THE Admiral had fully matured his plans during the night, and was prepared to make the assault upon the fortifications of O'Neill's honor at the most convenient season. In order to have a clear field for his operations, he had dispatched his son upon an errand which would necessitate his absence until the evening. It had been with his full knowledge that his captive had been allowed to meet and converse with his ward. He trusted more to the fascinations of that young woman to effect his end than to any other agency.

Beauty and affection when allied have ever been most potent weapons, even when used to promote the cause of treachery and dishonor. Not that the Admiral himself would have done anything he considered dishonorable. He would rather have cut off his right hand, which had done such stout service for his King; he would sacrifice his life, his son's life, anything, rather than jeopard it; but he would not hesitate to cajole the young Irishman into betraying his leader if he could. Though he should despise him if he acceded to the terms he would propose, yet he would not refrain from making use of him, even to his own undoing, if possible. 'Twas the custom of war, and the obloquy which in similar instances has ever been heaped upon the tempted has not seemed to attach itself to the tempter.

Still the Admiral did not rejoice in the situation, and he could not make up his mind just how much it would be necessary to offer. He had rather an uncomfortable feeling that he could go very far and then not succeed after all; yet the greatness of the stake for which he played, he thought, would justify his action, for the person of John Paul Jones was certainly more coveted than that of any other man who had ever warred against the English flag. The Governor had under his immediate command two excellent frigates, the Serapis, 44, and the Scarborough, 28, and if through his planning and foresight they should capture Jones and his ships he might aspire to any honor in the gift of the King.

"Good-morning, my dear Marquis," he said pleasantly as soon as the young Lieutenant was ushered into the office.

"Good-morning to Your Lordship," answered O'Neill bravely.

"I have sent for you to give you the run of the castle today," continued the Admiral, much to his prisoner's surprise. "I shall be occupied with preparations rendered necessary by the advent of your friends, the Americans, and urgent business required that I dispatch your acquaintance, my son, on an errand which will keep him away until evening. Meanwhile, I leave you to the tender mercies of my ward, the Lady Elizabeth. In the evening I shall have something of great importance to say to you. You will give me your parole, of course, and I trust that you may have a pleasant day."

"In the presence of the Lady Elizabeth, sir, all moments are hours of pleasure. I can never sufficiently thank you for your indulgence. You have crowned the victim with a chaplet of roses before offering him upon the altar," answered the bewildered officer. He suspected something, but in the thought of another day with his heart's desire he resolutely put aside all other things—one day, in the strain of life, so much gained!

"Never mind about the altar now," said the Admiral. "Enjoy the day, and perhaps the termination of it may fit its beginning."

Such a day as the two young people passed together comes not often in earthly calendars. There was one subject which was forbidden them by honor and discretion. They therefore talked of other things, and thought only of that, and the restraint in which each was held made their true opinions as open to each other as the day itself. They wandered together about the castle walls, gazed out upon the sparkling sea, and allowed themselves to dream that the day would never end. They forgot the black future, and lived only in the fleeting moments of the present—as is the habit of youth and love.

When night fell they separated reluctantly, to meet again by her appointment in half an hour in the great hall—for what reason he knew not; that she wished was sufficient for him. There had come into Elizabeth's head a quaint conceit. She wished to surprise him. As she left him she ran hastily to the ancient wardrobe in her private apartment in which was laid away in sprigs of lavender her mother's wedding robe. Hastily pulling off her own garments, and assisted by the skillful fingers of her maid, she arrayed herself therein.

The body of the dress was of heavily brocaded white satin, worn over moderate hoops; the bodice was cut low and square across the neck and shoulders, and terminated in a pointed stomacher of delicate pale blue, laced over the front with silver cord. The short, rather full sleeves edged with priceless lace left the sweet young arms bare to the dimpled elbows. The overdress, looped with gold cord on either side, was of a fugitive shade of pale wild rose; the dress was lifted in front to show her dainty feet in their diamond-buckled, high-heeled, blue satin shoes and rose-colored, gold-clocked stockings. When she stood up a little train swept the floor.

The old-fashioned waist of the gown was very décolleté. She blushed at the thought of it, but as it was in the picture she draped it with delicate tulle and caught it here and there by tiny diamond stars. To re-dress her hair was an easy matter; the low coiffure, with the hair unpowdered and rolled above her broad, low brow à la Pompadour, she adorned with delicate white ostrich tips, and a string of pearls which she intertwined in its mazes. With eager hands rummaging among her mother's jewels, she soon found the brilliant necklace of the picture and twined it about her snowy throat; on her breast she pinned a great sunburst of diamonds, in the midst of which flashed a gleaming sapphire in jealous emulation of her eyes. A little black patch or two on her rosy dimpled cheeks completed her toilet.

Then, full of anticipation for her lover, she ran down to the hall. To her great disappointment the room was empty; he had not yet come. She waited a moment, and her eyes fell upon the frame from which the remnants of the tattered painting had been removed. It was on a dais leaning against the wall just beneath the spot where the picture had hung. A new idea occurred to her! Why not? She eagerly pushed the old chair behind the frame, arranged it as it had been in the picture, and sat down in exactly the same pose her mother had taken when the portrait had been painted. She had often practiced it before the mirror and had acquired the pose perfectly.

The rich old tapestry of Arras formed an appropriate background, and life and love and expectation threw a light into her eyes and painted upon her cheek hues that no skill, however cunning, could have duplicated. The girl had forgotten for the moment her engagement to another; she had forgotten the impending fate which hung over the man she truly loved. She was only a woman—loving—beloved—waiting. The thought of his surprise and the consciousness of her own beauty deepened the color on her blushing cheeks, and the palpitation of her bosom told of the beating of her heart.

She looked hastily about her, and, as the door opened, settled herself in the position of sweet repose of the picture. Never had earth borne a fairer woman. The first sound that struck her ear was the somewhat harsh voice of her guardian. A wave of disappointment swept across her. She half arose as if to discover herself, and then, as she heard the rich baritone of her lover's speech, she sank back and waited, motionless and expectant.

"Lieutenant Barry O'Neill, Marquis de Richemont, I bid you good evening," said the Admiral genially.

"Sir, good evening to you," replied the Lieutenant, something warning him of an impending struggle.

"Allow me," said the Admiral, passing his snuff-box, from which both gentlemen helped themselves elaborately.

"I have here," continued the old man, drawing a piece of paper from the desk as they walked toward the centre of the room, neither of them noticing the picture at the moment, as it was behind them, "some account of the life and adventures of one Gerald O'Neill, sometime gentleman of the County Clare, in Ireland, who rebelled against His Gracious Majesty, King George the Second, of blessed memory, in the year 1745. His lands were escheated to the Crown, his life was forfeited. Unfortunately for us, and fortunately for him, he escaped to the Continent, entered the service of Louis XV and became——"

"You may spare me any further details, My Lord. I know them too well. He became a Marshal of France, and my father."

"Two great honors, surely," said the Admiral, smiling pleasantly.

"I thank Your Lordship for the compliment. Pray proceed."

"I have here also a brief account of the history of another gentleman in whom I doubt not you are deeply interested."

"And that is——"

"One Barry O'Neill, Marquis de Richemont."

"Your very humble servant, sir."

"Your discrimination does you honor, Marquis," said the Admiral playfully.

"Faith, sir, you read me an easy riddle."

"I find that you have been concerned in every treasonable plot against His Majesty which has been hatched on the Continent since you were out of leading-strings."

"Rather hard, but true, sir. An Irishman, you know, is naturally a rebel and a conspirator."

"Quite so; and those who are not drowned may expect to be hanged," said the Admiral sternly.

"As I am a sailor I might reasonably have hoped for the former end, but I have forfeited my rights by coming on shore, I suppose." He paused, and as the Admiral nodded gravely, he continued with well-simulated indifference, "'Tis not a pleasant mode of death, My Lord, nor one that I would have chosen, nor one that is becoming to a gentleman, but I trust I shall meet it with equanimity, at least," replied O'Neill, a little paler than before, but still dauntlessly smiling.

"I am glad to see that you are a man of such resolution, sir," said the Admiral. "If your discretion equal your courage the matter may be arranged."

"It is useless to try it," was the reply. "To have known your ward, to have seen her, and to know that she is destined for the arms of another, makes life a hell, and death a pleasure."

"Listen!" said the Admiral slowly at last. He was sure he had him now.

"I could settle the course of the world while I wait for your reply, sir; delay no longer, I pray you; I am in a torture of apprehension," said O'Neill eagerly.

"I design not to take from you rank, nor station, nor lands, nor position," replied the Admiral. "I offer you a free pardon for all your past offenses; nay, it shall cover your father's as well, if you wish. There shall be a restoration of the ancient lands of your venerable house. I will put your feet upon a ladder by which you may rise to the very highest position. I open before you vistas of honorable advancement in the service of your rightful King in your native land, in which there is no limit to which a man of courage may not attain."

"These are nothing," said the young man impetuously, "beside Lady Elizabeth Howard; some of the things you mention I now have; some I do not wish; some are nothing to me. But your ward, sir; what of her?"

"Oh! what a lover is there!" whispered the girl in the picture frame to herself, forgetting the pose, clasping her white hands and leaning forward with shining eyes, blushing cheeks and parted lips. This in her breast now was love indeed, in no way like to the pale affection with which she regarded the unfortunate Coventry. The Admiral spoke again, fixing his eye upon the young man. His words came slowly.

"Well, sir, I will even agree to interpose no objections to your suit for the hand of my ward."

"But that is tantamount to giving your consent, My Lord!" said O'Neill, coming nearer to him in great surprise, his heart bounding—and yet there must be conditions to the royal gift. The Admiral bowed.

"And Major Coventry?" cried the Irishman.

"His desires must give way to—er—reasons of State," said the Admiral decisively. "I will arrange all that; if you can obtain her consent to your suit, she is yours, provided——" He paused significantly.

Ah, the conditions!

"My consent!" thought Elizabeth, happiness flooding her like a wave, and then she remembered that she was a woman, and indignation found a lodgment in her being. 'Twas not thus she would be wooed and won—not in this bartering way disposed of. By what right did any one—even her guardian—presume to—— O'Neill was speaking again.

"What are the conditions—what is it you wish me to do? If it be in human power, 'tis done. Torment me no more; as you are a man and have a heart, speak!" In his agitation the younger man seized the older by the arm.

"I desire you to go back to your ship and arrange to put in my possession the person of John Paul Jones," said the Admiral with the greatest deliberation, concealing his anxiety by an appearance of great firmness as he nonchalantly helped himself to a pinch of snuff. An accurate observer would have noticed that the trembling of his hands belied his simulated calmness.

It was out now. What would the man say or do? Elizabeth sank back appalled. So this was the condition, this was the test. He was to chose between her and black treachery—dishonor! His answer—what would it be? Had her idol feet of clay, after all? Her fate hung in the balance; she could never survive his shame if he fell; if not—ah!

O'Neill released the Admiral at once, stared at him a long moment in horrified silence—shrank away from him, and sank down in a chair and buried his face in his hands for a little space; his two auditors waited, hope for different results trembling in either heart. Presently he looked up and arose to his feet.

"Treachery—dishonor—shame! And with her innocence and youth and beauty you bait your trap!" ejaculated O'Neill brokenly. The Admiral still played with his snuff-box, his eyes averted, his hands trembling.

"Oh, my God, my God!" continued the sailor, stricken to the very heart; "to raise my hopes to such a pitch—to put the cup of happiness to my very lips—to open the gates of Heaven in my very presence—and couple your proposition with this—this infamy! I am a lover, sir; you know it well, but you should not have forgotten that I am before everything else a gentleman. How could you do it? It ill becomes your years," he went on impetuously in mounting indignation. "I am your prisoner—your captive, but I knew not that misfortune gave you a right to insult me thus. My Lord, My Lord, the ladder upon which you put my feet leads down, not up. Hell, not Heaven, is its end!"

"Think!" said the Admiral doggedly, feeling the game lost but, like a desperate gamester, playing on. "The Lady Elizabeth is at the end, where'er it be."

"I love her; God only knows how much I love her; from the moment I saw her I had no thought but for her. I could not look her in the face and be guilty of this thing." The girl in the picture almost screamed aloud for joy in this triumph of her lover's honor.

"She shall never know," replied the Admiral; "I will pledge my word of honor."

"The honor of the tempter for the dishonor of the tempted!" O'Neill laughed bitterly.

"It has not in forty years of service been called in question," replied the old man, stifling his growing shame.

"Nor has mine," said O'Neill, "until this hour. You are her guardian—an old man—your gray hairs should protect you, but 'tis well for you that I have no sword, for I swear I would plunge it first into your heart and then into my own."

"Think what it is I offer," persisted the other; "compare it to what you now have in the way of worldly honor. What do you care for that bit of striped bunting and these beggarly rebels who have presumed to declare a Republic? What is a Republic, anyway, and what function has it in a gentleman's life, pray? What have we to do with the common people? What are their aspirations to you? What affiliations have you for that low-born

More delicious than tea or coffee. Used with or without milk and sugar. Invigorates body, brain and nerves. You will prefer it to all other breakfast, dinner or supper beverages. The national drink of South America.

The official analysis by the world-famous Philadelphia Commercial Museum says: "Yerba Maté Tea is a most valuable beverage. Especially beneficial for the stomach and nerves. It has great sustaining power, but does not irritate. Its effect is soothing and quieting, with no deleterious consequences. The almost total absence of essential oil in the results obtained from the analysis speaks volumes in this connection. Then we see, also, of the tannic and gallotannic acid. This is a most serviceable astringent, when present in moderate quantities, as in Yerba Maté Tea, combined with a small percentage also of caffein alkaloid, which builds up the nerves and performs other good offices. It contains traces of manganese, which enriches the blood."

THE ANGLE LAMP

After You Have Used every make of odd-fashioned lamps and taxed your income by using gas or electricity, an investigation of this lamp will show you your mistake. While more brilliant than gas or electricity, it has absolutely none of the unbearable defects of the ordinary lamp. It never smokes, smells or gets out of order; is lighted and extinguished as easily as gas; requires almost no care, and costs but eighteen cents a month to burn. In contrast to sunless gas and gasoline, it is absolutely non-explosive and CLEAN, and its unique feature "No Under-Shadow" insures all the light falling directly downward.

Thousands of people throughout the country are using these lamps in their homes, stores, offices, churches, halls, factories, etc., and we have never failed to make good all our claims. Hundreds have written, saying our claims are too modest. If you wish to free yourself forever from the trouble and expense of your present illuminants, send for Catalogue K, showing all styles from $5.50 up.

WALTER F. WARE, 512 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

gardener, turned pirate and buccaneer to ravage our coasts, dishonor our flag? This is the Kingdom in which you were born. Here your rightful allegiance is due. I offer you, for the giving up of a—a sentiment which possesses you, the favor of your King and the hand of the woman you love—every earthly thing to make you happy. You are an exile, a wanderer, a soldier of fortune. I give you a country again."

"And do you, a man of honor, advise me to——?"

"Damnation, sir! I advise nothing! I offer. The decision rests with you."

"Ah! I thought so. And what would you do in my place, sir?"

"I'm not there, thank God," said the old man fervently; "and I repeat, you must decide yourself."

"Very good, sir. It is true that I like not that Republic—its principles are nothing to me—but I have found that gardener's son a man, aye, a gentleman! You have called me a landless man, an exile, a soldier of fortune—that, too, is true. But to Captain Jones and his service I have pledged my honor—'tis all I have; the Stars and Stripes have become my flag; I wear the uniform, I eat the bread, of the United States. You may break my heart, destroy my life; you cannot break my word! There is not power and place enough in the Three Kingdoms—no, not even on their throne, not beauty enough even in Elizabeth Howard to tempt me—to compel me to do that. Say no more. You have my answer."

Twelfth Chapter

"LOOK, you fool!" said the Admiral, furious with rage at being balked in this way, though in spite of himself his heart exulted in the nobility of the man. "Look, you beggarly Irishman!" he exclaimed, turning the surprised young man about before he could recover himself; "look on the picture of her whom you reject. Gaze upon it! If you love her, say whether or not your high-flown sentiments of honor can stand against that prospect."

There in the great frame stood the most beautiful picture that the eyes of either man had ever seen. Elizabeth was standing. One hand clutched tightly her heaving bosom—the other arm was stretched out with upraised palm like a goddess in command. The light of the flickering candles cast subtle shadows upon her face. The dusk of the room intensified the illusion and spiritualized her beauty. O'Neill looked at her with all his life in his gaze—so glorious—so splendid—so perfect a creature would shake the very soul of honor itself.

The Admiral had played his last card; this was the end of his resource, and he watched the Irishman with all the intensity of a tiger about to spring on its prey. The moments fled. He knew that he had lost. Elizabeth had arisen in the stress of her anxiety; the strain had been too much for her; she had been about to intervene between them, when the glances of the two men arrested her step. She waited, one little foot outstretched, her body leaning forward slightly, a picture of triumph, her eyes as two lambent flames playing upon her lover. He watched her in awestruck silence—sank on his knees—stretched out his arms, murmuring softly:

"Thou knowest that I love thee. I have dreamed sometimes that in happier days thou mightest have given me thy heart, but I could not take it with a bar of shame between us. No——" Was she moving! Was that some trick of the wavering light!

"Good Heavens!" cried O'Neill fearfully. "See!—is it a spirit? She shakes her head. Look you, My Lord, she is alive; the picture fell last night, you remember—'tis herself! Elizabeth, Elizabeth, you have heard and seen; have I not decided well?"

"How dare you, My Lord?" exclaimed the girl, coming down from the dais and stepping swiftly toward the astonished Admiral, who shrank back from her. "How dare you make my hand the reward of treachery—my person the bait for dishonor? And by what right do you dispose of me without consulting me? Am I a slave, that you force me upon this gentleman? My word is given to your son. You, yourself, insisted upon it. You would play the traitor doubly, and would fain make him do the same. And for what? To compass the death of one poor man to whom I owe life and honor, who is only fighting for what he calls his freedom. Shame upon your gray hairs, sir! Oh, the insult to my modesty—to be thus bandied about between two men. And you, sir," she cried in tempestuous fashion, turning to O'Neill, "you do me the honor to refuse me—to reject me—me—me—Elizabeth Howard! Look at me—you would have none of me——"

"My honor——" cried O'Neill, amazed.

"Your honor! Have I any honor, sir? Would you have left me a shadow of it between you? Stand back, sir! My Lord, is it thus you discharge the trust committed to you by my mother? To give this gentleman opportunity to return to France and say that he refused my hand?"

"He shall not go back to France, Lady Elizabeth," said the Admiral sternly.

"Why not, pray?" asked Elizabeth, faltering, her anger checked by the Admiral's look.

"Because he shall be tried and hanged to-morrow as an American spy, or a captured traitor, whichever he may elect."

The American Soldier in the Philippines

the launch that took us ashore sometimes seem to us to stand on end. The rain fell literally in sheets. I had a fancy to see our soldiers on the firing line, and then our soldiers beyond at the outposts, and then those far advanced ones, "the Cossack outposts," who are so close to the enemy that a bullet at any time may take them. I wanted to see how they fared in weather like that; how they took it; whether their spirits were dampened by the Niagara of water which poured from the clouds until the rivers swelled and the roads were submerged, save where they were raised and paved.

The officers of the First Tennessee volunteered to go with me, so did the physician of the post, Doctor Gilchrist, of Cleveland, Ohio. For five hours we rode from post to post, from company to company, and the men who made up that little squad of horsemen were Colonel Gracie Childers, son and ward of a Confederate soldier; Lieutenant-Colonel Bayless, son of a Confederate soldier; Major Cheatam, son of the Confederate General Cheatam, all of the First Tennessee; Doctor Gilchrist, of Ohio, the son of a Union soldier, and myself, the son and brother of Union soldiers. Was it not significant? And most of the men we saw that day were the sons of Confederate soldiers, but now, and forever more, sons of one flag and one country, to build whose empire over the Pacific they were laying down their lives side by side with the brave sons of Union soldiers from Kansas, Iowa, Nebraska, Dakota, Montana, Pennsylvania, Oregon, Washington, California, Colorado, and the whole Union section of our country. One cannot help loving the South when one knows those superb fellows, and they, too, on their part, love the North, or let us say the larger truth which comprehends this lesser statement—all love this entire country and every section of it.

MEN WHO CHARGE WITH A SMILE

THE mention of Kansas reminds me of a remark that General MacArthur made to me, when we passed a group of Kansas men one day at San Fernando. I asked him if they had not been peculiarly daring. "Yes," he said, "those fellows will put a tooth-brush through their hat-band and charge with a smile straight to hell, if it is necessary; but," added General MacArthur, "they are just the type of what all the rest of the soldiers out here are."

That phrase, "charging with a smile," is not a fanciful one, but the statement of a truth. I saw General Lawton order the Twelfth Regulars to charge at Taytay. The defenses of this stronghold were known to be excellent, and it was also supposed that about three thousand of the best soldiers in the Filipino Army were behind the intrenchments. Desultory firing had been going on. A little time before two men had been killed—shot through the head, on the very spot where General Lawton stood when he ordered the charge. It was across an open space, perhaps a third of a mile, and on level ground, interrupted only by little rice ridges. The men "charged with a smile."

The same phenomenon has been noticed time and again. Some say it is a kind of a grin. I think not. It looked to me more like a smile of real pleasure. Fortunately, in this instance, the Filipinos had, a few minutes before, evacuated, and no casualties resulted at that time.

Editor's Note—Senator Beveridge's second article, which will appear in an early number, will be, "With Our Fighters in the Philippines."

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

WASHINGTON, March, 1900.

OF COURSE a woman who talks of herself, her impressions and experiences all the time, as I am doing, lays herself open to the charge of being garrulous and vain in conversation, and scrappy and inconsequential on paper—at least so Robert tells me—but who could help being so, when distracted, as I have been, by so many conflicting interests? I have been trying to accomplish the impossible feat of being almost every hour of the day in two places at one and the same time. On the one hand is my ambition expressed in smart breakfasts, musicales, teas, private recitals and other festive things which crowd one upon the other during the daylight hours. On the other hand are all the sights and sounds in Congress which are making history, and which almost compel me to abandon everything else in order to lose nothing of the passing show at the Capitol; and I can only say, in my despair of doing justice both to politics and society,

"How happy could I be with either,
Were t'other dear charmer away!"

The best that I can do is to drive every day to the Capitol and remain a few minutes in the private galleries. Of course the principal excitement is to be found in the Senate. I tell Robert that they are altogether too tame over in the House since they disposed of Mr. Roberts. To be sure, the splutter of Democratic members over the handspring of Mr. Sibley from their ranks into the Republican camp, and the witty, ridiculing speech of Mr. Grosvenor anent the pro-Boer orators, which was meant to put a quietus upon certain members who have been scrambling over to the Boer side of the fence in the hope of catching German votes, were extremely funny and instructive, but they cannot compare with the spicy sayings and doings in the Senate.

I asked Senator P—— the other day if he would not offer a resolution authorizing the posting on the Senate chamber walls of this warning to Senators: "They that govern most make least noise. In rowing a barge, they that do drudgery work slash and puff; but he that governs sits quietly at the stern and scarce is seen to stir." Senator P—— says that he should much prefer to keep this and work it off himself, when he wants to get in a dig, some time, on another Senator.

Senator P—— says that two requisites are absolutely necessary to success in the Senate; one is a good, comfortable, thick epidermis, and the other is a voice that is warranted to rival a megaphone. With these two requisites there is no knowing to what heights an ambitious politician may not climb. I took great comfort in this statement, remembering Robert's own big voice, which it seems to me is a fair match for any that I have ever heard, excepting, perhaps, that of Senator Thurston, of Nebraska, which is far and away the greatest thing of its kind on record. I am told that Senator Thurston's voice was one of the sensations of the Chicago convention, and that every other statesman who had hoped to rival him simply held his peace in sheer despair. Robert says that Senator Thurston is aspiring to preside over the coming convention in Philadelphia, and, if voice alone should decide it, the honor ought easily to go to him; but Mr. Hanna will have to be reckoned with when it comes to the convention. Who knows but that Mr. Hanna may want the honor himself? Nobody can tell.

"The rain it raineth and the old goose wisketh,
But wotteth not the little gosline
What the old goose thinketh."

It is a pity that the respective clerks of both House and Senate, being possessed of good voices, should read so droningly and exasperatingly. They almost put one to sleep, though the other day, when the Clerk of the Senate was reading the Urgent Deficiency Bill, he managed to keep at least one Senator awake and strike a little fun from him. Actually this was Mr. Hoar, who was able to take his mind off expansion iniquities long enough to raise a laugh from the Senate. The clerk read, under the section providing an appropriation for a certain hospital:

"For pay of surgeons, matrons, druggists, nurses, cooks, ward-masters, hospital carriage drivers, hearse-drivers, grave-diggers and funeral services and——"

"I should like to know," interrupted Mr. Hoar, "of the Senator who has this bill in charge whether hearse-drivers, grave-diggers and funeral services are necessary for the care of the sick? That is the way the bill reads." The reply was:

"These all come under the heading of the hospital department." To which Mr. Hoar replied dryly:

"I should hardly like to enact by law that grave-diggers are necessary for the care of the sick. If, however, the committee prefers it so, I will not interpose objection."

The laugh subsided and the bill droned on to its end. I noticed that Senators began to slip away that afternoon in a rather mysterious way, until the Senate chamber was deserted by everybody of importance save Senator Teller. I was curious to know where the others had all gone and why Senator Teller had not gone with them. When I got home I asked Robert to explain the mystery. Robert laughed and said it was because every other Senator had a caucus to attend, but Mr. Teller holds the strange position of a man without a caucus. He is neither Republican, Democrat nor Populist. I asked Robert how he voted. Robert said that his vote was "here, there and everywhere," and nobody could ever predict it.

But if I was curious about Mr. Teller, I was equally so about another man whom I saw on the Senate floor the other day, who was being greeted and hand-shaken to a great degree. No one about me knew who he was, so I sent my card to Senator P—— with a line scribbled on it: "Can you give me a moment?" When the card was carried in to him I leaned over the railing. Senator P—— read it, smiled and scribbled something, but he did not look up at the gallery where I sat. The card when it came back to me read, "My whole afternoon is yours with pleasure." In a moment or so I saw him leave the floor, and I saw also that two or three Senators looked after him and then up at the gallery and smiled. I drew back from the railing and pulled down my veil. I don't know why I should have been nettled, but I was. When Senator P—— sat down beside me, I asked him if he would tell me who the stranger on the floor was, who was being made so much of.

"Why, that's no stranger; that's only Joe Blackburn, who has just been reelected to the Senate from Kentucky."

"Is that Joe Blackburn!" exclaimed I.

"Yes, he came first to the House, as you know. He was in the Forty-fourth Congress—the Congress that accused Belknap; that investigated Blaine; that created the Electoral Commission; the Congress that had brains enough for forty such Congresses as this one. Joe made a sensational speech against the employing of the United States Army as a police force at the polls, in which he used his famous alliteration: 'He who dallies is a dastard, and he who doubts is damned.' Afterward he came to the Senate, but he was more in his element in a tumultuous body like the House."

I did not reply, and Senator P—— continued: "I remember so well once when Joe Blackburn and I were on the same committee. It was during a Democratic Administration, and there had been a good deal of bother trying to get the Secretary of Agriculture to agree to a certain thing, and Blackburn had been sent to talk him over to the committee's plan. In fact, the whole Cabinet had been difficult to deal with. When Joe came back several of us were assembled in the committee-room, among us Senator Vest, who was sunk dejectedly in the depths of an armchair. Some one asked:

"'Well, Joe, did you succeed?'

"'Succeed?' he echoed. Then he began to tramp up and down, fuming and fussing. Finally he broke out:

"'Of all the obstinate things in the shape of a Cabinet officer I ever encountered, commend me to J. Sterling Morton! Don't you agree with me, Vest?'

"Vest roused up slowly and answered:

"'I'm sorry, Joe, but I am committed to Hoke Smith.'

"It was the funniest thing I ever heard," continued Senator P——," and I never see either Vest or Blackburn but I recall that committee-room; and our bill was never even reported," he concluded.

When he was putting me into my carriage a few minutes later, he said abruptly:

"So, Mrs. Slocum, you are beginning to be disillusioned already with statesmanship and with politicians, and I'll warrant that you have already found out society?"

I denied this stoutly, of course.

Afterward I wondered if it were true. I thought of the pleasures I had been pursuing, and then I thought of what that clever old cynic, Balzac, in his measureless wisdom says of it all, that, "In diving to the bottom of pleasures we bring up more gravel than pearls"; and I tried to think if I had brought up any pearls, and I could only think of one or two; but as to the gravel—there had been quite enough of it to make a respectable gravel drive in front of our home out in Spruce City. Page says that if I am going to quote Balzac and talk about bringing up gravel, people will think I am meaning to liken Washington society to the bottomless pit, and when I explained that I was only thinking of the snobs I have encountered lately, she said, in her pretty way, with a warning gesture:

"Watch out, Mrs. Slocum, about that word snob. We can mention it to each other, but don' you let any one else hear you talkin' about encounterin' snobs, for people always in such cases spell snob with a 'u.'"

Seriously, I should like to know whether there is any physiological explanation of the fact that the heads of so many individuals here at the Capital grow disproportionately to the rest of their anatomy. This curious condition, which one of my Boston friends calls "cerebral tumescence," finds expression in many ways in both men and women. The other day I was of the receiving party in a smart house that was strictly non-official, and I had three examples of this in quick succession. The first was a frank, naïve expression of importance, as unconscious as it was hearty. It came in the shape of a breezy, bustling man who rushed into the reception-room and, after a quick glance around, announced himself to the entire roomful of people thus: "I am the Assistant Secretary of War." The hostess smiled vaguely and greeted him, mumbling something that did duty for a name and then passed him over to me. I had wit enough to call him simply "Mr. Secretary," and I in turn passed him on to Page, with a whisper to her to find out his name. She carried him off with a wicked smile, and the hostess said to me in an aside: "Good Heavens! I did not know the man from Adam. How should I? There are always two or three Assistant Secretaries in every department, and I don't know the names of any of them. I don't even know how many War Secretaries there are. Why didn't he give his name, or have himself announced?"

SENATOR THURSTON'S VOICE WAS ONE OF THE SENSATIONS OF THE CHICAGO CONVENTION

A few minutes later there was another expression of this same thing which was more arrogant than amusing. A haughty aspirant for social leadership came into the room and, while twirling her lorgnette around on a jeweled chain, informed me "that she made no visits upon any one; she entertained instead." I had scarcely recovered from the haughty grande dame when a foolish young woman, who is making a desperate struggle to get into the smart set, came up to me and confided to me "that she made it a rule to weed out her visiting list every year; one could not be too careful."

It seemed to me that, with this, my cup was full, but, upon going home to dress for a dinner at Senator E——'s, I was destined yet again to be treated to this same thing, though from an humble source. This time it came from my own black laundress, whose shining face and glistening teeth greeted me with all the freedom and sociability of her race.

"La, Miss Agatha, honey, you'se mighty like my ole Miss down on East'en Sho'. I knows quality folks when I see 'em. All my folks was quality, an' ca'iage quality, too. I don' work for no pore white trash, I don'."

Here was the same thing in a different key, and Mr. Kipling's lines sprang to my lips:

"For the Colonel's Lady an' Judy O'Grady
Are sisters under their skins!"

I hope that I am not fated to find my doll stuffed with sawdust at this early stage! I am sorry if I am going to acquire the eyes of an Argus instead of the blindness of the bat.

Page says that it is being whispered about that the recent ruling which has removed from the receiving line at the White House the daughters of Cabinet officers who were wont to take their mothers' places, was entirely due to the grumbling and criticism among diplomats who did not relish the custom which allowed chits of girls to precede their own august wives. All this bickering and jealousy concerning precedence is just about worthy of some little Principality or Duchy over on the other side, and the whole thing is to my mind a clear case of "the jealous man poisoning his own banquet and then eating of it."

I feel, however, that I am receiving an education at the expense of my country, in which one large item of instruction was received the other night on the occasion of a great ball given at one of the fashionable hotels for the benefit of a swell charity. This ball was in charge of the smartest women in society, and I felt a natural pleasure in being asked to be one of the patronesses, and in my acceptance I inclosed a handsome check as a donation, Page having instructed me that this was the thing expected of me. I made Robert go, and I also persuaded Senator P—— to accompany us, although both men were as much out of their element as the traditional fish out of water. Robert and Page both drifted away from me, Robert to talk politics and Page to dance. Senator P—— was left to my tender mercies and we commenced a tour of the rooms, in the progress of which we overheard a conversation and I met with the usual fate of the eavesdropper. One of the managers said:

"These rich newcomers donated, but they did not give anything like the sum expected when we asked them to be patronesses.

Senator P—— and I moved away in silence. We had gone but a few paces when we encountered Page and her partner. Page exclaimed:

"Why, you two look like you'd been listenin' to a sermon instead of to this lovely dance music."

"We have," I replied, "a most edifying sermon from the Book of Revelation."

And Page could not understand why Senator P—— thought my remark so funny, neither could Robert, who joined us at this point. I knew that an explanation would nettle Robert, so I made none. What was the use? It was all a part of the human comedy.

An Unpublished Poem

By Bayard Taylor

THE verses given below were written by Bayard Taylor for my father to sing at a Fourth of July celebration at Unionville Academy in the year 1839 or 1840. The Academy was about four miles from Bayard Taylor's birthplace in the neighborhood of Kennett Square, Pennsylvania, and its master at that time was a Quaker, Jonathan Gause. The poet, who was between fourteen and fifteen years old when he wrote these verses, had a fondness for my father, an older boy, and they were companions during the two years that Bayard Taylor spent at Unionville Academy, and for several succeeding years. Both left the familiar neighborhood, and their lives drifted far apart. The poem was preserved among certain letters from the Taylor family, and other reminders of Kennett Square, in an old cherry-wood desk.

SONG

(Air: A Wet Sheet and a Flowing Sail.)

'Twas on New England's rocky strand
Where the billows wildly foam,
Our fathers, seeking far this land,
Had made their lasting home.
In peace and quietness they dwelt,
Bore meek affliction's rod,
As in their humble prayer they knelt
Before the throne of God.

CHORUS:

Then honor our fathers' name,
Strike up a glorious lay,
Sound high to them a song of fame,
'Tis Freedom's natal day.

Come from your lofty halls of pride,
From the lowly cottage hearth;
Honor the brave who fought and died,
'Tis the day of Freedom's birth.
Breathe in the startled ear of morn,
Ere the lark her matins sings,
And far be your stirring echoes borne
Where the sombre wildwood rings.—CHO.

They fought, they fell on Bunker's height,
In Yorktown's closing line,
In Monmouth's dark and gory fight,
By silver Brandywine.
They fell; but with their blood they bought
The land they loved so well,
And foemen fled, when freemen fought,
As if by magic spell.—CHO.

BAYARD TAYLOR.

The song was sung as a solo and chorus, without accompaniment. The celebration was held in the open air; many of the people of the Kennett Square region were present, and I believe they joined in the chorus.

When Wives Were Bought*

IF THE despairing realist or veritist doubts for one moment the supreme triumph of romance in these agitated days, let him read Miss Johnston's To Have and To Hold, and realize with a gasp that it would be impossible to carry the romantic spirit any deeper into fiction. If the watchword of the realist be Balzac's memorable motto, "Put nothing into novels which may not happen, and which has not happened in life," the principle upon which Miss Johnston wisely goes is to confine herself exclusively to incidents the like of which were never known in the universe. With the brilliant imagination and the splendid courage of youth, she has stormed the very citadel of adventure, and a grateful public has breathlessly followed her story in its serial form, and has waited with eager and ill-concealed impatience until the completed book should be given into its hands.

No better plot could have been devised for a Colonial romance. The flight of the King's ward, Jocelyn Leigh, to escape the husband thrust upon her by James the First; her coming to Virginia with the shipload of maids brought over by Edwyn Sandys as wives for the planters; her marriage to Ralph Percy, who buys his bride for one hundred and twenty pounds of tobacco; the swift pursuit of her courtly suitor, Lord Carnal, and the deadly strife between husband and lover, afford wide scope for Miss Johnston's extraordinary power of story-telling. The warmth and glow of her descriptions, her broad knowledge of time and place, and her faculty for sustained narrative seem well-nigh marvelous in a young and almost untried writer. To Have and To Hold amply fulfills the promise given by her earlier novel, Prisoners of Hope.

On the other hand, it must be admitted that the very exuberance of the author's imagination beguiles her into overdoing her work. Adventure is good, and so is valor, and so is beauty; but it is possible to have too much of all these good things in a novel. The hero of romance is of necessity a conquering hero, else we would have none of him; but, after days of shipwreck and suffering, we do not require him to fight three desperate duels in succession, and win them all. Neither is he expected to kill more than a dozen or so Indians at a time. And when he turns pirate, and sails the main, and holds his ruffian crew in awe—this gentleman planter of Virginia—we feel that we are carried back, not so much to youth, as to childhood.

"It's all very well to be good, I agree,
To be gentle, and patient, and that sort of thing;
But there's something that suits my mind to a T,
In the thought of a regular Pirate King."

Even the desperate villainy of Lord Carnal and his dark, sinister beauty seem a trifle overdrawn. Villains always are, and always should be, dark and sinister, but this one's superb and sinful splendor palls a trifle from being too much dwelt upon. And the Italian poisoner, the "Black Death," with his subtle and murderous drugs, is an incongruous figure in the Virginia Colony, or even in good King Jamie's Court. Miss Johnston might have kept Mr. Nicolo—who is excellent of his kind—for another book. There is no need for her to be so lavish, for we hope and trust and pray she may write many more such novels to delight our hearts.

Lindsay Swift's Brook Farm†

MR. LINDSAY SWIFT has written an excellent and entertaining history of Brook Farm, that curious sociological experiment which enlisted the sympathy and support of the most intelligent men of its day. No better theme could have been chosen for one of the National Studies in American Letters, and no handling of this theme could be more satisfactory than Mr. Swift's. With frank sympathy, with friendly humor, with sane discrimination, he tells his story, from the establishment of the Transcendental Club—that soulful coterie of enthusiasts who listened to Alcott expounding Plato, and said they liked it—down to the closing days of a community which could no longer subsist on high thinking and low diet—diet so low it was threatening to degenerate rapidly into no diet at all.

"It was an era of cold water and unbolted flour," says Mr. Swift; and among the strict vegetarians the question was "not so much what to eat as what not to eat," even coffee savoring of undue indulgence. Strange experiments were tried with the live stock as well as with the inmates of the Farm; an attempt being made, for example, to rear a young calf on "hay tea" in place of maternal nourishment, which radical measure cost the calf its life before it could be converted into veal.

The theories of medicine most in vogue were quite as unusual and as inexorable as the many other theories cherished by these ardent experimentalists. The "cold water cure" was administered with a vehemence which makes us shudder when we read of it, and the "starving cure" was not without its followers, though, as Mr. Swift sensibly observes, "the simple menu of the community removed any pressing need for the general application of this treatment."

It is little wonder that—drawing its recruits mainly from the ranks of New England thinkers and scholars—the Farm should have been occasionally short of field-hands, though "there was never any lack of heads in the Department of Instruction." Hawthorne, it is true, devoted himself with splendid, though short-lived, enthusiasm to agricultural pursuits, signing his home letters "Nathaniel Hawthorne, Ploughman," attacking his work with such zeal that he broke the machine for chopping hay "through very excess of effort," exulting when he was permitted to milk a cow, and fairly bursting with pride when deemed farmer enough to buy some piglings in the market. That the experience was worth something to him is proved by The Blithedale Romance; but it is hardly surprising that his sisters, arguing in the ruthless, practical, unimaginative fashion of women, should have thought their genius of a brother was wasting his powers in these bucolic pastimes.

The opening chapters of Mr. Swift's little volume are perhaps the most entertaining, inasmuch as Brook Farm itself carries a keener interest than do the subsequent lives of many of its inmates and visitors. Yet it is when we think of Hawthorne, and Emerson, and Charles A. Dana, and George William Curtis, and William Henry Channing, and Father Hecker, and that intellectual firebrand, Orestes Brownson, and that exceedingly erudite and unpleasant woman, Margaret Fuller, all of whom were deeply interested in the scheme, that we recognize the value of this episode in the history of American Sociology. —Agnes Repplier.

GLIMPSES OF NEW BOOKS

Camp Arcady is the small record of the small doings of four of Miss Floy Campbell's girls who kept house in the top story of a New York flat, where there was plenty of room for the north-light window. Under the constitution of the Camp they organized on a very care-free plan, with all available funds to be held for common draft in the little round vase at the end of the mantelpiece. Miss Campbell introduces "some others" who aid largely in shaping the destinies of her four young dreamers and their ideal Republic—it was hardly to be expected that Arcady could live long with the cable cars only around the corner. *Richard G. Mrs. Diaz's Butter Money

MRS. ABBY MORTON DIAZ first came into prominence through her fierce patriotism during the dark years of the Civil War. She was a member of several organizations which were formed by the young women of New England to help the Government and to raise money for the sick and wounded soldiers. She knit stockings and made bandages. This, however, did not satisfy her desires. With a few friends she went without butter for several months and gave what she called "butter money" to the cause. It was some time later that her first story appeared in a monthly magazine under an assumed name. For it she received a check for forty dollars.

Professor Roberts and His Burglar

SEVERAL years ago, when Professor Charles G. D. Roberts was living in Canada, he was wakened one night by hearing a burglar at his window. It was bitter cold, and the snow was two feet deep on the ground. The burglar was warmly clad and the Professor wore only his nightgown. Nothing daunted, however, he sprang to the window. The housebreaker started back in alarm and made for the back fence. With a spring the Professor leaped through the window, carrying the sash with him.

"Stop!" he shouted.

The burglar sped on. In an instant the Professor was at his side. He caught him by the coat collar, snatched a club from his hand, threw it on the snow, and then with his bare feet kicked him to the fence, over which he threw him as if he had been a log.

When the Professor returned to the house he found that he was badly cut by the window glass, and that his feet had been frostbitten. It was several weeks before he was able to leave his house, but he never was troubled by burglars again.

Mr. Boothby's Daring Plunge

GUY BOOTHBY, the author of Doctor Nikola's Experiment, won his first laurels as a traveler and explorer. When living in Australia he became interested in the strange and inhospitable area known as the Northern Territory. So slight was the information about the district that he determined to visit it himself. Against the protests of his friends, who predicted his death, he set out with a companion and crossed the continent from Van Diemen's Gulf to the Great Australian Bight. He endured many sufferings and privations, but secured much valuable knowledge which enabled him to assist in the exposure of the extraordinary Louis de Rougemont.

Major Hume and the Frenchman

A MODEST volume has been recently added to the series, The Story of the Nations, by Martin Hume, and few of his readers know that he is the famous Major Hume, of the Third Battalion of the Essex (English) Regiment. His book is The History of Modern Spain. The Major was educated in Madrid, is a Knight of the Spanish Order of Isabel, and was once intrusted by Spain to edit some important State papers. He is a man of many parts, and, besides being a British soldier, has been attached to both the Spanish and Turkish armies. He was present, as an attaché, in the Turkish Army during the battle of Lom. The Major's bluntness is a matter of comment at the Devonshire Club, in London, of which he is a prominent member. He was interrupted in an earnest conversation with a Member of Parliament upon a vital question by a visiting Frenchman, who alluded unpleasantly to Parliament, the English people, and also Americans.

"You Frenchmen always look at things superficially," retorted the Major hotly.

"Yes, Major," replied the Frenchman candidly, "you are right. Frenchmen represent politeness, suavity and courteousness, and they seldom tell the truth, for the truth is almost always unpleasant. I am frank enough to confess that this is the first time that I have ever told the truth."

"I accept your explanation," said the Major blandly; "I can quite believe you."

The Origin of Miss French's Pen-Name

MISS ALICE FRENCH, Octave Thanet, whose new book of short stories shows her interest in the industrial world of the West and the Southwest, spoke to a friend not long ago upon the origin of her pen-name.

"My writing and my pen-name are purely matters of chance. I had my first stories in my mind for years before I put them on paper, and I only disposed of them then because I thought they might aid the people whose cause I was interested in. 'Octave,' the first part of my pen-name, was the Christian name of a schoolmate who was a great inspiration to me in my writing, and 'Thanet' was the name of a freight car which the children of my neighborhood loved to play in and about."

Miss French was born in Andover, Massachusetts, and was graduated from the Abbot Academy. Her first work, A Communist's Wife, was refused by the same New York publishers who rejected Mr. Kipling's manuscript, and was accepted by one of the oldest publishing firms in Philadelphia. Since then she has always found a ready market for her books. Miss French is fond of housework and cooking, and declares that she is a much better cook than a writer. She belongs politically to that branch of the Republican party in the West which endeavors to ameliorate the condition of the workers, and a substantial part of her income is spent in doing good.

At a labor meeting not long ago she was enthusiastically received as a benefactor, and after she had finished a little speech of advice and admonition she was roundly cheered. "Miss French forever," "Miss French forever," cried the audience.

At this the presiding officer, a man, arose and replied, "I know you mean well, but there may be some men who hope that the lady will not be Miss French forever."

One Generation of Revolutions

M. FRANÇOIS COPPÉE, of Paris, who has several new books upon the market in this country, is a very industrious worker. Until his plays and books were successful he held a small Government position, but when his name and fame were made he gave his time entirely to literary effort. In commenting upon the varying political changes in France, he said to a friend:

"You think the present upheavals odd, do you? Why, this is nothing to what France has done. Take the span of my own life. My father took me, when I was five years old, to the Tuileries to see Louis Philippe, and I remember, as if it were but yesterday, how the people welcomed him with shouts. One year later I was taken to the same place to see him run from the mob who wanted his life. A year later yet I was one of a party of boys chosen to take part in the ceremonies of the planting of the Tree of Liberty near our house—so you see I don't marvel at the present phases of emotionalism. Our people can't live without change."

Hamlin Garland's Favorite Lines

IT IS not always easy to speculate upon an author's favorite piece of work. Hamlin Garland was once asked by a New York authoress, when both were the guests of Madame Alberti, for his autograph, appended to a favorite quotation from his own work. He presented her with the following:

"PIONEERS

"They rise to mastery of wind and snow;
They go like soldiers grimly into strife
To colonize the plain; they plow and sow
And fertilize the plain with their own life,
As did the Indian and the buffalo."

Greatest General History Greatest Scientific Work
Greatest Theological Work
Greatest Biographical Work
Greatest Art Work
Greatest Geographical Work

Every article upon these and every other subject is treated exhaustively by the greatest known specialists, hence every article is the best, most reliable and satisfactory that the whole world can furnish.

Far More Valuable to Americans than the English Edition

The English edition contains no information later than 1890. It contains no biographies of living individuals, no biographies of such men as Bismarck, Gladstone, Grant, Blaine; they all being alive when the Britannica was published.

All these and thousands of articles on Science, Art, Literature, etc., of special interest to Americans, are supplied by our American Supplement, the work of 500 experts.

It brings the entire work down to date, having articles on the Boers, South African Republic, Spanish American War, none of which are found in the English Edition.

OUR NEW APPENDIX VOLUME, with our exhaustive American Supplement, takes every important title in the work and gives all that is recent concerning it, bringing information down to date. It contains also 52 New Maps, including the new Government Map of Klondike, Hawaii, Cuba. Thus, with our supplemental volumes, the Britannica becomes the latest as well as the greatest.

TO CANADIAN READERS.—This edition can be legally sent into Canada.

Remember

THIS IS THE ONLY REPRINT published in the world that is not altered, mutilated or abridged in some way.

THAT IT IS ABSOLUTELY COMPLETE, containing every one of the 8000 illustrations, 700 maps, 25,000 articles and 250,000 index references found in the original, and at less than one-half the price.

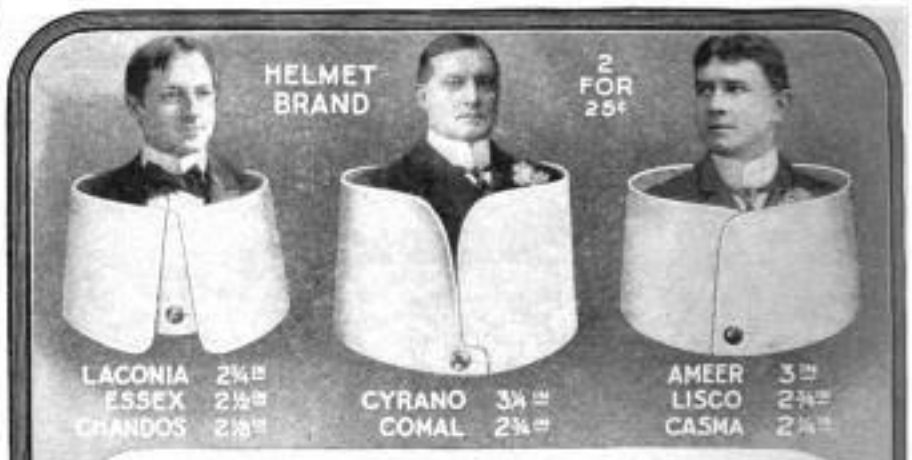
The New Mother Goose
By Guy Wetmore Carryl

THE COMMENDABLE CASTIGATION ADMINISTERED TO OLD MOTHER HUBBARD



SHE was one of those creatures whose features are hard beyond any reclaim,
And she loved in a hovel to grovel, and she hadn't a cent to her name;
She owned neither gallants nor talents, she borrowed extensively, too,
From all of her dozens of cousins, and never refunded a sou.
Yet all they said in abuse of her
Was, "She is prouder than Lucifer."
That, I must say, without meaning to blame,
Is always the way with that kind of a dame!

There never was jollier collie than Old Mother Hubbard had found.
Though cheaply she'd bought him, she taught him to follow her meekly around.
But though she would kick him and lick him, it hadn't the slightest effect,
He always was howling and growling; but, goodness! what could you expect?
Collies were never to flourish meant
'Less they had plenty of nourishment.
All that he had was the feathers she'd pluck
Off an occasional chicken or duck!

The collie was barred in the garden; he howled and he wailed and he whined;
The neighbors malignant, indignant petitions unanimous signed:
"The nuisance grows nightly," politely they wrote. "He's an odious hound,
And either you'll fill him or kill him, or else he must go to the pound.
For if this howling infernally
Is to continue nocturnally
(Pardon us, ma'am, if we seem to be curt),
Somebody's apt to get horribly hurt!"

Mother Hubbard cried loudly and proudly, "Land sakes! but you give yourselves airs!
I'll take the law to you and sue you!" The neighbors responded, "Who cares?
We none of us care if the sheriff lock every man Jack of us up.
We won't be repining at fining so long as we're rid of the pup."
Then they proceeded to flaunt a sign
Bearing this ominous countersign:
"Freemen! the moment has come to protest,
And Old Mother Hubbard delenda est!"

They marched to her gateway, and straightway they trampled all over her lawn;
Most rudely they harried and carried her 'round on a rail till the dawn;
They marred her and jarred her, and tarred her and feathered her, just as they should;
Of speech they bereft her, and left her with "Now, do you think you'll be good?"
THE MORAL'S a charmingly pleasing one:
Though we would deprecate teasing one,
Still, when a dame has politeness rebuffed
She certainly ought to be collared and cuffed!

The Stormy Days of the Electoral Commission

By Ex-Senator John J. Ingalls

THE men who made the Constitution and built up our political system, rhetorically known as the fathers, the framers and the founders of the Republic, had little confidence in what Lincoln called the plain, common people, and less faith in their capacity for self-government.

They were aristocrats. They believed in the rule of the best, and not the rule of the most.

They thought public affairs should be controlled by intelligence and not by numbers.

They wanted liberty regulated by laws enacted by the wise, interpreted by the learned, and administered by the strong. How far their distrust of universal suffrage as the foundation of the State was justified is shown by the fact that while reluctantly conceding to the popular vote the lower House of Congress, which has been seldom tainted with impurity, they created a Senate, to be chosen by Legislatures—a scheme so prolific in venality, intrigue, bribery and corruption that it has become the scandal, the reproach and the menace of republican institutions.

For the choice of a President and Vice-President they invented a plan by which the people were to have nothing to do with the selection of their Executive.

It was so ingeniously clumsy and cumbersome, so defective in safeguards against the most obvious emergencies, so vague in its definitions, so pregnant with dangers that, even as immediately modified by the twelfth article of amendment to the Constitution, the marvel is that a catastrophe has been so long postponed.

THE VAGARIES OF OUR ELECTORAL SYSTEM

THEY provided for the appointment in each State, in such manner as the Legislatures might direct, of electors to assemble on a stated day at their respective capitals, to ballot in secret session, without consultation with their associates or the constituency, for the persons best qualified in their judgment to serve as Chief Magistrate of the nation and as President of the Senate for the next four years.

The result of their deliberations being signed in triplicate, one certificate is sent by mail and one by messenger to the President of the Senate, the third being retained against the contingency of loss or destruction.

The second Tuesday in February these certificates are to be opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two houses of Congress, and "the votes shall then be counted," but by whom they shall be counted the Constitution saith not. Whether the Vice-President and President of the Senate is a clerk, a custodian or an umpire is unknown. Whether the joint convention of the two Houses, in whose presence the President of the Senate opens the certificates—and "the votes shall then be counted"—is an impotent pageant, or the political tribunal of the nation, has never been determined. Whether the Houses separately and the individual Senators and Representatives are curious spectators, or jurors, or judges, is an enigma, as it has been for a hundred years.

First by the Congressional Caucus, and then by the National Nominating Convention, the people soon assumed the power of selecting the candidates for whom the electoral colleges should vote, but the antiquated, bungling, obsolete machinery remains. Theoretically the electors can vote for any persons they please for President and Vice-President. In 1897 every Bryan elector had the Constitutional right to vote for McKinley; every McKinley elector had the same right to vote for Bryan; all had the right to vote for Mr. Clark, of Montana, or Mr. Addicks, of Delaware—in either of which events the certificates would be opened by the President of the Senate, and "the votes shall then be counted!" There is no restraint but loyalty and the decrees of public opinion.

WITHIN A HAIRBREADTH OF A NATIONAL CRISIS

CHANCELLOR KENT, in his commentaries, says the President of the Senate counts the vote and determines the result. It is certain that the first electoral votes were opened and counted, and George Washington was declared elected by John Langdon, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, who was chosen by the Senate as its President, for that sole purpose, before the Government was organized.

It is equally certain that had the President of the Senate, in February, 1877, opened the certificates, counted the votes, and declared Hayes and Wheeler elected President and Vice-President, by including the returns from Florida, Louisiana, South Carolina and Oregon among the others that were not disputed, the House of Representatives, being Democratic, would have at once proceeded to elect Tilden and Hendricks, voting by States. The result would have been two Presidents, each supported by his own party, each claiming title under the Constitution, a double inauguration, the Senate and House arrayed against each other, with the probability of armed collision, anarchy and civil war. The election of 1876 was the subsiding ground swell of the war.

After the surrender, the South submitted for a while to emancipation, negro suffrage, civil rights enactments, and the other crude enormities of reconstruction; but organizing at length in White Leagues and Ku Klux Klans, overturned the unstable governments which the ignorance of the former slaves and the cupidity of political adventurers had reared upon the ruins of war. Wealth, intelligence and education were disfranchised. The social fabric, like a pyramid resting on its apex instead of its base, stood so long as it was supported by bayonets, and, when these were withdrawn, fell with a crash in blood and crime that startled the world with the horrors of its destruction. The North, shocked and appalled by wrongs and outrages which laws were unable either to prevent or to punish, and exasperated by the bewildering failure of the policy of reconstruction either to protect the negro in his rights or to perpetuate his political power, saw with resentment State after State falling into Democratic control under the supremacy of the civil and military leaders of the Confederacy. Of the eleven seceding States, all save three—Florida, South Carolina and Louisiana—were lost to the Republicans. These the Democrats hoped to carry for Tilden; or, failing in this, so to corrupt the returns that their electoral votes could not be received and counted.

THE PRESIDENTIAL BATTLE OF 'SEVENTY-SIX

THE passions of the combatants were thus aroused to the pitch of frenzy. For the first time in sixteen years the Democrats felt the possibility of resuming national power. The Republicans inflamed the Northern States by presenting the dangers of the "Solid South," insisting that the purpose was to obtain payment for losses in the war, for the assumption of the Confederate debt, with compensation for the emancipated slaves.

These charges made such an impression and were urged with such persistent vehemence that Mr. Hewitt, of New York, in an open letter called them to the attention of Mr. Tilden, who said, in his published reply, that should he be elected President he should deem it his duty to veto every bill for the assumption or payment of any such debts, losses, damages or claims, which gave Republican orators precisely the opportunity they desired, and was like an effort to put out a fire by pouring on kerosene.

Neither of the Presidential candidates inspired any personal enthusiasm among his followers.

Hayes was hopelessly prosaic and commonplace. He had been a reputable soldier, and was by profession a lawyer. He was the "dark horse" of the Cincinnati Convention, rendered available because in a desperate emergency he had been chosen Governor of Ohio. He had no vices, and the customary sort of rather tiresome and uninteresting virtues. His enemies accused him of sanctimony and hypocrisy, and of sometimes forgetting his promises; but all good men have been slandered by their contemporaries.

Tilden was a cadaverous, tallow-faced attorney, in feeble health, who, having raked together an immense fortune, naturally became a reformer in politics and was elected Governor of New York. His methods were those of the mole, except that he left no external indications of the silent and tortuous windings of his subterranean pathway. He took personal management of his campaign with a few confidential clerks, and was accused of attempting to purchase the vote necessary to secure a majority of one in the Electoral College. The election took place November 7, and by midnight the general impression was that Tilden had been successful. He had carried Connecticut, New York, Indiana and all the Southern States except Florida, South Carolina and Louisiana, and in those the result was uncertain, though early reports favored the Democrats. The next day the Republicans, many of them, practically gave up the fight and conceded the election of Tilden. The Republicans had the State officers and the returning boards in the disputed States, but they were mysteriously silent. The fortunes of Hayes seemed gloomy, dark and desperate indeed.

Toward nightfall "Old Zack" Chandler, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, sent out through the Associated Press, with no preface, nor arithmetic, nor index, his celebrated dispatch: "Hayes and Wheeler have 185 votes, and are elected."

The Democrats went into hysterics, and the Republicans recovered their equanimity.

What actually occurred in Florida, Louisiana and South Carolina the day of the election, and afterward, and who really received a majority of the votes cast will never be known, but the Hayes electors were certified by the returning boards in due time, and the certificates forwarded to the President of the Senate. Duplicate certificates from each State were also sent in, showing the choice of Democratic electors and their votes for Tilden and Hendricks.

GRANT PREPARES FOR EMERGENCIES

THE interval till the meeting of Congress in December was full of apprehension. The Democrats were violent in their denunciations, and threatened to have an army of occupation in Washington to superintend the counting of the electoral votes in February.

Grant was President. When asked if he thought there would be any trouble, he replied: "No, I think not; but it has been one rule of my life to be always ready." Troops began to gather in the forts along the Potomac. Batteries of artillery came in from the West by rail and rumbled through the streets at night on their way to the Arsenal and the Navy Yard. Groups of soldiers in bright new uniforms, but without arms, strolled to and fro on the Avenue—whether on duty or on furlough no one appeared to know. Possibly Grant was getting ready to have his successor, Hayes or Tilden, peaceably inaugurated and installed.

Recognizing the extreme gravity of the crisis, the brevity of the time, the infirmity of the Constitution, and the tremendous dangers that threatened the peace, and possibly the existence, of the nation, soon after Congress assembled a joint committee consisting of seven members from each House was appointed to prepare a bill to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereunder, for the term beginning March 4, 1877.

The Senate was Republican, and appointed Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Morton, Conkling, Thurman, Bayard and Ransom.

The House was Democratic, and appointed Payne, of Ohio; Hunton, of Virginia; Hewitt, of New York; Springer, of Illinois; McCrary, of Iowa; Hoar, of Massachusetts, and Willard, of Michigan; in the aggregate, seven Republicans and seven Democrats.

exalted patriotism, matured experience, and the highest intellectual powers. Edmunds, in his opening speech, said the dispute with which they were to deal was probably as great as ever existed in the world under the law. This statement was not sensational. Wars have been waged, kings beheaded and dynasties overthrown in controversies far less momentous and complicated than that which now confronted the American people. The legal questions involved were novel. There were no precedents. A contingency had risen for the first time in the history of the nation, and is liable to rise again, for which the Constitution and the laws were, and still are, inadequate.

But, untried and intricate as was the legal problem, this was trifling compared with the political predicament.

THE PUZZLING PROBLEMS OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE

THE committee was not only to devise an unconstitutional measure that should be strictly within constitutional limitations (which would not be hard, for that instrument is elastic and hospitable), but to invent a tribunal composed of partisans that should be non-partisan in operation; propitiate the implacables; preserve the prerogatives of the Senate, and maintain the conflicting pretensions of the House; secure the coöperation of those who contended that there was power to "go behind the returns," and those who asserted that the only question to be decided was which certificate was actually given by the authorities of the State; and, most important of all, obtain the cordial support of both parties by holding out to each the hope of cheating the other.

The committee deliberated a month, and on January 18 Senator Edmunds reported what is popularly known as the Electoral Commission Bill, Senator Morton being the only dissenter. As a specimen of political funambulism it will take rank among the highest achievements of the human mind.

It provided, in substance, for the meeting of the two Houses and the course of procedure; for the disposition of questions arising in respect to States from which but one set of certificates had been received; for the reference of questions arising in respect to States from which more than one certificate had been received, to a Commission consisting of five Senators, five Representatives, and five Justices of the Supreme Court, the decision of a majority to be final, unless rejected by concurrent votes of both Houses, in which event their order should prevail; and for the reservation of all legal and constitutional rights, if any, to test the question of title in the courts.

Four of the Supreme Court Justices were designated in the bill—those assigned to the First, Third, Eighth and Ninth Circuits; they to select the fifth in such manner as they might decide.

Edmunds, in commenting on this clause, declared with some grandiloquence that the choice of the four Justices was geographical—one from New England, one from New York, one from the Northwest and one from the Pacific.

Morton sneeringly replied that they were selected on account of their known previous political predilections, and that the reason why the Democrats favored the bill was because they expected it would elect Tilden.

Curiously enough, it did turn out that two of the Justices, Clifford and Field, were Democrats, and two, Miller and Strong, Republicans, but probably Edmunds was not aware of this. At least he did not mention it in his speech. So far, then, the Commission was equally divided in politics—seven Republicans, seven Democrats, with the fifteenth member in abeyance: the unknown arbiter, the domesman of the Electoral College.

The Justices, being two and two, could not well ballot, and were too dignified to pull straws. It became to be understood that seniority of service would control, and their choice would fall on Justice David Davis, who was known to favor Tilden, so this non-partisan Commission would consist of eight Democrats and seven Republicans. The joy of the Democracy was unconfined. They considered the bill the supreme effort of human wisdom, for whose praise every place was a temple and all seasons summer.

A STRANGE CAPRICE OF FORTUNE

THE Republicans said little. They were taciturn and reserved. What they thought was never disclosed. But what happened was this: The term of General John A. Logan as Senator from Illinois was about to expire. He was an active candidate for reelection. The Legislature was so nearly a tie between the Republicans and Democrats that five "independents" held the balance of power. They supported Judge Davis, and, after several days of futile and barren balloting, the Democrats united with them and elected him as Logan's successor. Whereupon the Judge resigned from the Supreme Bench to take his seat in the Senate March 4, 1877.

The next ranking Justice was Joseph P. Bradley, a Republican, and favorable to the election of Hayes! Thus, by an incredible caprice of fortune, a gamester's chance, Fate, shuffling the cards, dealt the last trump to the Republicans, and the Commission stood eight to seven for Hayes.

Like the gentleman in Bret Harte's poem who was struck in the abdomen by a red-sandstone specimen and doubled up on the floor, the subsequent proceedings interested the Democrats no more. They denounced the bill as the climax of villainy, and its authors as the supreme malefactors of history. Perhaps their emotions were best described by Judge Jeremiah Black, one of the counsel in the South Carolina case, who said in a speech to the Commission, apropos of nothing: "This nation has got her great big foot in a trap. It is vain to struggle for her extrication. . . . .

"Usually it is said 'in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird,' but this fowler set the net in the sight of the birds that went into it. It is largely our own fault that we were caught. . . . At present you have us down and under your feet. Never had you a better right to rejoice. Well may you say, 'We have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement!'"

The bill passed the Senate 47 to 17 and the House 191 to 86, exactly as it came from the committee. It was approved by President Grant January 29, with a special message in which he characterized the measure as one that afforded "wise and constitutional means of escape from imminent peril to the institutions of the country."

January 30 the Senate chose Edmunds, Morton, Frelinghuysen, Thurman and Bayard, and the House Payne, Hunton, Abbott, Hoar and Garfield as the Congressional members of the Commission. The same day the four Associate Justices of the Supreme Court selected Justice Bradley as the fifth member, and the tribunal was complete.

THE FIRST SESSION OF THE ELECTORAL COMMISSION

THEY assembled January 31, eleven A. M., in the Supreme Court room at the Capitol, organized, appointed their staff, adopted rules and, shortly before noon, February 1, notified the Senate and House that they were ready to proceed to the performance of their duties.

The President pro tempore appointed Mr. Allison, of Iowa, and Mr. Ingalls, of Kansas, tellers on the part of the Senate; and Speaker Randall appointed Mr. Cook, of Georgia, and Mr. Stone, of Missouri, tellers on the part of the House.

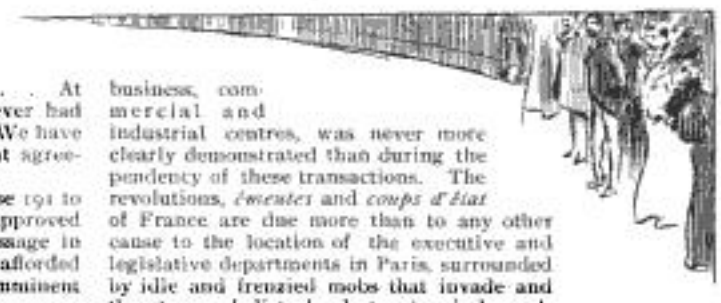
On motion of Mr. Edmunds, at one o'clock the Senate huddled in careless, disorderly array out of its chamber and marched by twos in straggling procession through the rotunda, between ranks of curious and silent spectators, halting for an instant at the door of the Hall of Representatives.

At the head of the column was the President pro tem., escorted by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and followed by the venerable assistant doorkeeper, Isaac Bassett, carrying the electoral certificates in two square black-walnut boxes, with brass handles on the covers, like a commercial traveler with his sample-cases going into the office of the leading hotel. One box contained the certificates sent by messenger, the other those sent by mail; about half a bushel of each.

The House arose to receive the Senate, which took seats in the body of the Hall upon the right of the presiding officer. The Speaker vacated the chair, which was taken by President Ferry. Randall, imperturbable and impassive, sat at his left. The Secretary of the Senate, the Clerk of the House and the Tellers sat at the clerk's desk, the stenographers and other officials having tables in front and on either side of the platform. The galleries were packed. The silence was profound—an expectant hush, as when the curtain rises for the prologue at the first presentation of a great drama.

THE CURTAIN RISES ON A GREAT DRAMA

THE President of the Senate called the joint meeting to order, announced its object and, with a new, sharp, long knife the Sergeant-at-Arms had provided, proceeded to slit the envelope containing the certificate of the State of Alabama received by messenger, which he handed to Senator Allison, who read it in full, giving ten votes to Tilden and Hendricks. Then he opened the envelope received by mail from the same State and handed it down to be read, when Senator Conkling somewhat impatiently suggested that it could hardly be necessary to read the duplicate in full, and that hereafter as one was read the other should be compared.



The certificates were opened in alphabetical order, Alabama being followed by Arkansas, California, Colorado and Delaware, to none of which were objections made, and the reading droned monotonously along till half-past two when Florida was reached, the first of the disputed States from which triplicate returns had been received: one from the Republican Governor and Secretary of State certifying the choice of the Hayes electors; the second from the Attorney-General certifying that the returns showed the election of the Tilden electors; the third by the Democratic Governor and Secretary of State chosen at the general election, certifying to proceedings under an act of the Legislature and the judgment of a State court in favor of the Tilden electors. An objection was also filed that one of the Hayes electors at the time of his appointment held an office of trust and profit under the United States and was therefore ineligible.

All the papers, exhibits and certificates, with the objections signed by Senators and Representatives, were immediately transmitted to the Commission, which was in session, and the Senate withdrew to its chamber to wait for the decision, which was not reached till late in the evening of February 9.

The sessions of the Commission were held in the vaulted hall which the Senate left for its new chamber January 4, 1859: the historic room where Webster hurled the thunderbolts of his logic and eloquence at Hayne, and which resounded to the oratorical duels between Calhoun and Clay.

In one of the upper corridors hangs a painting by Mrs. Fassett, perhaps of greater historic interest than artistic value, representing Mr. Evarts addressing the tribunal before an audience that fills the room. The portraits include many of the most eminent personages, at the bar and in public life, of an epoch made illustrious by their achievements in oratory and statesmanship.

The wisdom of having a strictly political Capital, absolutely under the control of the Government, away from business, commercial and industrial centres, was never more clearly demonstrated than during the pendency of these transactions. The revolutions, émeutes and coups d'état of France are due more than to any other cause to the location of the executive and legislative departments in Paris, surrounded by idle and frenzied mobs that invade and threaten and disturb, destroying independence and rendering tranquil deliberation and dispassionate judgment impossible.

THE DARK DAYS OF OUR NATIONAL PERIL

HAD Congress and the Commission sat in Baltimore or New York, that month of national jeopardy, among raging multitudes of infuriated partisans with their parades and mass-meetings and the demonstrations of demagogues, no prophet could have foretold what the end would be.

Even in Washington, so somnolent and obsequious, where public opinion is subdued to what it works in, like the dyer's hand, it looked squally enough at times, especially toward the close. Probably Watterson's call for a hundred thousand "one-armed Kentuckians," as the wags travestied it, to superintend the electoral count, was the rhapsody of an automatic rhetorician, but the town swarmed with disreputable and unbidden guests who haunted the Capitol, lounged in the lobbies, sauntered through the grounds, and crowded the galleries of the House at every joint session. The police were reënforced. Detectives in plain clothes, and heavily armed, were stationed among the spectators. A vague terror brooded in the air—the apprehension of an impending tragedy.

As an illustration, rather amusing now, of the trepidations of the time, word came to Ferry one morning, either by anonymous letter or through the report of a detective, that as the Senate passed through the rotunda at noon on its way to the House a gang of ruffians were to assault the head of the consecrated column and in the confusion take the boxes containing the certificates from Captain Bassett, carry them off and destroy the returns not counted. It seemed feasible enough, and, if successful, would have prematurely closed the functions of the Commission and given the House the opportunity, coveted by the implacables, of electing Tilden President, voting by States as the Constitution provides when there is no choice by the electors.

The hour of meeting was near at hand. The time for deliberation was short. Ferry, who was naturally somewhat of an alarmist, held a hurried consultation with his staff, and it was finally decided to empty the boxes secretly and take the returns over as personal assets. To Bassett this seemed little short of sacrilege, like rifling the ark of the covenant. It was contrary to the precedents of half a century. But Ferry decided that it was an emergency and, as what is past help should be past grief, the boxes were unlocked and the returns stowed away in the breast pockets and side pockets and coat-tail pockets of the tellers and other officials, and Bassett marched with his empty packing-cases at the head of the procession.

Of course nothing happened. There was no assault. I imagine none was contemplated. Some joker, no doubt, played on Ferry's credulity. The boxes were placed under the clerk's desk in the House, the returns collected from their extemporaneous receptacles and returned to proper custody, and the incident was closed.

THE ARRAY OF DISTINGUISHED LEGAL TALENT

THE array of counsel has not in any forum been surpassed in learning and eloquence. Prominent among them were Jeremiah T. Black, Secretary of State and Attorney-General under Buchanan; Montgomery Blair, Lincoln's Postmaster-General; Matthew Carpenter, previously and afterward Senator from Wisconsin; William M. Evarts, Attorney-General in the Cabinet of Andrew Johnson, and afterward Secretary of State under Hayes; George Hoadley, at one time Governor of Ohio; Stanley Matthews, Senator from Ohio and Justice of the Supreme Court; Charles O'Conor, perhaps the leader of the New York bar; Samuel Shellabarger, member of Congress from Ohio during the war; Lyman Trumbull, eighteen years Senator from Illinois; and William C. Whitney, afterward Cleveland's Secretary of the Navy. Others scarcely less eminent pleaded briefs, and several Senators and members of Congress participated in the arguments.

THE ISSUE BETWEEN REPUBLICANS AND DEMOCRATS

STRIPPED of all superfluities, subtleties and technicalities, the Republican contention was that the returns of the electoral votes, duly certified by the State authorities, were final and conclusive, and that neither Congress nor the Commission could receive evidence from any outside source, either that the electors were not chosen, or that others were, or that there had been fraud, forgery, violence or other irregularities, either in the election, the canvassing board or any proceedings subsequent thereto.

The Democrats insisted upon the right to go behind the returns, and prove that the Tilden, and not the Hayes, electors were chosen by the people and that the certificates were forged and fraudulent.

Whether Tilden or Hayes had the majority in Florida, Louisiana or South Carolina is not capable of proof. It is doubtful if there has been an absolutely square and honest Presidential election since the time of George Washington.

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

WASHINGTON, March, 1900.

IF IT is a fact that the slowest pulsation is always the most vital, then I certainly should liken the art of waiting to the slow pulsation, for waiting has been more vital in my case than any haste would have been, since by waiting I have gained at least one desired end. Our postmaster out in Spruce City was confirmed by the Senate in executive session without one word of dissent from any member of that body, and without any spoken word from us to Senator P——. This is a clear case of the "silent lobby," and I am more triumphant over its success than I am at the opening of several doors to me in the smart world, which I had begun to fear my key would not fit.

The day that our postmaster went through the Senate I had been in the gallery listening to the slow grinding out of the debate on the Financial Bill, which was dull enough, goodness knows, until the capers of Mr. Tillman enlivened things. This lank gentleman from South Carolina diverted me all that afternoon. He would jump to his feet with a nervous jerk at his waistcoat, and in a strident voice, every tone of which could be heard in the corridors without, would hurl himself into the midst of his opponent's speech. He would snatch at the greenback, then at the gold dollar, and, figuratively, would shake them between his teeth, much as a terrier would shake a rat, only desisting when the chair would call him to order, after which he would give a reluctant and final twitch to his waistcoat, nod his head to his opponent as much as to say, "Get away with that if you can!" smile triumphantly upon his Democratic colleagues, and then hurl himself back into his chair. This he kept up until the debate was closed and some one had moved to go into executive session. I waited, even after this, a moment to watch the preparations for this secret session. The electric bells began to jangle all over the Senate end of the Capitol. The chief page came to the foot of the Vice-President's platform and clapped his hands three times in signal for the other pages to retire precipitously from the sacred presence. I had a brief moment of wondering if I could not secrete myself somewhere under a bench and stay through this mysterious conclave, but alas! while I was turning this over in my mind the doorkeeper invited me unceremoniously out of the gallery. I complied without standing upon the order of going.

When Robert came home that day and announced that our postmaster had been confirmed, I made him tell me all that he knew of what goes on in the Senate during these executive sessions. First and foremost, it would seem that, as soon as all the doors are closed and locked, the most important act of this august body is a drawing forth of match-boxes and cigars and a general lighting up. This is accompanied by a hubbub of voices such as would do credit to a chapter meeting of the Daughters of the American Revolution. On this particular occasion Robert was told that the Senator who had moved the executive session, moved, through a cloud of cigar smoke, that our man out in Spruce City should be confirmed as postmaster of that city. Thereupon the Vice-President pro tem., in the usual way, after a pause in which the motion was supposed to be under consideration, hearing no dissent, said, "Without objection, it is so ordered."

"But, Robert," I asked, "where was Senator P—— all this time? Didn't he say anything?"

"Senator P—— was not in the Senate Chamber at all. He withdrew his objections before the committee, and the nomination was allowed to come up in this executive session along with other nominations."

We looked at each other silently for an instant, then Robert said with a twinkle in his eyes:

"I certainly do not agree with that sour old pessimist who wished that Adam had died with all his ribs in his body."

I laughed at this sally, and the compliment under it pleased me. It was Robert's way of paying a tribute to my help in the matter. He continued gallantly:

"'Woman was not taken out of man's head to top him, nor out of his feet to be trampled upon, but from his side to be equal to him, and near his heart to be loved.'"

"Why, Robert, you are growing positively brilliant! I never knew you to quote things about women before. If the women suffragists should hear you they would be trying to get you on their committee and make you speak for them. They were as thick around the Capitol to-day as bees about to swarm, and poor Mr. Ray, who had them in charge before the House Committee, looked perfectly distracted, especially after the 'remonstrants' also claimed to be heard."

"By the way, Agatha, that reminds me: our postmaster went through in very smart company to-day—smarter than any he ever dreamed of—for Mrs. Potter Palmer was confirmed as Commissioner to the Paris Exposition."

This news was almost as interesting as that of the confirmation of our man, for this ended the pretty fight between Mrs. Potter Palmer and Mrs. Daniel Manning for the commissionership. These ladies have been pulling wires for this position for weeks. Mr. Depew championed Mrs. Manning, and when it seemed certain that the appointment would go to Mrs. Palmer he introduced a bill in the Senate authorizing the appointment of a lady to represent this country at the unveiling of the statue of Lafayette in Paris. This bill provided that she should be styled a Commissioner, and should also be a member of the Daughters of the American Revolution. Of course, Mrs. Manning was not mentioned by name, but everybody knew who was intended. But alas! this bill has been hung up in the House, and the Daughters have been gnashing their pretty teeth at the thought that Bertha Honoré Palmer's name passed the Senate, not only without demur, but with the additional courtesy of not even being referred to the Committee on International Expositions, to which all such nominations are usually sent.

If the House could only be caught napping, as the Senate is sometimes, it might be possible to slip Mr. Depew's bill for Mrs. Manning through that body just as the Boer resolutions of sympathy were slipped through the Senate the other day by Mr. Allen, of Nebraska, which raised such a laugh and such a prompt demand for reconsideration of the vote that Mr. Allen was forced to assent. Mr. Allen does not often assent to anything, and when he rises up from his seat, tall and shaggy, it is generally with the words on his lips, "I object."

In fact, the gentleman from Nebraska is hostile to pretty much everything in this session. He wants nothing regal, or that smacks of imperialism in our midst, and even objects to the keeping intact of the Royal Mausoleum in Honolulu in which repose the bones of a long line of dead Hawaiian kings and queens. It occurred to the Committee on Public Lands the other day to introduce a resolution to keep from desecration this royal tomb, and the clerk of the Senate got up to read the resolution.

Well, Mr. Allen was listening. He knew that it was something to which he ought to object, but he could not understand one single word of it all until finally he caught "Royal Mausoleum"; then suddenly he knew where he was: this was something imperial, regal, belonging to the new possessions—it must be put a stop to; like the Irishman, whatever it was, he was "ag'in' it." Up he arose and sprang his familiar objection, and lo! the resolution concerning the royal bones went over, and unless the gentleman from Nebraska should soften his heart the resolution will not be called up again, and the royal bones will be thrown in along with the public lands to be turned over at some future day by the enterprising Yankee plough.

But the Senate has much more serious work on hand than caring for our royal ancestors by annexation. This question of the treaty is confronting the Senate, and Robert says that the provisions embodied in it demonstrate how out of touch and out of tune the Secretary of State is with the rank and file of his party, and it is causing much uneasiness among Republican Senators. Robert says that this uneasiness is caused by a fear that the Administration may take a stand on the treaty, and send out an order that it must be ratified, no matter how Senators feel toward it personally. There are not many who will be bold enough to defy such a command, for it might mean that a Senator possessing such temerity could not get any bill he might be interested in through Congress, nor command an appointment, and that perhaps even those already appointed under his influence might be in jeopardy. It has always been commonly said that all Anglo-American treaties have been floated in champagne, but this is not the history of this treaty—perhaps if it were, the Senate would know better what to do with it.

When I first asked Senator P—— about this new treaty he expressed himself very conservatively on the subject. He was willing to tell me what he thought of every other man's attitude toward it, but he would not give me more than a mere hint at his own. To my surprise, within a few days he has spoken openly, even warmly, for ratification. I asked Robert to explain to me the Senator's change from conservatism to open advocacy. Robert seemed slow to commit himself to any reason for it. At last he said:

"Well, Agatha, you know as well as I do what an influential man P—— is. You know how near he stands to the President, but perhaps you have not heard that there is a movement afoot to put him on the ticket as a running mate in the next campaign."

"You mean, Robert, that Senator P——, for the sake of being nominated for Vice-President, would vote for this treaty, even against his judgment, against his conscience and against the good of the country?"

"Well, Agatha, that's about the size of it."

"Oh! Robert, I do not believe it. It is not like the rest of his public record."

Robert laughed, and said, "Why, Agatha, I thought you had parted with all romantic notions concerning statesmen and legislation for the good of the country."

But I was not to be laughed out of my notions. I was more disturbed at having my high estimate of Senator P—— shaken than I cared to admit. Soon afterward we were giving an elaborate dinner in Jules' best style. The Secretary of War and Senator P—— were both present, and being the two most important guests, sat on either side of me. I lost no time in broaching to Senator P—— what was in my mind.

"Senator P——, I am a seeker after truth; you must help me to find it."

"Certainly, Mrs. Slocum, but of course you know what the fate of the old philosopher was who went in search of truth and who saw his own image in the bottom of the well and remained to worship it instead."

"Yes," I retorted, "I have heard of that same old philosopher and you think that as a woman I would do likewise; but I have also heard that with some people truth is as 'hazardous and contraband a commodity as a man can possibly deal in.'"

"Ah!" laughed the Senator, "from your emphasis on 'some people,' you mean that for politicians 'truth is a hazardous commodity to deal in?' You are right, and I see that you are becoming a clever politician yourself."

I wondered if he were thinking of our postmaster. I replied:

"Yes, I am getting far enough along to begin to lose the distinction between right and wrong. That is the first step in politics, is it not?"

"Is that the result of your husband's teaching?" asked he quickly and audaciously.

"No, Senator P——, it is the result of the teaching of you Senators up in the Senate. I have noticed the attitude of different politicians upon all these great questions that confront us, and I have noticed the lightning changes in their opinions, and I want to know what the truth of the situation is, and what underlying influences are at work. There is one phrase that is being solemnly and grandiloquently used by the politicians: this phrase is 'sphere of influence.' I am beginning to find out that when you apply it to the nation you mean a slice of China, and when you apply it to the individual you mean the Vice-Presidency."

Senator P—— laughed quietly to himself, while I devoted myself for a time to the Secretary of War. Finally he caught my attention again and said, in a lowered voice:

"So you have heard the rumor that I am going to add my name to the list of those who desire the second place on the ticket?"

I faced him and asked boldly, without heeding his question:

"What do you want to be Vice-President for?"

"What makes you think that I want to be Vice-President?" he asked with sudden gravity. After a moment he said with a tinge of contempt:

"Ah! Mrs. Slocum, there can be no thin moralizing in politics, and no philosophical politics, either. The sole zest in it all lies in the possession of power, and the road to power is rough hewn, not finely chiseled. What power could a Vice-President possibly possess? He is a continual and lugubrious memento mori to the President."

"And your vote on the treaty will be ——?"

He laughed and shook his head. He was not to be drawn into any committal as to the treaty.

When our last dinner guests had departed, Page and I hurried off to keep several late engagements. We looked in at the Japanese Minister's, Mr. Komura, who was giving a unique entertainment that night. He had a band of Japanese actors present who gave a native play that was well-nigh unintelligible to most of us, though the dancing was quaint and interesting. I had determined that if I saw any one from the French Embassy I would try to find out something concerning Alain de Courcelles, for Page was so restless and fitful that I was distressed for her. The only diplomat with whom I had a word was the nice little Swiss Minister, and remembering that Mr. de Courcelles often had gone to the Swiss Legation, I asked casually if they had had any news from him. Our conversation was rather an elaborate affair, for what with his broken English and my Spruce City French it consisted mainly in bows, smiles, shrugs and guesses at what each was trying to say. I gathered at last that nothing had been heard directly, but that indirectly a brief and recent paragraph in a Paris newspaper had stated that the Marquise de Courcelles, mother of the Marquis Jean Jacques de Courcelles, lay dying at their château in Brittainy. This was unexpected and exciting news indeed! I asked the Swiss Minister to let me know if he should happen to hear anything further concerning the sad condition of Madame de Courcelles, to which he replied, drawing his heels together and making a polite bow:

"I will do for Madame any 'posseeble.'"

The Making of a Railroad Man
The President's Views
By E. P. RIPLEY, President Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé R.R.

IF I WERE asked to say something about the making of a railroad man, I should ask, "What kind of a railroad man?" because the railroad profession embraces specialists of many kinds, and in these days nearly all railroad men must be specialists.

A man who is an expert in machinery or in civil engineering may fill an important position in railroad service, even though he be ignorant of the work of other departments, and other men may hold equal or even higher rank in the service, though possessing little or no knowledge of engineering or mechanics.

Strictly speaking, it can hardly be said that the railroad service is a profession, but rather that it embraces all the professions. In a large system the head of a department must stand at the head of his class, but he is not required to be a proficient in other lines. The Superintendent of Motive Power must be second to none in mechanical lines, but he may know nothing of maintenance of way or of traffic affairs. Similarly, the Traffic Manager or General Freight Agent, though eminently satisfactory in his own field, may not know, and perhaps often does not know, the difference between a "Mogul" engine and a "Consolidation." All this is as it should be, and is a part of the evolution of the smaller railroad into the larger "system." The time has passed when immediate supervision of all departments can be vested in one man, except in the case of roads of very small mileage.

SMALL ROADS THE BEST SCHOOLS

THERE was a time when the dry goods or grocery merchant bought his own goods (and largely sold them) himself, and knew every article in his store and the price of it. Now, if he has survived, he has divided his store into departments, and has a man at the head of each, and confines himself to a general oversight, judging his chief officers mainly by results, and interfering but little in details. There are yet a few small roads in the country where a somewhat intimate knowledge of the business of all departments is necessary to a few of the principal officers, and on these small roads is to be found the best school for general education in the railroad business. The great mass of railroad workers must specialize, however, in order to obtain employment or advancement.

It follows, then, that in most cases a "railroad man" is one familiar with but one branch of the service, having only such casual knowledge of the other branches as his daily association with those employed in them and the exercise of his powers of observation may give him. He may hope for promotion in his specialty, but not generally outside of it, though there are notable exceptions.

THE CIVIL SERVICE SYSTEM IN VOGUE

IN OUR larger railway systems civil service rules are almost universal. It occasionally happens, of course, that a man who has made for himself a reputation on one road is invited to a position on another, but, generally speaking, this occurs only when it is believed that there is no one in the ranks capable of exactly filling the position. Necessarily promotion comes slowly, and to many it does not come at all; but it may safely be stated that the qualities which lead to success in other fields will work the same result in this, and that brains, industry and honesty will reap as large rewards in this as in any other branch of work. Doubtless there are deserving men of long years in the service to whom promotion and success come but in limited degree. Doubtless, also, there are some who only lack opportunity to develop talent; but the fact remains that it is not always easy, and not even always possible, to find just the right man for an important place.

The traffic department is purely commercial, and ordinarily requires but little technical knowledge of railroad operation. It is the selling department in distinction from the manufacturing, and requires the business acumen and general methods of a salesman in any other business.

The successful traffic man must have firmness, but must know when to yield, and must be just to his patrons and his competitors. It is his to develop existing business, and create that which has not existed. He must know a little of almost all mercantile values, mercantile methods and the channels of trade. His place calls for no exact science, but for a large amount of general information, and a vast store of patience and pertinacity. As a rule, he is born rather than made, and generally, I think, it is harder to find just the right man for this place than for any other in the service.

SOME OF THE DUTIES OF THE GENERAL MANAGER

THE General Manager upon most of our larger roads is not what his name implies, since he "manages" the operating department only, and has no jurisdiction over traffic or auditing officers. He is the recognized head of the operating department, including, generally, the mechanical and engineering branches. He may himself be a graduate of either, and is supposed to have at least knowledge enough of both, in addition to his own department, to know whether the work of each is well or ill done.

Editor's Note—This series, of which this paper is the third, began in the Post of January 6. Other articles will follow in early numbers.

By far the larger number of the employees are under his jurisdiction, and, with the exception of the Traffic Manager, he comes more closely in touch with the public than any other official. He is expected to protect the company, yet to be just to the employees and to the public, and, having control of the major part of all payments, is expected, above all else, to study how they may be lessened without prejudice to the interests of the public or the railroad.

The duties of the Auditor, Treasurer, Engineer and Superintendent of Motive Power are sufficiently explained by their titles.

LIBERAL RETURNS FOR FAITHFUL SERVICE

IT IS stating the case moderately to say that the railroad business pays its employees quite as well as any other. Indeed, there are few branches of industry that offer more or larger pecuniary rewards to those who are content to work, or are obliged to work, for fixed salaries. It has an interest which, with most of those who follow it, amounts to a sort of fascination, and few leave it voluntarily. A railroad man is partly born and partly made, but it seems to me that he is mostly born.

I am asked if promotions from clerical ranks to executive positions are not becoming less and less frequent in railway service. My answer is, No. On the contrary, civil service rules are becoming more universal, and favoritism and nepotism are lessening.

Another inquiry of some interest and importance which has been raised in connection with the subject under discussion is stated in about these words: "What would be your advice to the young man who came to you with the question, 'What line of railway service offers the best opportunities for success in the struggle for promotion from a humble position to that of railway President? In other words, what line of service offers, in your opinion, the least resistance as an avenue by which to gain the Presidency of a railroad?'"

My advice would depend largely on the general appearance of the person asking the question. I do not know that there is any "line of least resistance." The rewards for success are about equal in all departments, but some who would succeed in one would fail in others.

A matter too often overlooked by those wishing to enter this field is that of physique. The railroad man must have a robust body in order to withstand the wear and tear and the hard knocks necessary to fight his way up in the railway service to a responsible official position. Unquestionably the railroad business, in all its departments, is more exacting in its requirements than most other pursuits. I would not advise a young man of delicate physique to enter the profession.

E. P. RIPLEY
PRESIDENT ATCHISON, TOPEKA AND SANTA FÉ RAILROAD

THE LIMITATIONS OF THE PRESIDENT'S POWERS

PARTICULARLY of late the impression seems to have gained ground that the present tendency of railroad operation is toward the concentration of greater power and of a large volume of detail in the hands of the President, giving less scope than formerly to subordinate officials. On the contrary, the President is much less a man of detail than formerly, and in a certain sense also much less a man of power. The head of a large concern finds it necessary to make rigid rules which even he may not transgress. He has more power in the sense that his field of action is larger, but the head of a smaller concern can give himself more latitude.

The question of enforcing temperance rules may be dismissed in a few words. The railroads have found it necessary to insist on temperate habits on the part of employees, and will not retain a man known to frequent saloons. Owing to the enforcement of this rule there is probably a higher average of temperate men among railway employees to-day than one or two decades ago.

HOW YOUNG RAILROAD MEN GET AHEAD

IT IS but natural that every young man should be ambitious to win the good will and attention of his superiors, and is, therefore, anxious to know how this end may be specially promoted. On this important point I would say with emphasis that a man who does good work need make no special effort to bring himself into notice, and any such effort is likely to be annoying to his superiors. The heads of departments know what each man is doing, and are better judges of his work than the employee himself. Ambition is good, but it should take the form of intelligent and faithful service, and events in their natural course will do the rest.

Much good advice might be offered on the subject of the personal life of the young railroad man. However, it is sufficient to say that, as a rule, officials gauge the employee by his work in the office, and pay no attention to what he does outside. But if he has been out all night, his appearance in the morning is likely to indicate his dissipation, and if his chief hears that his habits are bad, the effect on the employee's prospects is naturally unfavorable.

I have been asked if railroad men holding responsible positions are not now retired earlier in life than formerly. It seems to me that the tendency is to take care of and furnish light employment for men of advanced years and long employment, so far as this is possible. I do not think men are retired earlier, but it is customary to take on only young men.

THE PROBLEMS OF THE PRESIDENT

PROBABLY almost every reader of this magazine has, at some time or another, wondered what are the most important and vexatious problems with which a railroad President has to deal. This question opens up so vast a field that it is discouraging. The problems that come to the President are all important, because they are of the class which subordinates do not settle. In other words, it is only the pressingly important things that get to him.

The railway business is peculiar in that it has been held to be "quasi public," which means that the President, in addition to being satisfactory to the Board of Directors of the railway company, must so conduct the affairs of the road as to have them also satisfactory to the public, and to the representatives of the public in the various legislative bodies. As all history shows that no man ever did serve all the public to its satisfaction for any length of time, or was appreciated till after he was dead, it will be seen that the position is a difficult one.

It has long been customary to misrepresent the motives as well as the actions of those charged with the management of the railways of this country, and but little has been heard on the other side. I can conscientiously say, however, that a long experience causes me to believe that the moral tone of the railroad profession is quite as high as that of any other, and that portion of the public which deals with railroads most largely would, I believe, testify to the fact that transactions of great magnitude can be, and often are, accepted upon the word of a railroad official which would require a written contract with bond attached if made with others. The portion of the public which has dealings with the roads has unbounded confidence in the officials, while that portion which has not such personal contact, and is influenced by partisan and demagogic abuse, has none. It is this latter portion which makes itself heard and felt, and which at times makes life burdensome to the President and his staff.

To keep earnings up and expenses down, to satisfy the taxing power, the legislative power, the public, the employees and the stockholder summarize, in brief, the perplexities of the railway President's position. It is not possible freely to satisfy these conflicting interests, and the result is daily compromise, and not always on a basis fair to the corporation, or satisfactory to its representative, who assents under fear of worse things.

Saved from the Stage by Miss Powell

Among the prominent singers engaged for Maurice Grau's English grand opera season next fall is Marcella Powell, a young woman who came into notice two years ago as the vocal star of John Philip Sousa's concert company.

They have a musical society in Brooklyn that studies the masters, reveres the memory of Seidl, and knows Wagner by heart. Among the members is a young matron.

"I shall certainly hear Miss Powell sing in grand opera," she said. "You know I was educated for grand opera. I took a course of lessons from a teacher and he said I ought to go on the stage. So I took some more lessons. Well, I had learned a piece from Il Trovatore, full of runs and trills. It reached from there to there"—measuring from the floor to as high as she could reach—"and I thought I sang it beautifully. When Sousa came I went to the concert, and for an encore Miss Powell sang this piece. She sang it, and when she got through I could have cried for mortification. I asked some one who knew Miss Powell how long she had studied.

"'I don't know,' he said; 'five or six years anyway.'

"I gave up my stage ambitions and went into mission work in our church, and it was there I met my husband."

Miss Gonne's True Soldier Friends

Miss Maud Gonne is known as The Irish Joan of Arc. The daughter of a British officer and the possessor of considerable property, she has devoted herself to Irish Nationalism since she reached womanhood's estate.

In the British Army are many brave and faithful Irish regiments, among whom Miss Gonne has troops of warm friends. One of these bade her farewell last autumn prior to his departure to South Africa. Miss Gonne asked him:

"Are you not ashamed to go to fight to put British chains upon another country and have a Dutch Ireland where now there is freedom?"

The soldier smiled and answered: "There's more fun in fighting than there is in freedom, and between the two a true Irishman would sooner have the fighting."

Another recruit answered her with the significant remark: "I've got to go in the ranks anyhow, and the British Government pays the expense down there, but after I get there it will be a different matter."

Senator Cockrell's Introduction to Champ Clark

Senator Cockrell, of Missouri, is one of the Senatorial landmarks at the national capital. Although he has been in public life for a long time he has never thrown away either the habits, clothing or personal bearing of the honest countryside from which he sprang. Once, at a political gathering at Sedalia, the Senator was standing apart from the crowd in one of the hotels. A member of the committee on entertainment saw him and concluded that he was not being properly looked after.

"Would you like to get acquainted with some of the prominent visitors?" the polite committeeman asked.

"I don't care," said the Senator quietly. "Who's that big man over there with the smooth face?"

"Why, that's Champ Clark," said the committeeman; "would you like to meet him?"

"If you please," the Senator returned.

"Mr. Clark," he said, "I want you to know a gentleman who has expressed a desire to know you."

Clark looked at the speaker in astonishment.

"This is the Honorable Champ Clark, of old Pike, one of our most promising Congressmen; Mr. Clark, Mr. ——."

"Cockrell—Senator Cockrell," said the other. The committeeman sought to turn the joke, but it was on him.

Miss Barrymore's Gift of Second Sight

Miss Ethel Barrymore, the beautiful young actress whose professional and social success in England was so marked, a season or two ago, that her engagement was reported to almost every unmarried lord in the peerage of marriageable age, has resumed her place on the stage of this country. She made her appearance in New York recently in a special performance which added largely to her reputation. Shortly after her return from abroad Miss Barrymore was waked late one night at her hotel by a woman reporter of a New York morning newspaper. After the necessary delay in securing an audience the newsgatherer found the actress in her dressing gown, very sleepy and not at all pleased by the call.

"Our office," began the reporter, "has just received a cablegram from London saying——"

"Never mind what it says," interrupted Miss Barrymore sharply, "you may tell your editor, with my compliments, that I am not engaged to any new English lord nor to any old one either. Good-night."

Maurice Barrymore, father of the actress, is fond of telling of a visit he made with his family to the home of a country clergyman in England when Ethel was a very little child. Mr. Barrymore's wife was Georgie Drew, the actress, and the children had heard little else than the slang that stage folk affect.

It was at breakfast, the second morning of the visit, when little Ethel astonished the host with an expression that good man had never heard before, although every stage child in the world knows it from infancy. It was neither improper nor shocking, only it was slang. Mrs. Barrymore looked pained. Then Mr. Barrymore came to the rescue.

"Georgie," he said gravely to his wife, "I thought I asked you not to let the children become so familiar with the grooms. They'll have to give up riding altogether unless you are more careful."

The Western Printer Boy's Success

Chase S. Osborn, the present Railroad Commissioner of Michigan, began as a printer in Indiana. He became a reporter in Milwaukee, and afterward took charge of a Wisconsin paper in which he succeeded handsomely; then he became proprietor of the Sainte Marie News. He was Postmaster of Sainte Marie under President Harrison.

At the banquet of the Michigan Republicans, several years ago, he sat near General Russell A. Alger, who told him that he had to make a speech. He declared that he could not do it, but the General insisted and the presiding officer introduced him, and he arose to his feet. It was his first effort at speech-making, and he says he was nearly scared out of his boots, but he went ahead and spoke naturally and eloquently, so that when he finished the applause continued for some time. He had made the speech of the evening. Since then he has come to the front as one of the Michigan orators, and his name has been suggested for Governor.

A Prominent Scientist's Theory of Old Age

Dr. W. W. Keen, President of the American Medical Association, professor of surgery in the Woman's Medical College, and professor of artistic anatomy in the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, the occupant of the chair of surgery in the Jefferson Medical College, and a corresponding member of the Société de Chirurgie of Paris, is a striking exception to the commonly accepted notion of the accessibility of the great man. Doctor Keen is short, wiry, energetic, and the very personification of life. At a recent banquet held in Philadelphia, one of the speakers alluded to himself and Doctor Keen as the "old men" present, whereupon Doctor Keen, in reply to a toast, vehemently remonstrated about being classed as an old man. He declared that only that man was old through whose arteries the blood pumped slowly. In spite of his many duties and his many offices, Doctor Keen may be approached at any time by any one. Not long ago a certain person who had no especial claim upon his time or attention called to see him and found him out. The next morning's mail brought a most kindly note from Doctor Keen expressing regret that he was not in at the time the call was made, and stating that if the person would return on the following day at a certain time the doctor would spare him an hour.

The Chief Interest of this Year's Conventions

This is one of the few times in the history of the United States when the contests in the Presidential conventions are not for the first honors, but for the Vice-Presidential nominations. The Republicans will renominate Mr. McKinley and the Democrats will renominate Mr. Bryan, but there are doubts in both cases as to who will be the candidates of the second place on the two tickets.

As a rule, people do not care very much about Vice-Presidents. A Vice-President is supposed to be an excellent gentleman who presides soberly over the United States Senate and who holds himself in readiness to take up the reins of government should the President die. The salary of the place is rather insignificant for such a position, being only $8000 a year, and in more than one instance the Vice-Presidential candidate has been selected because of his ability to contribute to the expense of the campaign, and to maintain a social establishment in Washington—something that requires increasing expenditures every year.

Vice-Presidents Who Became Presidents

The importance of a good Vice-President, however, has been notably illustrated in American history. Four times have they become Presidents, and in each case there have been departures from the policy of the regularly elected President, and many heartburnings and outbursts of passion.

When President William Henry Harrison died suddenly on April 4, 1841, after only thirty days in office, John Tyler became President. His nomination had been a political expedient to strengthen the ticket. He was really a Calhoun Democrat, while, of course, Harrison was a Whig. The consequences were perfectly natural. Tyler's Administration became a disturbance of existing policies. The famous bank bill, drawn in accordance with his own suggestion and passed by Congress, was coolly vetoed by him, and the whole Cabinet, except Daniel Webster, who was Secretary of State, at once resigned. He disregarded the pledges of the platform upon which he had been elected, and altogether his Presidential record was one of vacillations and small results.

General Zachary Taylor, who was elected in 1848, died sixteen months after he had entered upon the duties of the Presidency, and the place was filled by Millard Fillmore, the Vice-President. This was another instance of conflict in policies and of troubles that followed logically in their wake.

The Case of President Andrew Johnson

But of all the cases that of Andrew Johnson illustrates most forcibly the powers and dangers of the Vice-President. When Lincoln was assassinated on April 14, 1865, Johnson became President of the United States, and during the ensuing years gave the country more trouble than any man who ever occupied the Presidential chair. At this distance we can scarcely appreciate the passion, prejudice and vehemence of those dark times. Indeed, they almost threw the nation off its balance.

Although a Southerner, Johnson had none of the tenderness or sympathy of Lincoln. He had been nominated for politics pure and simple, and when he became President he felt his power. The very day after the assassination he said to a delegation which waited on him that the war "must not be excused as an unsuccessful rebellion to be overlooked and forgiven," and he took an attitude toward the South which would have been absolutely impossible to Abraham Lincoln.

It is evident now that the impeachment of Johnson arose more from the irritations which his personality and policy had engendered than from any specific thing he did.

The assassination of Garfield is recent history. This ticket was purely a case of compromise, and like most compromises it worked unfortunately. Mr. Arthur was out of consonance with General Garfield's ideas, and the consequence was a new Cabinet and a departure from the policy of the Administration which the people had elected.

While there are at present a living President and two living ex-Presidents, there are only two former Vice-Presidents who are alive—Mr. Stevenson, of Illinois, and Mr. Morton, of New York. Of the former candidates on the two tickets there are Mr. Reid, of New York, and Mr. Sewall, of Maine.

Names Mentioned for the Second Place

The uncertainties that attend Presidential nominations seem to multiply in the Vice-Presidency. In many instances the men are nominated against their own desires and are induced to accept. In one case, which has been pointed out in these columns, the man who was nominated would have become Vice-President, but in a moment of disappointment he declined to take second place on the ticket.

This year the situation is curiously unsettled. In a general way it is thought that McKinley's running mate will be taken from New York. Governor Roosevelt was first mentioned, but he vigorously declined. Mr. Root, the Secretary of War, was next, and he, too, declared he was not a candidate. Then came Mr. Cornelius Bliss, who promptly retired. All this time the name of Mr. Timothy L. Woodruff, who has twice been elected Lieutenant-Governor of New York, was being mentioned, and he strengthened the impression by a campaigning tour in the West in which he proclaimed the Administration policy with eloquence and enthusiasm. Mr. Woodruff is about forty and is a millionaire. There are many possibilities among the Democrats, including Judge Henry Clay Caldwell, of Arkansas, who is popular with the working classes because of his anti-trust and railroad decisions; George Fred Williams, of Boston, who has upheld the silver cause in New England; Amos J. Cummings and William Sulzer, both members of Congress from New York; John R. McLean, recently the Democratic candidate for Governor of Ohio, and United States Senator Thomas B. Turley, of Tennessee, whose speech opposing the admission of Quay recently brought him into national prominence.

The Presidential Conventions of 1900

As usual, the time of meeting of the various conventions varies considerably. The Populists will assemble at Sioux Falls, South Dakota, on May 9, and on the same date the other Populist party, known as the Middle-of-the-Road-Men, will hold a convention in Cincinnati.

On June 19 the Republicans will meet in Philadelphia, the city which claims to be the home of the Republican party, where forty-four years ago, at the first Republican Convention, the name of Abraham Lincoln was first mentioned as a candidate for the Presidency. Philadelphia gives to the Republican Campaign Committee the sum of $100,000 and provides entertainment on a large scale. The hall that will be used is the auditorium of the recent National Export Exposition, a magnificent hall that will accommodate many thousands of people.

The Democrats will meet at Kansas City on July 4. There was a warm contest between Kansas City and Milwaukee for the honor of this convention. Kansas City won by superior inducements in the way of money and hospitality. The cash was a certified check for $50,000. The delegates will be entertained free and the headquarters will be furnished gratuitously, and there will be no rent for the hall, a great auditorium recently constructed, of admirable acoustic properties, and capable of seating 20,000 people.

The Succession to the Presidency

Fifteen years ago the uncertainty about the Presidential succession was forever settled by a new law which is Chapter Four of the Acts of the Forty-ninth Congress, first session. Before that time the succession passed from the Vice-President to the President pro tempore of the Senate.

The new law fixed the succession as follows: Vice-President, Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of War, Attorney-General, Postmaster-General, Secretary of the Navy and Secretary of the Interior. It does not include the Secretary of Agriculture, for his office was created after the passage of the Act. However, it is not likely that he would ever be needed.

The Slave of the Brick

A THING that vexes much the high-class Anglo-Saxon soul is the earthly instinct prompting the German to fix a restaurant at the goal of every excursion. On mountain summit, in fairy glen, on lonely pass, by waterfall or winding stream, stands ever the busy Wirtschaft. How can one rhapsodize over a view when surrounded by beer-stained tables? How lose one's self in historical reverie amid the odor of roast veal and spinach?

One day, on elevating thoughts intent, we climbed through tangled woods.

"And at the top," said Harris bitterly, as we paused to breathe a space and pull our belts a hole tighter, "there will be a gaudy restaurant, where people will be guzzling beefsteaks and plum tarts, and drinking white wine."

"Do you really think so?" said George.

"Sure to be," answered Harris; "you know their way. Not one grove will they consent to dedicate to solitude and contemplation. Not one height will they leave to the lover of Nature unpolluted by the gross and the material."

"I calculate," I remarked, "that we shall be there a little before one o'clock, provided we don't dawdle."

"The 'Mittagstisch' will be just ready," groaned Harris, "with possibly some of those little blue trout they catch about here. In Germany one never seems able to get away from food and drink. It is maddening!"

We pushed on, and in the beauty of the walk forgot our indignation. My estimate proved to be correct. At quarter to one, said Harris, who was leading:

"Here we are; I can see the summit."

"Any sign of that restaurant?" asked George.

"I don't notice it," replied Harris, "but it's there, you may be sure; confound it!"

Five minutes later we stood upon the top. We looked north, south, east and west; then we looked at one another.

"Grand view, isn't it?" exclaimed Harris.

"Magnificent!" I agreed.

"Superb!" remarked George.

"They have had the good sense for once," added Harris, "to put that restaurant out of sight."

"They do seem to have hidden it," said George.

"One doesn't mind the thing so much when it is not forced under one's nose," said Harris.

"Of course, in its place," I observed, "a restaurant is right enough."

"I should like to know where they have put it," said George.

"Suppose we look for it," said Harris, with inspiration.

It seemed a good suggestion. I felt curious myself. We agreed to explore in different directions, returning to the summit to report progress. In half an hour we stood together once again. There was no need for words. The face of one and all of us announced plainly that at last we had discovered a recess of German nature untarnished by the sordid suggestion of food or drink.

"I should never have believed it possible," said Harris; "would you?"

"I should say," I replied, "that this is the only square quarter of a mile in the entire Fatherland unprovided with one."

"And we three strangers have struck it," said George, "without an effort."

"True," I observed; "by pure good fortune we are now enabled to feast our finer senses undisturbed by appeal to our lower nature. Observe the light upon those distant peaks; is it not ravishing?"

"Talking of Nature," said George, "which should you say was the nearest way down?"

"The road to the left," I replied, after consulting the guide-book, "takes us to Sonnensteig—where, by the by, I observe the Golden Adler is well spoken of—in about two hours. The road to the right, though somewhat longer, commands more extensive prospects."

"One prospect," observed Harris, "is very much like another prospect; don't you think so?"

"Personally," said George, "I am going by the left-hand road." And Harris and I went after him.

But we were not to get down so soon as we had anticipated. Storms come quickly in these regions, and before we had walked for quarter of an hour it became a question of seeking shelter or living for the rest of the day in soaked clothes. We decided on the former alternative, and selected a tree that under ordinary circumstances should have been ample protection. But a Black Forest thunderstorm is not an ordinary circumstance. We consoled ourselves at first by telling each other that at such rate it could not last long. Next, we endeavored to comfort ourselves with the reflection that if it did we should soon be too wet to fear getting wetter.

"As it has turned out," said Harris, "I should have been almost glad if there had been a restaurant up here."

"I see no advantage in being both wet and hungry," said George. "I shall give it another five minutes, then I am going on."

"These mountain solitudes," I remarked, "are very attractive in fine weather. On a rainy day, especially if you happen to be past the age when——"

At this point there hailed us a voice, proceeding from a stout gentleman who stood some fifty feet away from us, under a big umbrella.

"Won't you come inside?" asked the stout gentleman.

"Inside where?" I called back. I thought at first he was one of those fools that will try to be funny when there is nothing to be funny about.

"Inside the restaurant," he answered.

We left our shelter and made for him. We wished for further information about this thing.

"I did call to you from the window," said the stout gentleman, as we drew near to him, "but I suppose you did not hear me. This storm may last for another hour; you will get so wet." He was a kindly old gentleman; he seemed quite anxious about us.

I said: "It was very kind of you to come out. We are not lunatics. We have not been standing under that tree for the last half hour knowing all the time there was a restaurant within twenty yards of us. We had no idea we were anywhere near a restaurant."

"I thought maybe you hadn't," said the old gentleman, "that is why I came out."

It appeared that all the people in the inn had been watching us from the windows also, wondering why we stood there looking miserable. If it had not been for this nice old gentleman the fools would have stood watching us, I suppose, for the rest of the afternoon. The landlord excused himself by saying he thought we looked English. It is no figure of speech: on the Continent they do sincerely believe that every Englishman is mad. They are as convinced of it as is every English peasant that Frenchmen live on frogs. Even when one makes a direct personal effort to disabuse them of the impression one is not always successful.

It was a comfortable little restaurant, where they cooked well, while the Tischwein was really most passable. We stopped there for a couple of hours, and dried ourselves, and fed ourselves, and talked about the view; and, just before we left, an incident occurred that shows how much more stirring in this world are the influences of evil as compared with those of good.

A traveler entered. He seemed a careworn man. He carried a brick in his hand, tied to a piece of rope. He entered nervously and hurriedly; closed the door carefully behind him; saw to it that it was fastened; peered out of the window long and earnestly; and then, with a sigh of relief, laid his brick upon the bench beside him and called for food and drink.

There was something mysterious about the whole affair. One wondered what he was going to do with the brick; why he had closed the door so carefully; why he had looked so anxiously from the window. But his aspect was too wretched to invite conversation, and we forebore, therefore, to ask him questions. As he ate and drank he grew more cheerful; sighed less often. Later, he stretched his legs, lit an evil-smelling cigar, and puffed in calm contentment.

Then it happened. It happened too suddenly for any detailed conception of the thing to be possible. I recollect a Fräulein entering the room from the kitchen with a pan in her hand. I saw her cross to the outer door. The next moment the whole room was in an uproar. One was reminded of those pantomime transformation scenes where from among floating clouds, slow music, waving flowers and reclining fairies one is suddenly transported into the midst of shouting policemen tumbling over yelling babies, swells fighting pantaloons, sausages and harlequins, buttered slides, and clowns. As the Fräulein of the pan touched the door it flew open as though all the spirits of sin had been pressed against it, waiting. Two pigs and a chicken rushed into the room; a cat that had been sleeping on a beer barrel spluttered into fiery life. The Fräulein threw her pan into the air and lay down on the floor. The gentleman with the brick sprang to his feet, upsetting the table before him, with everything upon it.

One looked to see the cause of this disaster; one discovered it at once in the person of a mongrel terrier with pointed ears and a squirrel's tail. The landlord rushed out from another door, and attempted to kick him out of the room. Instead, he kicked one of the pigs, the fatter of the two. It was a vigorous, well-planted kick, and the pig got the whole of it: none of it was wasted. One felt sorry for the poor animal, but no amount of sorrow any one else might feel for him could compare with the sorrow he felt for himself. He stopped running about. He sat down in the middle of the room and appealed to the solar system generally to observe this unjust thing that had come upon him. They must have heard his complaint in the valleys round about and have wondered what upheaval of Nature was taking place among the hills.

As for the hen, it scuttled, screaming, every way at once. It was a marvelous bird; it seemed to be able to run up a straight wall quite easily; and it and the cat between them fetched down mostly everything that was not already on the floor. In less than forty seconds there were nine people in that room, all trying to kick one dog. Possibly, now and again, one or another may have succeeded, for occasionally the dog would stop barking in order to howl. But it did not discourage him. Everything has to be paid for, he evidently argued, even a pig and chicken hunt; and, on the whole, the game was worth it.

Besides, he had the satisfaction of observing that for every kick he received most other living things in the room got two. As for the unfortunate pig—the stationary one, the one that still sat lamenting in the centre of the room—he must have averaged a steady four. Trying to kick this dog was like playing football with a ball that was never there—not when you went to kick it, but after you had started to kick it, and had gone too far to stop yourself, so that the kick had to go on in any case, your only hope being that your foot would find something or another solid to stop it, and so save you from sitting down on the floor, noisily and completely. When any one did kick the dog it was by pure accident, when they were not expecting to kick him, and, generally speaking, this took them so unawares that after kicking him they fell over him. And everybody, every half minute, would be certain to fall over the pig—the sitting pig, the one incapable of getting out of anybody's way.

How long the scrimmage might have lasted it is impossible to say. It was ended by the judgment of George. For a while he had been seeking to catch, not the dog, but the remaining pig, the one still capable of activity. Cornering it at last, he persuaded it to cease running round the room and, instead, to take a spin outside. It shot through the door with one long wail.

We always desire the thing we have not. One pig, a chicken, nine people and a cat were as nothing in that dog's opinion, compared with the quarry that was disappearing. Unwisely, he darted after it, and George closed the door upon him and shot the bolt.

Then the landlord stood up and surveyed all the things that were lying on the floor.

"That's a playful dog of yours," said he to the man who had come in with the brick.

"He is not my dog," replied the man sullenly.

"Whose dog is it, then?" said the landlord.

"I don't know whose dog it is," answered the man.

"That won't do for me, you know," said the landlord, picking up a picture of the German Emperor and wiping beer from it with his sleeve.

"I know it won't," replied the man; "I never expected it would. I'm tired of telling people it isn't my dog. None of them believe me."

"What do you want to go about with him for if he's not your dog?" said the landlord. "What's the attraction about him?"

"I don't go about with him," replied the man; "he goes about with me. He picked me up this morning at ten o'clock and he won't leave me. I thought I had got rid of him when I came in here. I left him busy killing a duck more than a quarter of an hour away. I'll have to pay for that, I expect, on my way back."

"Have you tried throwing stones at him?" asked Harris.

"Have I tried throwing stones at him!" replied the man contemptuously. "I've been throwing stones at him till my arm aches with throwing stones; and he thinks it's a game, and brings them back to me. I've been carrying this beastly brick about with me for over an hour in the hope of being able to drown him, but he never comes near enough for me to get hold of him. He just sits six inches out of my reach with his mouth open and looks at me."

"It's the funniest story I've heard for a long while," said the landlord.

"Glad it amuses somebody," said the man.

We left him helping the landlord to pick up the broken things, and went our way. A dozen yards outside the door the faithful animal was waiting for his friend. He looked tired, but contented. He was evidently a dog of strange and sudden fancies, and we feared for the moment lest he might take a liking to us. But he let us pass with indifference. His loyalty to this unresponsive man was touching; and we made no attempt to undermine it.

Having completed to our satisfaction the Black Forest, we journeyed on our wheels to Münster, whence we started a short exploration of the Vosges range, where, according to the present German Emperor, humanity stops.

The fruiterer and greengrocer is a person unknown in the Vosges. Most things of that kind grow wild, and are to be had for the picking. It is difficult to keep to any program when walking through the Vosges, the temptation on a hot day to stop and eat fruit generally being too strong for resistance. Raspberries, the most delicious I have ever tasted, wild strawberries, currants and gooseberries grow upon the hillsides as blackberries by English lanes. The Vosges small boy is not called upon to rob an orchard; he can make himself ill without sin. Orchards exist in the Vosges Mountains in plenty; but to trespass into one for the purpose of stealing fruit would be as foolish as for a fish to try and get into a swimming bath without paying. Still, of course, mistakes do occur.

For a while he had been seeking to catch, not the dog, but the remaining pig

One afternoon in the course of a climb we emerged upon a plateau where we lingered perhaps too long, eating more fruit than may have been good for us; it was so plentiful around us, so varied. We commenced with a few late strawberries, and from those we passed to raspberries. Then Harris found a green gage tree with some early fruit upon it, just perfect.

"This is about the best thing we have struck," said George; "we had better make the most of this." Which was good advice, on the face of it.

"It is a pity," said Harris, "that the pears are still so hard."

He grieved about this for a while, but later I came across some remarkably fine yellow plums, and these consoled him somewhat.

"I suppose we are still a bit too far north for pineapples," said George. "I feel I could just enjoy a fresh pineapple. This commonplace fruit palls upon one after a while."

"Too much bush fruit and not enough tree is the fault I find," said Harris. "Myself, I should have liked a few more green gages."

"Here is a man coming up the hill," I observed, "who looks like a native. Maybe he will know where we can find some more green gages."

"He walks well for an old chap," remarked Harris.

He certainly was climbing the hill at a remarkable pace. Also, so far as we were able to judge at that distance, he appeared to be in a remarkably cheerful mood, singing and shouting at the top of his voice and waving his arms.

"What a merry old soul it is," said Harris; "it does one good to watch him. But why does he carry his stick over his shoulder? Why doesn't he use it to help him up the hill?"

"Do you know, I don't think it is a stick," said George.

"What can it be then?" asked Harris.

"Well, it looks to me," said George, "more like a gun."

"You don't think we can have made a mistake?" suggested Harris. "You don't think this can be anything in the nature of a private orchard?"

I said: "Do you remember the sad thing that happened in the South of France some two years ago? A soldier picked some cherries as he passed a house, and the French peasant to whom the cherries belonged came out and without a word of warning shot him dead."

"But surely you are not allowed to shoot a man dead for picking fruit, even in France?" said George.

"Of course not," I answered. "It was quite illegal. The only excuse offered by his counsel was that he was of a highly excitable disposition, and especially keen about those particular cherries."

"I recollect something about the case," said Harris, "now you mention it. I believe the district in which it happened—the 'Commune,' as I think it is called—had to pay heavy compensation to the relatives of the deceased soldier, which was only fair."

George said: "I am tired of this place. Besides, it's getting late."

Harris said: "If he goes at that rate he will fall and hurt himself. Besides, I don't believe he knows the way."

I felt lonesome up there all by myself, with nobody to speak to. Besides, not since I was a boy, I reflected, had I enjoyed a run down a really steep hill. I thought I would see if I could revive the sensation. It is a jerky exercise, but good, I should say, for the liver.

We slept that night at Barr, a pleasant little town, on the way to St. Ottilienberg, an interesting old inn among the mountains, where you are waited upon by real nuns and your bill made out by a priest. Just before supper a tourist entered. He looked English, but spoke a language the like of which I had never heard before. Yet it was an elegant and fine-sounding language. The landlord stared at him blankly; the landlady shook her head. He sighed, and tried another, which somehow recalled to me forgotten memories, though at the time I could not fix it. But again nobody understood him.

"This is damnable," he said aloud to himself.

"Ah, you are English," exclaimed the landlord.

"And Monsieur looks tired," added the kindly little landlady; "Monsieur will have supper."

They both spoke English excellently, nearly as well as they spoke French and German, and they bustled about and made him comfortable. At supper he sat next to me, and I talked to him.

"Tell me," I said—I was curious on the subject—"what language was it you spoke when you first came in?"

"German," he explained. "You did not understand it?"

"It must have been my fault," I answered; "my knowledge is limited. One picks up a little here and there as one goes about, but of course that is a different thing."

"But they did not understand it," he replied, "the landlord and his wife; and it is their own language."

"I do not think so," I said. "The children hereabout speak German, it is true, and our landlord and landlady know German to a certain point. But throughout Alsace and Lorraine the old people still talk French."

"And I spoke to them in French also," he added, "and they understood that no better."

"It is certainly very curious," I agreed.

"It is more than curious," he replied; "in my case it is incomprehensible. I possess a diploma for modern languages. I won my scholarship purely on the strength of my French and German. The purity of my pronunciation was considered at my college to be quite remarkable. Can you explain it?"

"I think I can," I replied. "Your pronunciation is too faultless. You remember what the Scotsman said when for the first time in his life he tasted real whiskey: 'It may be puir, but I canna drink it'; so it is with your German. It strikes one less as a language than as an exhibition. If I might offer advice, I should say: mispronounce as much as possible, and throw in as many mistakes as you can."

It is the same everywhere. Each country keeps a special pronunciation exclusively for the use of foreigners; a pronunciation they never dream of using themselves, that they cannot understand when it is used.

Putting aside the sufferings of the early martyrs, few men, I suppose, have gone through more than I myself went through in trying to attain the correct pronunciation of the German word for "church"—"kirche." Long before I had done with it I had determined never to go to church in Germany rather than be bothered with it.

"No, no," my teacher would explain—he was a painstaking gentleman—"you say it as if it were spelled k-i-r-c-h-k-e. There is no k. It is——" And he would illustrate to me again, for the twentieth time that morning.

"You say it from your throat," he would explain. "I want you to say it from down here," and with a fat forefinger he would indicate the region from where I was to start. After painful efforts resulting in sounds suggestive of anything rather than a place of worship, I would excuse myself.

"I really fear it is impossible," I would say. "You see, for years I have always talked with my mouth, as it were; I never knew a man could talk with his stomach. I doubt if it is not too late now for me to learn."

The Growing Appreciation of American Art

RECENT sales of pictures in New York—notably the Evans and Clarke collections—have awakened many of the American people to the fact that America has an art. There has been a reluctance to recognize even the best of our painters, and men for whose work connoisseurs now strive against one another at the auctions were but a few years ago compelled to sell important canvases for the price of "pot boilers," and were sometimes in the clutch of absolute poverty. It is a common fate. While they lived, the "men of '30" in France were misunderstood, and were poor, almost to their last days, whereas fortunes are now paid for quite ordinary examples of Millet, Troyon, Diaz, Dupré and Rousseau. Even gentle old "Papa" Corot used to complain that he could not give his pictures away, unless framed.

With our American painters the advance of appreciation, as indicated by the advance in values of their works, has been more rapid; but prices have been commonly stimulated by the death of an artist, and in some instances they have risen to purely fanciful figures. Inness, fortunately, reached almost the height of his renown while he still lived, and his impetuous, light-filled landscapes came to be as well known and as highly valued abroad as they were in his own country. Winslow Homer, who paints the sea with epic strength, and whose figures have Homeric qualities of largeness, lives honored and prosperous. Tryon, Walker, Thayer, Bogert, Dessar, La Farge, Minor and Ochtman have come into celebrity and a measure of its reward while in their prime. But they are exceptions. Homer Martin, who died recently, never received more than one hundred and fifty dollars for a canvas, it is said, and had difficulty in selling his pictures at any price. At the Evans sale his pictures sold for thousands of dollars. The late A. H. Wyant was moderately successful, but he could not have dreamed of the vogue his work was to enjoy. Not long ago a picture of his, simple and not quite finished, was sold for about seventy-five dollars by a fellow-artist, who owned it. It disappeared from view for a time, but at the Evans sale it brought over $2500.

The art of our country has passed its tentative stage, and is secure. If it has not crystallized into a school, so much the better; for this means a wider liberty of manner and greater diversity and interest. Our Hudson River painters of forty years ago were the only artists who were sufficiently alike in their style and aims to class as a school: Cole, Casilear, Kensett, Church, Durand, Hubbard and their confrères. Their successors paint more freely, with more light, more color, more grace and an airier fancy. They have ceased to copy Düsseldorf, with its mannered subject, hard detail and juiceless color, and have studied in the greater schools of Paris, Munich, and, greatest of all, of Nature. In subject and manner the art of this land is catholic. It is dignified and serious in its best exemplars, and both in expression and workmanship has made a wondrous advance within twenty years. The technical and self-conscious have given place to the poetic. There is a note of healthy optimism in American art that we miss in recent pictures from the Old World.

In time our artists will agree as to the wisdom of painting native themes more generally. The French peasant, with his blue blouse and wooden shoes, has become a trifle wearisome, and we are disposed with a warmer affection toward our own rustics, for they can be quite as picturesque and are commonly less sordid. Our landscape has a greater range in vegetation, color, form and atmosphere than all Europe affords, and the sea rolls as grandly against the rocks of Maine as against the cliffs of France. Let the Germans and Spaniards paint their own countries and their own people, for, be sure, they will do it better than we, and let the beauty and greatness of our land, the poetry of our legends, the virtues of our home life and the triumphs of our history find place in the art of our people. He who fitly interprets these will receive the acclaim of the American public, for art is not for the few. A vital art is the concern, the solace, of the whole people—the expression of their best ideals.

—CHARLES M. SKINNER.

Man always proclaims woman's superiority, but seldom admits it.

One of the Seven Deadly Sins

LAZY people will hail with peculiar satisfaction certain joyful tidings from Paris. One of the leading journals of that great city has completed the study of laziness from a scientific standpoint, and the Medical Review summarizes the results as follows: "The conclusions reached are that it is essentially a mild chronic neurasthenic state which, like most neuroses of this character, is largely hereditary. It is consolingly stated that lazy persons are almost always neuropaths; hence they are not responsible for their unfortunate condition. This places laziness and inactivity along with inebriety, kleptomania and various other perversions, as real diseases of the nervous system, and not simply infirmities of will." In other words, the blame is placed on the ancestors, who, being dead, cannot sue for slander.

Of course, when a disease is discovered a remedy must be found, and hence the next step of investigation is to furnish an antitoxin that will rid humanity of this calamity. There can be no question that a lazy person is the most deplorable and the most unutterable nuisance on earth. We can have a certain respect for a rascal, but a lazy individual arouses in the healthy mind only contempt and repugnance. If by some happy circumstances we might cure or kill all lazy people, this old earth with all its sins would immediately be brought several millions of miles nearer Paradise. Possibly the millennium might come at once.

If laziness is a disease it is the most prevalent ailment of the ages. Ordinary contagions are nothing in comparison with it. Bubonic plagues and cholera epidemics are to it as germs to elephants. All the ills of the frame compounded together cannot equal it. Years ago Burton wrote: "Idleness is the bane of body and mind, the nurse of naughtiness, the chief author of all mischief, one of the seven deadly sins, the cushion upon which the devil chiefly reposes, and a great cause not only of melancholy, but of many other diseases." Cicero looked upon indolence as a sort of suicide. Franklin compared sloth to rust that consumes faster than labor wears. The testimony of other good men in every age and clime has been that laziness is the worst foe to everything that is worthy and useful in life.

The chief mischief of the new discovery is that it will encourage the lazy people in their worthlessness. When they lie around the house while others not so strong as they do the work, they will place the responsibility upon the disease and not upon their own incompetence. Like the cowards they are, they will shirk and will seek any excuse. And the trouble will be that even if the right serum is found they will not want to take it. They do not care to be cured. They do not want to work. They simply desire to live off of other people, and in the final analysis it may yet be found that laziness is a great deal more than a disease—it is a crime.

Just think how much antitoxin it would take to treat all the lazy patients in the world! A good-sized ocean of it might do for a beginning, and after that—but lazy people simply do not want to be cured, and what's the use?

It is true the doctors may do something, but they will never make a better diagnosis than Benjamin Franklin did more than one hundred years ago when he wrote: "It would be thought a hard government that should tax its people one-tenth part of their time, to be employed in its service; but idleness taxes many of us much more; sloth, by bringing on diseases, absolutely shortens life. Sloth, like rust, consumes faster than labor wears, while the used key is always bright. Dost thou love life? Then do not squander time, for that is the stuff life is made of. How much more than is necessary do we spend in sleep, forgetting that the sleeping fox catches no poultry, and there will be sleeping enough in the grave!"

If lazy people only did all their sleeping in the grave it might be all right, but so long as they are on earth it makes a difference. Possibly the doctors will go on until they discover the necessity of hospitals for the scientific treatment of laziness. Then if the money is forthcoming, look out for the biggest building boom the world ever saw!

—LYNN ROBY MEEKINS.

That opportunities, like marriages, are made in Heaven, and dealt out one to each man, is a fallacy as old as mythology.

The Business and Art of Living

"HIS own eye stands in his light," said old John Earle nearly four hundred years ago. Was he looking forward? Montaigne, who always set frankness before diplomacy, and yet was a most wary and wily man, said, "My business and my art is to live." Most of us could say the same thing, and add to it that day by day the difficulty of our business and our art grows more and more serious.

It is a familiar remark, heard on all sides, that happy marriage is practically prohibited to the poor and ambitious young men of our country, by reason of the tremendous competition in all the fields of labor, the consequent uncertainty of employment, and the inadequacy of wages to the increased demands of a happy domestic life. This may be true, if we grant that the increased demands are necessary, and if it can be shown that the certainty of employment and the rewards of labor have actually decreased. But if we go back to pioneer days, and carefully note conditions then, we shall be able to trace the general history of the "art and business" of living down, through all its changes, to the present moment, with a primitive criterion for our measure of difficulties.

When a young man who got married had to build a cabin with his own hands, clear a little farm in the wilderness, and begin matrimonial bliss sandwiched between the chances of starvation or the tooth and claw of a wild beast, and having himself and his bride scalped by savages, there surely were not many advantages that he could count in his favor which would be considered valuable by the poorest youth of our day. His business and art was to live in spite of hardships too enormous for pleasant consideration in the light of electric lamps. He got pleasure out of conditions so crude, meagre and sapless that we cannot find them even romantic, while we are thundering along by steam at the rate of sixty miles an hour. We do not relish comparison with our grandfathers and grandmothers. What have those old fogies, with their flintlock guns and home-made spinning-wheels, to do with us?

It doubtless is true that every tub must keep itself from falling to staves if it would hold water—each generation must see to its own business and art of life; but there are some changeless and eternal canons of conduct looking toward genuine human happiness. One of them is mutual self-sacrifice for matrimony's sake. Love in a cottage may be out of date; but it is not abolished. No reasonably intelligent and shifty young man need nowadays live in a log cabin daubed with clay during his honeymoon; but the trouble in his path is that he cannot have a private palace car and a steam yacht in which to make a wedding tour.

A grizzly and finely preserved octogenarian told the other day, in a pleasantly reminiscent and garrulous mood, how he contracted to split rails for the minister who married him.

"I was nineteen when I took a wife," he said, "and my two hands were my capital, my only source of income. So I was glad to agree to split three hundred rails to pay the preacher for performing the marriage ceremony. The fun of it was that I finished the rail job in one day, when a fair day's work would have been two hundred rails. Seeing how easy had been the performance of my contract, the good parson declared that I had cheated him, and the upshot was that I had to satisfy him by splitting a hundred more rails than the agreement called for!" Young men of our time would consider long before beginning the business and art of life under such conditions. When asked what wages he received during the first year of his married life the old man said: "Oh, I was an extra-good worker; I got fifteen dollars a month!"

It may be, after all, that we have a much easier life, and a far better prospect, than had any generation of men and women in all the past; but have we the optimism and the courage?

Our "business and art is to live"; but we want royal business and kingly art. Our own eyes stand in our light.

Facing Both Ways on the War

I MET a friend the other day and asked him what he thought of the Boer war.

"Well, it's a hard question to answer offhand. My ancestors on both sides were English who came over in the Mayflower, and that would naturally make me sympathize with the English, for blood is thicker than water. But on the other hand, my great-grandfather gave his life in the Revolution fighting for liberty, and so I naturally want to sympathize with a people who are fighting for their home; but on the other hand, the Boers are frightfully cruel and they keep slaves, and as my father died on the Union side in the Civil War, I can't exactly side with people of that sort; yet, on the other hand, when I think that the British are probably in this fight for what they can get out of it, that is why I naturally want to see the Boers triumph. On the other hand, if the Boers win it will set the clock of civilization standstill in South Africa for two hundred years, of course, on that account, the English ought to win. But on the other hand, if success goes to the best fighters, why, so far, the plucky Boers have deserved it. But on the other hand, when you consider that the Boers are at home and have all their reserve force close at hand, while the English are thousands of miles away from home, and are fighting under adverse conditions, I have a natural feeling of sympathy for what you might call the under dog, and I would like them to gain the victory. So you see I am what you might call a liquid neutral, with sympathies running to both sides."

Americans in Paris

LAST year—or, as the German Emperor would say, last century—shares of the Exposition of 1900 were sold throughout France. Each share was worth twenty francs, and carried with it by way of premium twenty tickets of admission to the Exposition. In all, 3,250,000 shares were sold, calling for 65,000,000 tickets. The distribution began early in January, and will continue during the Exposition. The tickets are very artistic. They are printed on pale blue paper, light but strong. On the obverse is a head of Minerva, and a view of the new Alexandra III bridge, and the avenue leading to the Art Palace. On the reverse is the head of the beautiful woman that figures on the new French coinage, and the date 1900. The mere weight of this first issue of shareholders' tickets is 64,000 pounds.

The ordinary tickets, which will be sold at the various gates of the Exposition, are similar in design, and differ only in color. By day the entrance fee is one franc—or twenty cents—and by night twice that amount. And this, it should be borne in mind, admits one to every part of the grounds. You may, if you wish, enter at nine o'clock in the morning and remain until midnight, all for that one insignificant franc; you may cross from one side of the river to the other, and may wander where you please. There are, to be sure, certain attractions on the Exposition grounds that charge a second admission—theatres, concerts, panoramas, catch-penny shows of this sort and that—but, as far as seeing the Exposition itself is concerned, one need spend only that twenty cents. And an economy so delightful as this is should make us all rich before the six months' revelry is over.

THE NARROW ESCAPE OF THE CLAY HORSES

RUE BOILEAU; a large studio—large enough to wheel a coach-and-six in; a glass roof and a glass north wall through which the winter wanders in at will; in the centre of the studio a huge plaster chariot; near by, mounted on their scaffoldings, four ramping plaster horses—five times larger than life. Two French stoves of the biggest sort—and they are not very big—are blazing their best, while a heart-broken boy (think, then, coal is sixteen dollars the ton here!) is shoveling in unlimited coal. Still it is cold—freezing cold. The plaster hide of the ramping horses is crinkling into all kinds of queer patterns. And it is midnight.

Even as the bells of Notre Dame of Auteuil tell the hour the door opens, and a bearded sculptor and his assistants come rushing in with armfuls of blankets and quilts, overcoats and furs, and they wrap up the ramping horses as though they were croupy babies. All the while the chariot is freezing on its wheels. The sculptor sees a crack running up its carved front. He dashes back to his house, reappears with the drawing-room rugs and the baby's pelisse. He takes off his coat and wraps it around the chilled tail of a rearing charger. Always the little French stoves are blazing away and the heart-broken boy shovels in coal. Out of doors it grows colder and all the cold night air sifts into the glass-roofed studio.

It was one o'clock—by the bell of Notre Dame—when the man who writes these true words was startled out of his bed by a mighty clanging at his door-bell. He opened: "A note from Monsieur Proctor, sir—it's a matter of life and death." And the man who writes these true words read:

> "For Heaven's sake send me all your blankets and coats and rugs and furs—the horses are freezing to death.
> "PROCTOR."

And the man who writes these true words sent them, and for the rest of the night he slept on the kitchen stove and dreamed fitfully of art. Rome was saved by geese; I like to think that I saved the quadriga—chariot, horses and all—that is to look riverward from the United States building during the Exposition of 1900.

A TURN IN THE WHEEL OF FORTUNE

A DECADE or two ago it was the pretty fashion for adventurous young people who had just been married to take walking tours along the white roads of France or through the green world of Northern Italy. The bicycle killed all that. Now, in turn, the automobile has superseded the wheel.

Mr. W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr., has been telling friends in Paris about the joyous jaunt that he and his bride, who was Miss Virginia Fair, took in the south of France on their tenf-tenf. They started from Nice and journeyed to Biarritz and back again. It was a three weeks' trip, for they traveled as pleased them best. Here they would stop at a wayside inn, table the automobile, and spend a day or two living the life of the peasants, and then they would journey on; now and then their machine, with the inevitable contrariety of inanimate things, would break down. Three times this happened. Then, if Mr. Vanderbilt could not tinker it up himself, the young couple would push the machine on to the next town. All these adventures, and many others, should be pleasant to remember in the days when they "go no more a-roving." For, after all, the best of life is looking about.

MARQUISE WENTWORTH'S PORTRAIT OF THE POPE

WHEN the papal nuncio died here in Paris a few weeks ago, the Marquise de Wentworth had just finished painting his portrait, and, at the Pope's request, it will be forwarded to Rome. A few years ago the Marquise—she was Mrs. Wentworth then—was visiting in Rome. Although she had never painted, except as an amateur, her talent was well known to her friends. Her portraits began to be talked about, and the Pope asked to see her work. A few weeks later he commissioned her to paint his portrait—that famous "White Pope," now in the Vatican. In return Mrs. Wentworth received a check and a patent of nobility. She gave the check to charity and kept the title. After that many of the Cardinals asked the Marquise de Wentworth to paint their portraits. She consented, but the prices she charged would have made Carolus Duran himself envious. All this money—and there was a great deal of it—she has devoted to charities and church work. Here in Paris her salon is very notable. You meet there the new aristocracy and the old, the young dancing men of the British and American Embassies, American Countesses and Italian Princes. It is a little like a page from Bourget's Cosmopolis.

And Madame la Marquise says: "Mr. Wentworth is coming over for the Exposition."

CUTTING OUT FOR FAME AT SEVENTEEN

A RECEPTION at the "English and American Home" in the Avenue Wagram; an address by Miss Mitchell, the honorary secretary; a message from Mrs. Travers Lewis, the founder of the home; songs by Miss Florence Burton, of Philadelphia—selections from Trifviata, and Meyerbeer's L'Etoile du Nord; good words from hundreds of the American colonists. It is quite the thing to do something for this home for English-speaking strangers, and indeed the work is admirable. You would be surprised if you knew how many "strangers" there are here—young girls, young men, people of all sorts, who come blithely up to Paris. And they need a home. Only the other day I went to Havre to meet an incoming American steamer. The friend I expected did not come, but I saw a young American girl tangled up in the formalities of the custom house. She could speak no French, and I went to her assistance. And this was her story: She had been sent by her parents from Chicago to Paris alone—to study music. She had the address of a music teacher whom she knew only by name; she had only money enough to last her a week in some cheap boarding-house—though of course more was to be sent her—and she was not yet seventeen years old, had never been away from home, and could not speak a word of French. I do not like to think of those parents of hers; the least one can say is that they must be simple-minded people.

PEOPLE WHO WOULD LIKE A TRANSATLANTIC BRIDGE

Only a few days ago a subscription paper was passed about in the American colony. It was for the benefit of an American woman and her two children. They were starving in one of the cheap hotels of the Latin Quarter. Now, this woman was a widow, whose husband's death had left her without support. She had a schoolgirl knowledge of French, and a schoolgirl proficiency in playing the piano. So she had come to Paris to support herself and her two children—by giving music lessons! I trust she is safe home again by this time.

These two instances may give you an idea of the need there is for a home for vagrom Americans in this city.

And after the Exposition is over——

Think of the hundreds of adventurous Americans who will come over here, "rich on saxpence," as the Scots say, to find themselves after a while wishing there were a bridge from Havre to New York. Somehow or other, when the American doesn't know what else to do he comes to Paris. The young writer, the young painter, the young musician—with a faith that would be sublime if it were not ridiculous—seem to think they have but to reach Paris to win fame and fortune. Well, happily there is the Home, and a half-score American churches, and General Horace Porter, and an American colony that has a free way with its purse strings.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

After a careful perusal of the numerous articles published in your paper from time to time, regarding the way to reach success in life, and centring my whole ambition and study therein, I submit to you a synopsis of the various articles, which, if closely followed, will be the means of enabling any young man to attain his desired end. I should advise every young man to firmly fix these sentences on his mind:

1. Love Nature and listen to advice with open heart.
2. Earn a little; spend a little less.
3. Hurry never.
4. Be cautious.
5. Keep your wits about you always.
6. Preserve and develop staying powers.
7. Never misrepresent.
8. Place yourself in the other man's place.
9. Undertake one thing at a time.
10. Do it completely.
11. Explain things just as they are.
12. Never exaggerate.
13. Never avoid conversation.
14. Consider before speaking.
15. Control the body; force yourself to action; never idle.
16. Don't eat too much.
17. Be polite and kind, no matter to whom.
18. Carry out your plans and ideas yourself.
19. Have lots of nerve and grit.
20. Never fear anything.
21. Invite difficult things; don't shirk them.
22. Be earnest, punctual, ambitious, correct, contented.
23. Have a clear conscience.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

I would like to say a few words to a writer who had a letter in a recent POST. His imaginary young man, it seems to me, represents a class wanting a great deal in a very short time, and wanting it "bad."

I consider three dollars a week for a green boy of fifteen and ten dollars at twenty-one very fair pay, considering his frequent changes.

If I may be pardoned for speaking personally, will state that I started to work at ten years of age in a printing office, with a six months' orphan asylum education—all the schooling I ever had—and at eighteen came to Baltimore, a total stranger, green as a gourd. I was glad to get a four-dollar the week position to sweep out, etc, in a wholesale store with eighteen employees, seven of whom were sons or nephews of the senior member of the firm.

That was seventeen years ago. The senior member is now dead, the sons are all out and but one nephew remains. The business has trebled in volume. The young man to whom I was turned over for instructions is still with us at fifteen dollars the week. I would gladly double his wages if he would only learn more about the business. Maybe your correspondent's young man's employer felt the same way.

People rarely blame themselves for failure. They don't like to.

Your correspondent's young man "changed from one business to another and is now master of none." The latter condition of course follows the former.

He asks, "What will become of him? Who cares? Who knows?" It all depends on the young man himself. The city will take care of him if it must, or he can earn his own living, and maybe a great deal more; but he won't get it until he does earn it, unless misfortune should make him heir to some one else's earnings.

An humble calling can be ennobled by the manner of following it.

"Success in most things depends on knowing how long it takes to succeed," and we should probably add, "how to work for it." Every one does not and can not know how to work. Some can never learn. Many can.

"The born dwarf never grows to middle size," but acorns grow to oaks.

Now, did this young man study his business?
Did he read his trade papers?
Did he work as hard as he could?
Did he come early and go late, or come late and go early?
Did he trust or mistrust his employer?
Did he attract or repel business?
Was he always polite, earnest and alert?
Were his ideas always in advance of his salary?
And how did he spend his evenings?—with books or billiards?

Baltimore, Maryland. A. BATTLE.

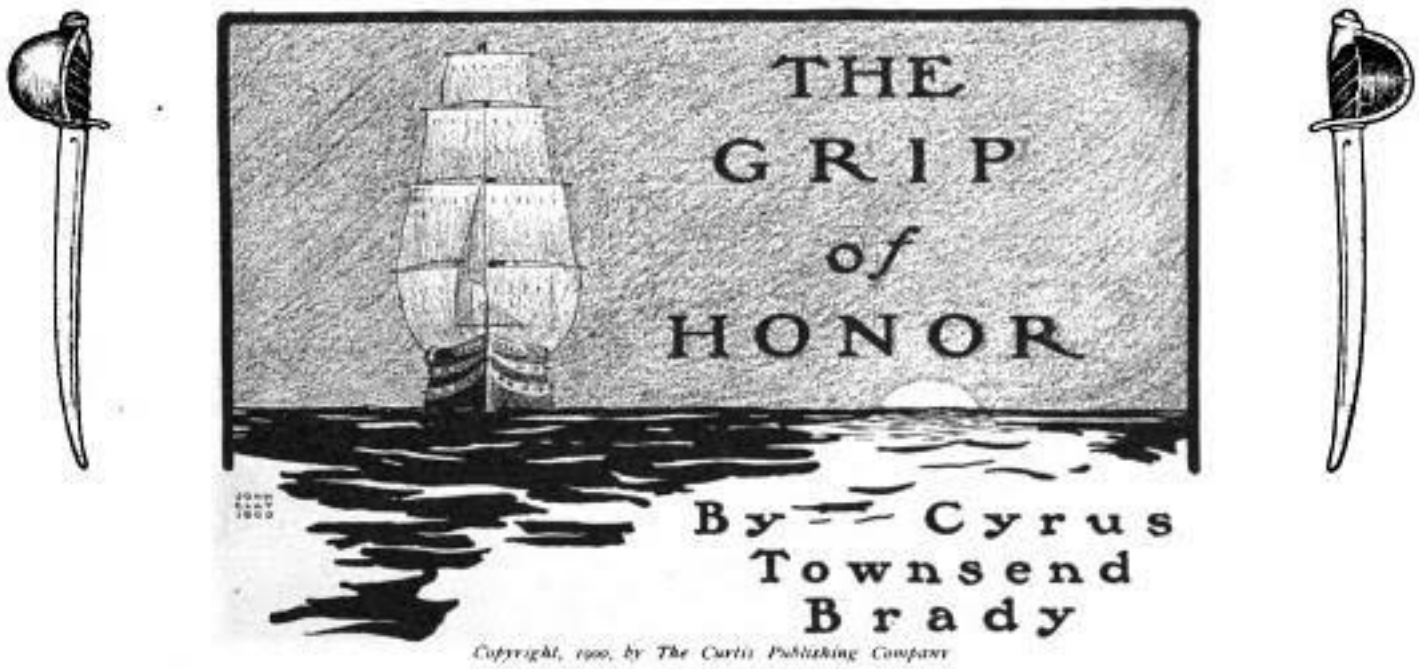
Editor Saturday Evening Post:

Like any other young man with all of life before, with many good positions open to him who is fortunate enough to get one, and capable and ambitious enough to hold it, I do not despise financial success.

The aim of these articles is to show why young men fail in business, in learning business, or in the art of making money, if I understand it right, but some of their authors have made the impression upon me, as they have upon others, I think, that to succeed in business or in a profession is in their mind about the highest attainable point of real moral success.

Now if all men were of the same quality and had the same amount of genius in their chosen vocations this might be more nearly true, but even then opportunities and health would have to be considered, and, I sometimes think, ambition, for I believe some are born lazy.

The young man that does the best he can with the talents and opportunities he has, whether he rises or not, is truly a success. To conquer one's self and to rise above the temptations of greed and passion is as great a success as any man ever attained. To succeed in business financially may or may not be success. To enjoy money one must learn how to use it as well as to earn it, for of all the many failures in life the stingy man is among the worst.



The idea I wish to convey is this; that you cannot judge a young man's failure or success by how great a business he may or may not conduct or by the amount of money he accumulates, but by how much good he may do with the talents or the money he has. It is not the hoe, but the man behind the hoe; not the President's chair, but the man in the chair that makes success or failure.

The poorest man with his heart and ambitions far above his humble position is certainly grander than the richest man who sees no more beauty than is in his position or loves no music better than the rattle of his tuneless dollars.

"Joy is wealth," and happiness is success; to make others happy is a sure way not to fail. W. H. LEONARD.

ELIZABETH, realizing the hopelessness of her lover's plight, stood terror-stricken at the Admiral's words.

"It is right, sir," said O'Neill. "I submit—and if you would make me die happy, say that the hideous proposition I have had from you was but the test of my honor."

"Oh, sir!" cried Elizabeth in agony, throwing herself upon her knees before the Admiral, "forgive me for my wild, intemperate speech; I know not what I say; you have been a father to me from the beginning, and I have ever loved you as one—I have turned to you for everything. Unsay your words. Retract this order. You cannot condemn this honest gentleman. Dispose of me as you will. I love him—I love him! Aye, let the truth be heard—even for his rejection of me. Nay, had he not done so I would have hated him. Spare his life! I will marry Edward; do anything you wish. Grant me this boon."

"I cannot," said the Admiral slowly. "I pity you; from my soul I do, and him as well, but I dare not. There is but one thing that would excuse my clemency to His Majesty—the alternative he has nobly rejected. Die he must, or give up his Captain."

"A thousand deaths rather than that!" answered O'Neill. "Rise, Lady Elizabeth; your appeal is vain. Rejoicing in your approval of my act, thankful to 'God that I have heard you say, 'I love you,' I shall die happy."

"No, no!" said the girl, spreading her arms protectingly before him and then throwing herself upon his breast, "you cannot die; you shall not die! Oh, my love, my love, I knew not until I heard you speak what this feeling was. I cannot let you go! Surely you would never be so cruel as to part us now?" she cried brokenly, looking back at the impassive old man. His hands were steady enough now; they never trembled but from shame. "What has he done? He came here to see me—me alone—to take me in his arms as he holds me now, and you condemn him to death for that. Did you never love when you were young? They whispered that it was my mother who had your heart. They told me that she was unhappy because they forced you apart. 'Twas to you she confided me. Have pity; in her name, have mercy!"

"Enough!" said the Admiral. "It is not that I will not, but that I cannot. He has chosen; he must die."

"Then may death come to me," said Elizabeth, "because for all eternity I love him."

"And this," broke in the cold, stern voice of Major Coventry, who had entered the room at this moment, "is the welcome I receive from my bride of to-morrow; and this is the reward of the efforts I have made to secure the enlargement of the Marquis de Richemont, my friend! May God have pity on me—my sweetheart and my friend."

"Sir," said O'Neill brokenly, "I crave your forgiveness. I knew that she was yours—I do not understand how we got into this position," passing his hand over his forehead in bewilderment; "but this I know—I am to die. There is no choice. She will yet be yours."

"Never—never!" cried Elizabeth, turning to him. "Edward, if you have truly loved me—if I have rightly estimated you, your nobility of soul, your generosity of heart—you will plead for us with your father. You will give me up; you are too proud to take an unwilling bride, and one who in spite of herself—for I have fought against it for your sake—confesses that she loves another. You will intercede with your father—I will bless you all the days of my life. Edward, Edward, the companion of my childhood's hours—my friend—my brother—my only hope is in you. Speak!" She fell at his feet and clasped his hand, which she covered with kisses. There was another silence. Coventry covered his face with his other hand; the sweat of agony bedewed his face.

"Rise, Elizabeth; you shall not put your trust in me in vain," he said at last. "Father, can nothing be done? I will not stand in the way."

"My son—Lady Elizabeth—Lieutenant O'Neill—there is nothing that can be done. My duty is perfectly clear. The only possible salvation of the prisoner would be in the action which he has refused even to consider; and, sir, though it was my duty to effect if possible the capture of your Captain and his ship through you, I can only say that I am glad I have failed. I apologize to you; you are a man of honor, indeed, sir. I know few who would have resisted such a plea as this. Say no more, Elizabeth; it is not that I will not—I cannot! Edward, here is my seal. Make out the warrant for an order for a court martial to-morrow morning; it is a necessary form, of course. The execution of Lieutenant O'Neill will follow at once." Elizabeth did not faint; no, not yet; there would be time for that later. She clung to O'Neill and listened.

"What shall be the manner of my death, sir?" queried the latter.

"Hanging, sir. 'Tis the penalty prescribed by the law."

"It is a poor death for a man, My Lord. A last request, sir. I am a sailor—may I be hanged upon a ship?" he asked again, pressing the trembling woman to his breast.

"I grant that—would that I could grant more! Major Coventry, you will direct Captain Pearson, of the Serapis, to execute the sentence of the court, which will meet on his ship, the prisoner to be confined there meanwhile. You will find the papers in the library; here is my seal; hasten, and get the painful matter over." Coventry left the room at once in obedience to his orders.

"And at what time, sir, will the sentence be carried out?" asked O'Neill, Elizabeth still clinging to him, covering him with incoherent caresses, and fighting against despair.

"To-morrow evening at half after six o'clock."

"Very well, My Lord."

At this moment the old Sergeant entered the room and saluted the Admiral.

"A French officer, which he says he's from the American Continental squadron, has come ashore in a small cutter under a flag of truce, an' desires to speak with Your Lordship. He asks for a safe conduct."

"Tell him he shall return as freely as he came, on the word of a British officer, and admit him."

A slender, dapper little man, in the uniform of a French marine officer, his head covered with a powdered wig, entered the room a moment later and bowed profusely. Elizabeth started violently as she beheld him.

"Whom have I the honor of addressing?" asked the Admiral.

"The Vicomte de Chamillard, a Colonel of Marines in the Navy of France, serving as a volunteer in the American squadron," was the reply.

"And you came on behalf of——"

"Captain John Paul Jones, to protest against your unlawful detention of another French officer, the Marquis de Richemont, My Lord."

"He is a spy, caught in the very act; he has admitted it, and if that were not enough, I find he is an attainted traitor. A court is ordered for to-morrow morning on the Serapis, and his execution, which will be inevitable, is set for half after six o'clock in the evening. He shall hang from one of the frigate's yardarms."

"De Chamillard," said O'Neill, "you can do nothing."

"The laws of war——" persisted the Frenchman.

"It is in accordance with those laws that I do what I do," replied the Admiral shortly; "and you may say to your Captain that if I catch him he shall swing from the first yardarm that comes into the harbor."

"I am answered, then. Very good; I shall remember your courteous words, My Lord, and now I enter my formal protest against this unwarranted action on your part concerning the Marquis de Richemont. The King of France will have something to say about it. I bid you farewell."

"Farewell, sir," said the Admiral indifferently, turning away.

"De Richemont, good-by; embrace me." As the two men came together, the Frenchman whispered: "This woman—is she your friend?"

"Yes," said O'Neill quickly.

"Mademoiselle," said De Chamillard, turning to Elizabeth with a keen look in his eyes, recognizing her at last, as she stretched out her hand to him. He murmured as he bent low over it, "Delay the execution for at least six hours and I will save him." Elizabeth sank down in her chair, a gleam of hope in her heart.

"I salute you," he said, turning away.

"Sergeant," cried the Admiral, "attend the Vicomte de Chamillard and see him safely bestowed on his vessel."

As the Frenchman turned toward the door he came face to face with Major Coventry, returning with the orders he had prepared.

"Paul Jones, by Heaven!" shouted the latter.

"At your service," said the supposed Frenchman, promptly tearing off his wig and laying his hand upon his sword.

"Hah!" cried the Admiral, "have you dared to come here? I have you now. What ho! the guard! Sergeant, arrest this rebel—this traitor—this pirate—disarm him. You shall never leave this castle but for the ship, sir. The yardarm is there."

"Stop, My Lord!" answered Jones calmly, as the men crowded toward him. "Stand back, Sergeant; back, men; you cannot touch me; I have that which will protect me wherever flies the English flag."

"And that is——" said the Admiral, smiling contemptuously.

"Your word, sir; the word of an English officer!"

The old man bit his lip in chagrined silence. He struggled with himself, looking at the easy, insouciant Scotsman before him.

"In seventy years it has not been broken," he said at last. "Well for you that you secured it. Go! You are free. You are a bold man, sir, but I warn you, do not cross my path again!"

"I am proud to have met so true a gentleman; will you honor me?" said Paul Jones, presenting his snuff-box to the Admiral. The old man hesitated, laughed in spite of himself, and finally helped himself to a pinch. "The insolence of the man!" he exclaimed. "I'd like to have met you in my young days, yardarm to yardarm."

"I would have endeavored to occupy you, sir," said Jones coolly; "and now I bid you farewell."

He shot one meaning glance at Elizabeth, and his lips seemed to form the words, "Six hours!" as he departed from the room.

"Here is the warrant, sir," said Coventry. "Again I ask, and this time I ask my father, can nothing be done?"

"Nothing, sir! Less as a father than in any other capacity. Sergeant, take your prisoner. Major Coventry, you will conduct him on the Serapis and remain there as my representative until the execution is over. Sir, you have borne yourself well this day—I would shake you by the hand. Good-by."

O'Neill clasped the proffered hand warmly, and then looked from Coventry, standing erect, immovable, white-faced, to Elizabeth, who was still sitting with bowed head, a world of entreaty in his glance. Coventry nodded and turned away. O'Neill stepped quickly to the girl's side, took her hand in his, bowed low over it, and pressed a long kiss upon it.

"May you be happy," he said. "Farewell!" She looked at him in dazed silence.

"Sir," he continued, turning to Coventry and saluting, "I am ready. Lead on."

"Forward, march, Sergeant," commanded the officer, and with no backward look the little cortège moved from the room. The girl arose to her feet as if to start after them, but the old man restrained her.

"O'Neill! O'Neill!" rang through the hall—a wild, despairing cry—and then Lady Elizabeth sank down white and still at the feet of the Admiral.

"And this is love!" he murmured, shaking his old head; "I had forgotten it."

Thirteenth Chapter

IT WAS morning when Elizabeth came again to the terrace above the water battery overlooking the harbor. She had passed a night of sleepless agony, and her pallid, haggard face—for her grief had been too deep for tears—gave outward evidence of her breaking heart. She had besought the Admiral again and again to stay the execution of her lover, urging every plea that the most desperate mind could suggest; she had implored his mercy and pity upon every ground, and, upon his inexorable refusal, had begged that he might be reprieved for a few hours and that she might at least be allowed to see him before he died. Touched by her sorrow, the old man had been inclined to grant this petition at first, and had scribbled a line on his official paper, giving the desired permission, but before he sealed it he changed his mind, and deemed it best—more merciful to her—to refuse.

It really wrung his heart to be unable to extend clemency to this young man. He repented him of the temptation he had thrown in his way. The nobility with which O'Neill had rejected the chance of life which had been offered him; the simplicity with which he had given up everything for honor, impressed him more than ever. He was sick at heart at the grief of his ward, whom he truly loved, and the broken, despairing face of his son haunted him. He wished that the Irishman had never crossed his path, though he could not but admire his honor, his grace and his courage. He was bitterly sorry that he had ever attempted to influence the man; he had an uncomfortable and growing suspicion that his plans had brought nothing but trouble to every one. Breaking away from the presence of Elizabeth, whose anguished face was a living reproach to him, he finally secluded himself in his office and refused to see her again.

So the day wore away; but oh, how differently! The girl never knew how she passed the hours. She wandered restlessly up and down the terrace, her eyes strained upon the sea. The garrison, who idolized her to a man, had been apprised by the Sergeant of what had happened, and to a man they were upon her side. The men would never forget the picture she made as they watched her pacing to and fro, gazing at the ship in the harbor—her lover's prison and his scaffold.

The sense of impotent helplessness with which she was compelled to face the situation, the knowledge that O'Neill was doomed death itself only to see her—to be in her presence again! Oh, how splendid, how handsome, how noble he had been in the great hall, when he had refused her rather than to take her as the reward of treachery—and now he was to become a lifeless lump of clay, alive to her only as a memory, a recollection!

It was late in the afternoon. Her maid had not been able to drag her from the terrace whence she had a view of the ship on which her lover was to be executed—murdered, she said. As she gazed upon it she noticed two men climbing nimbly up the black shrouds about the foremast. When they reached the foreyard they ran out on the yardarm. One of them carried something. A rope was dragging from it. In obedience to an imperious command, her maid ran and fetched her a glass. One look through it showed her—she was a sailor's ward—that they were rigging a whip on the yardarm; they were securing there a girt-line block through which a rope was rove leading to the top and thence to the deck. She divined its purpose at once. The hour! The hour! Had it grown so late? Was it so near, so near? Was there a God in that blue Heaven bending above her head?

A sick feeling came over her heart, and she would have fainted but for a sudden inspiration. Again she seized the telescope—an unusually strong one, by the way—and, raising it to her eyes with unsteady hand, eagerly swept the sea off in the direction of Flamborough Head, rising faintly down to the southward, a long distance away. For a long time her trembling hands could not get that part of the horizon in focus. Finally she knelt down and rested the tube upon the parapet and looked again.

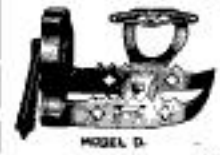
Ah! At last she had it, and there swept into the field of vision three gleams of white on the skyline, proclaiming even to her unpracticed eye the sails of ships! What had that indomitable man said to her last night in the hall?

"Delay the execution for at least six hours and I will save him!" He was not one to promise lightly. She would try again. She would make one more appeal to the Admiral. It was late, but there might yet be time. On the instant she turned, leaving the startled maid, and ran like a fleet-footed fawn along the terrace, down the stone steps through the water battery, through the bailey, into the inner court, down the long passage and into the great hall, where the Admiral was usually to be found at this hour. She dashed impetuously into the room, crying:

"The Admiral, quick; where is he?"

"Ships has been reported down at Bridlin'ton Bay—foreign ships, Your Leddyship," replied the old Sergeant, who happened to be there alone, "an' His Ludship took horse about half-past twelve o'clock to go down there."

Failure! Her last hope gone! She sank down into the chair. Reaction had come—she was fainting, helpless, dying. It was over. The Sergeant started toward her with his face full of pity. She was sitting in the Admiral's chair by the great table; her glance fell listlessly upon it. At the moment another idea flashed into her mind. Desperate, foolish, nevertheless she would try it—try anything—this, at least, was action. She started to her feet again on the instant, instinct with life.



"Leave me at once, and see that no one interrupts me; I wish to be alone," she said imperiously to the astonished Sergeant, who bowed respectfully and withdrew. About half an hour later she came hurriedly out of the room, white-faced, drawn, nerved for desperate endeavor.

"The insolence of the man!" he exclaimed

How he got through the night O'Neill never knew. The court martial in the morning had taken little time; its sentence, a foregone conclusion, promptly approved by the Admiral, had been death by hanging at half after six o'clock that night. He had refused to give any further parole in the faint hope that something might enable him to escape, and consequently had been heavily ironed and placed in confinement in the space between two of the great guns on the lower gun-deck—the Serapis was a double-banked frigate—on the starboard side. The forethought of Coventry, who had attended him with the solicitude and kindness of a brother, and had pleaded for him unavailingly before the court, had caused to be provided a canvas screen which inclosed two of the guns, and allowed the prisoner to pass his hours undisturbed by the curious gaze of the English seamen.

Captain Pearson, a gallant officer, had been kindness itself in all his arrangements, but his orders, which were peremptory, left him no discretion whatever. O'Neill passed his time sitting by the open port, leaning on a gun, gazing out over the water at the gray old castle where he had found his love and met his fate. Many tragedies had been enacted within its walls during its six centuries of existence, and none sadder than his own. But he was a sailor, and generations of heroic ancestors had accustomed him to look death in the face and smile undaunted at its grimness.

"Fortune, Infortune, Fortune" had been the motto of his branch of the red-handed O'Neills; at least, that was the punning Latin translation of a Celtic original which meant "Fortune and misfortune are alike to the strong."

When his friends and acquaintances at the French Court, those knights and ladies with whom he had ruffled it so bravely, the young King his master, his old comrades, the hard fighters on the Richard, her dauntless Captain, that brave old man his father, heard how he had died, they should learn that he met the last grim enemy with the wonted intrepidity of his race. Noblesse oblige! And then, having made his peace with God as best he could alone—he was of a different faith from that of the chaplain of the ship—he gave himself over to mournful dreams of Elizabeth Howard.

Late in the afternoon his meditations were interrupted by the arrival of Coventry. The poignant unhappiness of the young Englishman was, if anything, greater than that of O'Neill. His engagement to Elizabeth Howard, with whom he had grown up, had been at first more or less a matter of convenience, and he had never entirely realized the hold she had taken upon his heart until he heard her—in the arms of O'Neill—make that frantic avowal of her overwhelming love. Men frequently know not the value of what they have—until they lose it.

Coventry's heart had been surcharged with love and devotion to this woman, and because his life had glided on evenly he had not known how full of love it was until it had overflowed. He would, he thought, cheerfully take the other's place, sentence of death and all, could he but once hear before he died the ringing accents of such a sublime confession—for himself.

When Elizabeth had appealed to him to intervene, he had subordinated his own happiness to hers, and had endeavored to procure a mitigation of the punishment imposed upon his rival, though he knew his success would put his promised wife into the arms of O'Neill. He had not done this without a terrible struggle—but he had done it. He felt that the sacrifice would cost him his life, and for that he was truly glad, yet he had offered it freely, generously and nobly. He had not hesitated to do so, for with him the happiness of Elizabeth Howard was the paramount passion. If she did not love him, he could at least show her what love truly meant in its highest sense; give her a lesson in love like to the lesson in honor that other man had exhibited last night.

There was something grandly sublime in this utter abnegation of self, so simply done for another's happiness. He had been a Christian after a rather better fashion, perhaps, than most young men of his time, and his associations with the sweet, pure girl he loved had kept him so.

At the first moment, when he found last night that his pleadings were of no avail, and that O'Neill was doomed to die, his heart had leaped in his breast at the thought that his rival would be removed, but he had crushed the thought as unworthy a gentleman of his high ideals; and there had come to him in addition a consciousness that to a love like Elizabeth Howard's the death of a beloved one would make no change. Time would not soften a blow to a nature like hers.

In the execution of O'Neill he saw the death warrant of Elizabeth. He had passed the day racking his brain and thinking of some way to delay the execution, but without avail. He would have stopped at nothing to save them both. In despair he had come to consult with his rival.

The Polite Art of WAR

By Frank X. Finnegan

IF CIVILIZATION in its resistless march has done nothing else worth mentioning, it has at least taught us how to carry on war with the least possible amount of hard feeling and strictly according to the rules laid down for the guidance of our very best people. In a large measure the rough edges have been trimmed from war's horrid front, so that it now presents an aspect rather pleasing and alluring than otherwise. Indeed, a young man so unfortunate as to have been denied admission to those polite circles which give an indefinable ease of manner to their familiars, could not do better than enlist at the outbreak of the next little argument between civilized powers. If he emerge from the adventure alive he will, by close study and observation, have learned more of etiquette than he would in two seasons of cotillions and at-homes.

Though the custom of killing one another in scientific fashion has not passed away, the painful duty is now performed in so merciful a manner that it is almost as painless as the extraction of a tooth. Time was when warring nations went out and pummeled one another with anything they could lay their hands on, until as many men as possible were dead. They jabbed one another with lances, hacked one another with battle-axes, and chopped off heads with two-handed swords.

We don't do it that way. True, we still go to war. We range men up in line with highly improved guns and try to shoot the other fellow full of nickel-jacketed bullets at a range of a mile or two. If he doesn't run when we gallantly charge upon him, we jab him with a wicked triangular bayonet, designed and carried especially to rip open the enemy. But that's as far as we go nowadays. If the other fellow fails to die of the nickel-jacketed bullets or the jabbing with the bayonet, we tenderly raise him on a stretcher, carry him away to a field hospital and summon surgeons and nurses to bind up the wounds we made a few hours before with the bullets and the bayonet. We carefully take his temperature every few hours and feed him on patent health foods, lest he should die of the wounds we inflicted upon him. When he has entirely recovered we send him back to his own army, where we can get another shot at him.

It is very easy to commit a social solecism in the selection of the kind of bullet with which we are to kill the other fellow. It is so easy to make a faux pas in this direction. Good form now dictates that the only bullet used shall be a speedy, solid one with a nickel or steel covering. They are so much more pleasant when passing through one, it is said by those who have tried several kinds. No army with pretensions to social prominence would use the vulgar "dum dum," or soft-nosed bullet. It has entirely gone out, although for a long time it was very English and considered quite the thing. It is understood that its retirement was due to protests from many people who seriously objected to being killed by the "dum dum" bullet, though they maintained they did not at all mind a good, swift, steel-jacket bullet.

Time was when it was a favorite diversion of rude and boorish generals to sneak around in the night when the enemy was sound asleep and surprise him before he really got his eyes open and knew what was going on. That is all changed now. The polite art of war has reached such a stage that all danger of such disturbances is eliminated. When a general gets ready to send his lyddite shells over into the enemy's camp, where they will tear everything up and scatter handfuls of the enemy all over the smiling face of Nature, he does not take a mean advantage of the enemy by shooting one of them at him during luncheon hour. He sends by special courier a note to the other general which reads something like this:

> "I have the honor to state that my artillery will open fire at four o'clock this afternoon. If this hour is inconvenient for you or interferes with any previous engagement, I shall be only too glad to change it. Hoping this finds you as well as it leaves me, and with regards to all, I am
> "Yours fraternally,
> "J. HOWITZER."

At the appointed hour he turns loose the batteries and tries to blow up everything in sight. But though the rules permit him to send over fifty-pound shells filled with dynamite and other excitable matter which wipe out fifty or sixty men at a single discharge, he must by no means put one of the shells under ground over which he knows the enemy will pass and touch it off when they are strolling idly by. It would kill the same number of men as it does when fired at them from a cannon, but it's against the rules.

And then the filibustering part of it and the "aid from a friendly power" end of it have all been brought down to a fine point—so fine, indeed, that many people fail to see it. For instance, while England is at war with the Boers our State Department is on the alert to check any bold attempts at recruiting for the Boer army, for Great Britain is a friendly power. If some over-zealous Dutchman raised a regiment and chartered a ship to take his men to Africa he would be arrested at once. But the men who raise mules down St. Louis way can ship thousands of them to Africa to pull English batteries out of the mud. The men who make cartridges have been working night and day to fill British orders; an Indiana firm has been turning out gun stocks for Great Britain by the thousand, and not a ripple was caused by it. So it is apparent that the citizens of the United States can sell either Boer or Briton all the tools to kill each other with, but must not make a move toward handling the tools. It's a great system.

The polite art of war has almost reached the point of perfection. It will be quite correct when it comes to the point where the soldier, as he raises his rifle and looks for the white of the other fellow's eyes, observes, "I beg your pardon," and then shoots him; where the other soldier, as he charges up the breastworks so stoutly defended, raises his triangular bayonet and, before plunging it into the other man's uniform, murmurs, "Excuse me." Then the opposing generals after the battle will exchange notes, the victor sending his luckless friend a letter of condolence and the vanquished expressing his congratulations and praising the high military skill of his late enemy, while the soldiers of both sides care for one another's wounded in a joint hospital.

Paolo and Francesca*

A NOTICE on the flyleaf of Mr. Stephen Phillips' dramatic poem, Paolo and Francesca, warns the public that it has been already accepted by Mr. George Alexander for production at the St. James' Theatre, that it is published meanwhile by his consent, and that all acting rights are reserved. There is little likelihood of other managers seeking to infringe upon these rights. The average playgoer is not enamored of tragedies, and this one is so simple and direct, so unrelieved by any touch of gayety, so shadowed by disaster from the first line to the last, that it will take a stout-hearted audience to fill the St. James' Theatre when it is put upon the boards.

The story is one of the most familiar in tradition and literature. The love of Francesca da Rimini for her husband's young brother, and the stern vengeance that followed swiftly on her fall, have been the chosen theme of so many poets since Dante's day that little can be added now to deepen the pathos of the tale. Mr. Phillips shows us with plaintive distinctness the girl-wife, fresh from her convent school, lonely, sad, passionate, and betraying in every word the pitiful impetuosity of an unhappy child.

"I dread to be alone: I fear the night,
And you great chamber, the resort of spirits.
I see men hunted on the air by hounds:
Thin faces of your house, with weary smiles.
The dead who frown I fear not; but I fear
The dead who smile! The very palace rocks,
Remembering at midnight, and I see
Women, within these walls immured alive,
Come starving to my bed, and ask for food."

This is a good specimen of Mr. Phillips' blank verse which, like his play, has the merit of simplicity. There are no subtleties of speech, and there are no subtleties of thought or of emotion in the whole tragedy. All is daylight clear. The one thing about which we feel a shadow of uncertainty is whether or not the author recognized the close resemblance between these few words of Francesca's,

"Nothing hath grieved me yet but ancient woes, Sea-perils, or some long-ago farewell," and Wordsworth's famous lines,

"Perhaps the plaintive numbers flow
For old, unhappy, far-off things,
And battles long ago."

Men Who Have Made Literature†

MR. DAWSON, in his Makers of Modern Prose, has given us one of the very best handbooks of literature published within recent years. Animated by a courage beyond praise, he has left out of his list all insignificant names, and this is a supreme merit for which we cannot be sufficiently grateful. It is precisely the lack of such courage which makes many similar volumes more misleading than helpful. Their fantastic grouping of great and small merely serves to confuse the literary perspective of the student.

The masters of prose cited by Mr. Dawson are Doctor Johnson, Goldsmith, Burke, Gibbon, Lord Macaulay, Landor, De Quincey, Lamb, Carlyle, Emerson, Froude, Ruskin, Robertson and Cardinal Newman. His list is a list to make the English-speaking world reasonably proud, and it is handled with a fine critical taste as rare as it is agreeable. Mr. Dawson has a broad catholic appreciation of whatever is best in all these writers, and he has the power to discriminate between different degrees of greatness. It is, for example, an easy task to admire Doctor Johnson. The critic would, indeed, be beggared in soul who could fail to love and reverence the man whose memory has become a glory and an inspiration to his race. It is easy also to love Goldsmith, or rather, it is impossible not to love him; and his masterpieces both of prose and verse appeal irresistibly to all those who are so happy as to enjoy perfection in literary art. But it is not everybody who, in these flabby days, can recognize the power and the distinction of Burke. Therefore we listen with something like rapture to this admirable summing up of characteristics too seldom seen or understood:

"The greatest quality of Burke's writings is that spiritual aloofness which held him, as it were, poised high above his immediate subject, with his eye fixed on the broader issues and relations of things, in something of philosophic, but still more of prophetic intensity of vision. Greatness of style arises, after all, not from accidental grace or glow of expression; it springs from something deeper—the great mind and the noble temper."

Equally fine is the distinction which Mr. Dawson draws between the inaccuracy of Macaulay and the untruthfulness of Froude. Macaulay was deplorably inaccurate from narrowness of vision and overweening self-confidence; yet his was a nature of kind and homely sincerity. Froude's delightful pages are resolutely misleading. He wrote history, says Mr. Dawson, in the spirit of the novelist. "As long as things looked artistically probable, he thought little of essential veracity. His habit of mind was casuistic; and when you unite gross carelessness with a manifest determination to prove a case at all costs, truth is rapidly reduced to a minus quantity."

Yet Macaulay's sincerity gave him no depth of vision. He never got beyond the surface of things, though with that surface he had a wide and wonderful acquaintance. "Carlyle," says Mr. Dawson truly, "has the prophetic insight which interprets the whole nature of a man in a single significant phrase. He paints a portrait; Macaulay constructs a mosaic. Any historic personage, even the humblest, who has once been bathed in the searching light of Carlyle's imagination is henceforth known to us, and is instinct with vitality. But the most we learn from Macaulay is how such a man dressed his hair, ate his dinner, or treated his wife."

NEWS FROM BOOKLAND

A Fortune-Teller's Failure in History

MR. ANDREW LANG does not believe in palmistry, in clairvoyance, or in any of the various kinds of fortune-telling which flourish in Bond Street and secure much of fashionable London's money. He has appeared in a new rôle, and has attempted to start a crusade in an evening paper against the practitioners of these arts.

The ordinary fortune-telling gypsy in England is punished by law for obtaining money under false pretenses. Mr. Lang thinks that a shop in the West End and a guinea fee should not free any one from the operation of the law. He himself has been making amusing experiments with clairvoyants.

Apparently he had a friend, a lady, who believed she had discovered a wonderful clairvoyant who could penetrate the past marvelously. Mr. Lang, who is engaged on a History of Scotland, which will be his next publication and one of his most important, wanted information as to a certain historical character. He asked the lady to consult the clairvoyant and save him the trouble of investigation.

"Later," remarks Mr. Lang, "I discovered what I wanted by research." But the faith of his friend was shattered.

The Butterfly and the Commissioner

A CERTAIN commissioner representing the American art section of a certain exposition was to arrive in Paris a while ago to arrange with the American painters and sculptors resident there for their contributions. Wishing to be brisk and businesslike he wrote ahead to several artists stating that he would be in Paris on a certain day, and at a certain hotel, and naming an hour at which he hoped each man would call upon him. On his schedule for the day might have been found the name of Mr. James McNeil Whistler and the hour "4:30 precisely." The note he received is worthy of the author of The Gentle Art of Making Enemies.

"Dear Sir: I have received your letter announcing that you will arrive in Paris on the —th. I congratulate you.

"I have never been able, and never shall be able, to be anywhere at '4.30 precisely.'

"Yours most faithfully,

"JAMES MCNEIL WHISTLER."

Later, it is said, the commissioner waited on Mr. Whistler and offered him all the wall space there was if he needed it.

A Genius that is Chilled by Cold

MR. FRANKFORT MOORE'S work is done in a fashion peculiarly his own. He likes writing only in the open air, and his novels are for the most part written in the garden of his house at Kensington. There under the trees he composes his lively stories. When it grows too cold in the autumn he retires to the house, and there is little or no work done. He does not hibernate as a bear, but amuses himself with reading and with planning new work. But when spring takes ever so little of the chill off, Mr. Moore will be found out of doors again and writing, many times so early in the season that he must be tightly wrapped with rugs.

Thackeray's Fugitive Work

IT APPEARS that not all of Thackeray's writing is yet generally known. Something of a controversy was aroused lately over his alleged Hitherto Unidentified Contributions to Punch. Now Mr. Lewis Melville, who has lately published the Life of Thackeray, claims that in other magazines there is enough signed and unsigned miscellaneous matter to make a volume, which has appeared in no collected edition as yet.

One of England's Modest Great Men

ONE might live in London for years and move much in literary society without ever seeing some of England's greatest figures in literature. Mr. George Meredith, for example, although his cottage at Box Hill in Surrey is not fat from the metropolis, is almost never to be seen in town. In the country he leads the quietest of lives, writing some, and cultivating flowers. There is one house in London, however, where one could not easily forget Meredith, for on one night in the week during almost the entire year there comes from him a small box of superb violets for the children of the household, who have many times been allowed to make the seclusion of Box Hill less quiet.

Books Worth Having

Some books are designed for entertainment, others for information. This series combines both features. The information is not only complete and reliable, it is compact and readable. These are the latest as well as the best books on the subjects of which they treat. They average 200 pages, are 6x4½ in. in size, well printed on good paper, handsomely bound in green cloth, with a heavy paper wrapper to match.

Each 50 Cents

ETIQUETTE. By Agnes H. Morton. Success in life is often marred by bad manners. A perusal of this work will prevent such blunders. It is a book for everybody, for the select sets as well as for the less ambitious. The subject is presented in a bright and interesting manner and represents the latest vogue.

LETTER WRITING. By Agnes H. Morton. Most persons dislike letter writing because they fear they cannot say just the right thing. This book not only shows by numerous examples just what kind of letters to write for all occasions, but it teaches the reader to become an accomplished original letter writer.

SLIPS OF SPEECH. By John H. Bechtel. Who does not make them? The best of us do. Why not avoid them? Any one with the desire for self-improvement can. No necessity for studying rules of rhetoric or grammar, when this book can be had. It teaches both without the study of either.

PRACTICAL SYNONYMS. By John H. Bechtel. Any one with the least desire to add to his vocabulary should have a copy of this book. It is designed mainly to meet the wants of the busy merchant or lawyer, the thoughtful clergyman or teacher, the wide-awake school boy or girl.

TOASTS. By William Pittenger. What would you not give for the ability to respond to them? No need to give much when you can learn the art from this little book. It will tell you how to do it; not only that, but by example it will show you the way.

THE DEBATER'S TREASURY. By William Pittenger. There is no greater ability than the power of skillful debate. Here are directions for organizing debating societies, and suggestions for all who desire to discuss questions in public. Also, over 200 questions for debate, with arguments affirmative and negative.

PARLOR GAMES. By Helen E. Hollister. "What shall we do to amuse ourselves and our friends?" is a question frequently propounded. This complete volume most happily answers this puzzling question, as it contains a splendid collection of all kinds of games for amusement, entertainment and instruction.

DANCING. By Marguerite Wilson. A complete instructor, beginning with the first positions and leading up to the square and round dances. A full list of calls for square dances, the etiquette of the dances, and 100 figures for the german. Illustrated.

PRACTICAL PALMISTRY. By Henry Frith. Palmistry is one of the most popular subjects of the day. More people would be interested in it if they properly understood it. This volume furnishes full and trustworthy information on the subject, and by means of it any one will be able to read character fully and accurately. Illustrated.

LAW, AND HOW TO KEEP OUT OF IT. By Paschall H. Coggins, Esq. Most legal difficulties arise from ignorance of the minor points of law. This book furnishes to the busy man and woman information on just such points as are likely to arise in every-day affairs, and thus forestalls them against mental worry and financial loss.

Our 80-page catalogue is enclosed with every order, or it can be had for the asking. The books mentioned are for sale at all bookstores, or will be mailed for the price.

Tales of Men of Many Trades
The Story of Hubbard Wilson, a Misfit
By Charles Battell Loomis

THERE is no doubt that, as stock clerk in the woolen department of Slater, Weatherby & Co.'s commission house, Hubbard Wilson was not a success. He had obtained the position through Frederick Weatherby, who had been one of his father's boyhood companions, but whereas Weatherby used to be very genial with him, he now never more than nodded to him, and Hubbard felt sure that he was sorry he had done anything at all for him.

Slater, Weatherby & Co. was one of the leading houses in Boston, and to enter it in any capacity was esteemed a privilege—the chances for advancement to an ambitious young man were so sure—but Hubbard had overheard Dick Slater, old man Slater's son, and manager of the white-goods department, say that "Wilson ain't worth shelf room," and although it made his blood boil at the time, he was too just not to see that, in so far as it applied to the dry-goods business, Dick was right.

If Hubbard had been some, or indeed any, of the men who figure in Samuel Smiles' book on Self-Help he would have made up his mind to master woolens, even though he hated the very feel and smell of them, just to have the satisfaction of becoming a partner within five years. But there was small chance of his ever being used by Samuel as a beautiful example. When, as often happened, a customer came downstairs to see what was new in patterns, Hubbard could never by any chance tell him, and as most of the Summer and Arch Street merchants knew the Chauncy Street store very well indeed, they generally found what they wanted by walking down the long cañons formed by open cases piled sidewise on each other and containing the various rolls of woolen goods from the different mills. Hubbard would follow helplessly behind, and now and again hit on the right answer by a lucky fluke, but these interviews always ended in his feeling his utter unworthiness, and yet without producing an ambition to become a passable stock clerk. His was an easy-going nature, and he fared better at the hands of the other clerks than some would have done who showed such a beautiful incapacity.

He was by no means dull, and he had a trick at the pencil that whiled away many an hour for himself and others. There was not a man above or below stairs who had not been caricatured by Hubbard, generally on a letter-head that was passed surreptitiously around that none of the heads of the house might see it. But though praise of the likeness and the way it was done was always forthcoming, it was generally accompanied by some sneer to the belittlement of Hubbard, and he knew that his personal stock was below par just as his woolen stock was in disorder. His predecessor in the stock-room had been made a salesman and had gone out on the market at the end of five months, whereas he, at the end of a year, was still getting a ridiculous four dollars a week, barely enough to keep him decently clothed.

This morning he was feeling particularly despondent, and, although five cases of goods had come in from the New York house and he should have been putting them in stock, he was sitting in an empty case drawing a picture of an up-State man who had been in the day before and had completely bewildered him with his questions about quality and marks on some Nepaug cheviots. He heard a step on the stairs, and, thinking it was Dawson, one of the salesmen, he came out of his retreat and walked languidly toward the sample counter that stood in the front end of the basement under the ground-glass light.

It proved to be old Stumberg, a German retailer from Lincoln Street, whom Hubbard hated worse than poison.

"Vere's Mr. Dawson?"

"Out on the market," said Hubbard.

"Do you know vedder dere are any Annandale cheviots in stock?"

"Nun—no—I mean—yes—there aren't any. Oh, wait a minute. There are some goods just in from New York. I'll look at the invoice." Stumberg looked at him a moment with curling upper lip, and then: "Say, vot you know aboud voolens my boy Ike could say in fife minutes. Und he stutters."

Hubbard reddened to the roots of his hair as he fumbled over the invoice.

Meanwhile Stumberg had been looking at some samples of trouserings that lay on the counter.

"How much are dese a yart?"

Hubbard was able to answer this. "Two dollars and fifty cents."

"Dey ain'd vert' it. Poor qvality. I can get choost as goot for two dollars at Jackson's."

Now, if Hubbard had been Dawson he would have pointed out to Mr. Stumberg that these goods were among the best sellers of the year from the Annandale mills, and that they could not fill orders fast enough, which was a fact. He would have told him that Grünbaum & Jonassen, of Circle City, the greatest kickers in the West, had bought ten cases of them. But being Hubbard, he entirely forgot these facts. His mind was colored by Stumberg's view of the goods, and, although he had been thinking of getting a big enough sample to make himself a pair of trousers, he suddenly saw that they were inferior goods and said:

"It is kind of high, I suppose."

"High, vy of course it's high. De goods are rotten. Vell, you didn't get dose cheviots alretty?"

Hubbard had now found the invoice.

"No, they didn't ship them. Is there anything else you want?"

"Not till Dawson comes in. You'll vear yourself oud if you stay here long."

And Stumberg lumbered up the stairs, his thick, red, quilted neck sunk into his round shoulders.

Hubbard felt as if he had been in a Turkish bath.

"How can I stand such insults? I wasn't cut out for this business or any other. What a fool I am to slave away at it."

And so saying, he escaped from slavery, temporarily, by sitting down in the case again to finish the picture of the up-State man. And when it was done it was a perfect likeness. Hubbard had what is called a photographic eye, and when he had studied a man's features he could reproduce them with a fidelity or a clever distortion that were alike startling. He had never studied art beyond the merest rudiments. His lack of staying power which was going to prevent his becoming a partner in the Slater-Weatherby firm had caused him to tire of his art work as such, but in a desultory way he had sketched for his own amusement ever since he was old enough to do anything, and he was now nineteen.

When Dawson came in and saw the goods still on the floor he sailed into Hubbard.

"Say, Hub, I don't see why old man Slater don't fire you. What you been doing?" Then, as he saw the picture: "Well, if that isn't Dexter Burnham to the life I'll eat my hat! Say, you oughtn't to stay a day in this business. You could make your fortune drawing for the newspapers. Have you ever tried to get a job?"

"Oh, what's the use of trying anything?" said Hubbard despondently. "I'm not the succeeding kind."

"Well, I'll lend you a hand to get these woolens in stock before Weatherby comes down, or some one will succeed you. Say, he's kind of soured on you, ain't he?"

"I don't care. I've soured on myself. What's the use?"

Hubbard laid the picture on the shipping desk and went to work in a half-hearted way at putting the woolens into stock.

"Well, I think there's lots of use," said Dawson. "Gee, I know lots of fellows that would fall all over themselves to get your job—and at less pay than you get—just to learn the business; and you've been here nearly a year and I don't believe you could tell how much Shaker flannels are a yard."

Hubbard colored, but he said nothing. Why was it that people were so abominably frank with him? They seemed to think that he loved to hear the truth. The very fact that it was the truth made it harder to hear, but Dawson was a good fellow and meant well, and Hubbard did not reply.

"Where do you think you'll be five years from now?"

"Probably finishing this job," said Hubbard with a humorous twinkle as he slowly put a Ferndale cheviot into an Annandale case.

Just then a customer came downstairs and Dawson went to attend to him, leaving Hubbard to finish alone. And then one of those fits of energy that sometimes came to him seized him, and, with a quickening of wits and movements, he pitched the goods into their cases with the zeal of a new stock clerk and with almost as many mistakes.

But matters had come to a crisis with Hubbard. Old Stumberg had met Weatherby on the street, and in his painfully offensive, sarcastic way had told him that that light-headed clerk with the big ears ought to be in a kindergarten, and not in the stock department of a big dry-goods house.

The whistle at the shipping desk blew twice. Edwards, the shipping clerk, stepped to the desk and put his ear to the tube.

"Send Wilson up to me."

"Mr. Weatherby wants to see you, Hubbard." His eye fell on the portrait that Wilson had made. He grinned admiringly. "Say! you've got Burnham to the Queen's taste. That's the only thing you can do; but you can draw, and no mistake."

Hubbard almost snatched the picture and went upstairs to Mr. Weatherby's office. More plain speaking—and from an Irish shipping clerk. Why didn't he smash him? He knew well enough why. Hubbard was not a pugilist any more than he was a dry-goods man.

He walked into Mr. Weatherby's office.

Frederick Weatherby—or Fred, as he was called by his intimates—was a man of about forty-five, self-made and successful. Self-made men invariably are successful. No man ever takes the trouble to self-make himself poorly.

"Did you call me, sir?" asked Hubbard.

Mr. Weatherby finished what he was doing, and then he wheeled around in his chair, disclosing a firm, clean-shaven face with a hard mouth and humorous, deep-set eyes.

"Hubbard, do you think that you were cut out for the dry-goods business?" said he with characteristic abruptness.

This question struck Hubbard as being ludicrous and he chuckled a laugh. "I guess I wasn't cut out for anything, Mr. Weatherby. I loathe the dry-goods business and every other kind of business."

Mr. Weatherby had evidently been on the point of giving Hubbard a little well-meant advice, but this chuckle and the defiance of business—business that seemed to successful Fred Weatherby the be-all and end-all of life—irritated him and he said curtly:

"Well, I don't think it is honest to fritter away our time if you hate your work. The results show that you hate it. Now, there are lots of men who would be glad to step into your shoes and who would give good satisfaction, and if you feel as you do about business I think that the best thing you can do is to try to earn your living by being idle for a while."

Hubbard stood with a shamefaced expression on his features and said not a word. He rolled and unrolled the picture of Mr. Burnham nervously.

"I'll give you two weeks' notice because I knew your father. That will give you time to find another place. This isn't an eleemosynary institution, and I can't keep a young man who hasn't the interests of the house at heart. What is that you have in your hand?"

Weatherby's keen eyes had seen the picture, and he surmised that it was some of the stock clerk's work, for his reputation as a draughtsman had come upstairs.

"Oh, it's just a little thing I drew for fun."

Weatherby held out his hand for it, and much as if he had been in school and the teacher had asked him for a forbidden putty-blower, Hubbard handed the picture of Mr. Burnham to his employer.

Weatherby's eyes twinkled. He had a sense of humor and an eye for good drawing.

"So you draw these things with our time, on our letter-heads?"

It was an admirable likeness, as Weatherby saw. The shrewd mouth, the parsimonious nose and the mean eyes almost adjacent, produced with amazing fidelity the little Worcester man who had come out of the woods with nothing and was now said to be a millionaire.

Everything seemed black to Hubbard. He had come to look far into the future, and he always supposed that he would somehow manage always to keep some kind of a place to make enough to eke out the small income from his father's estate. He had been three months getting his present position after leaving college, and Weatherby had only given it to him because he had been a chum of Hubbard's father. With no recommendation from Slater, Weatherby & Co., how was he to get anything to do?

Weatherby looked at the picture for fully three minutes before he said another word, and during that time Hubbard stood the picture of hopelessness.

"My boy," said Mr. Weatherby finally, "the trouble with you is that you're in the wrong place. You're an artist—a natural artist—and you have it in you to make more money in a year than you could make in a lifetime with us or any other business house. If Burnham saw that he'd want to tear it up because it brings out all he'd like to forget. Now I'll tell you what I'll do. I know Colonel McCloud, of The Earth, and if you can draw for reproduction in a newspaper I can get you a position. Only, you'll want to put some energy into yourself there. Newspapers don't keep drones. Go get your hat and I'll walk down with you right away."

This was Weatherby's way of doing things and it explained his success.

As for Hubbard, he felt as if the heavens had suddenly opened before him. He had never taken his drawing seriously. It had been an amusement—a way of passing time—but that it should be a means of bread-winning to him had never entered his mind.

He went downstairs jubilant. Dawson noticed his expression and said, "What's up? Been taken into partnership?"

"Sure," said Hubbard. "Weatherby goes out in my favor. Going to take my place in the stock."

"Good for Weatherby," said Dawson. "The stock will be kept in order."

Weatherby and Hubbard walked briskly through Avon Place to Washington Street. Weatherby's briskness was his nature.

Arrived at the office of The Earth, Weatherby, who knew Colonel McCloud well, walked straight into his room, not heeding the interrogations of the hall-boy.

Colonel McCloud was busy—a constant habit of his—and he looked up with a scowl, but when he saw Weatherby, "Hello, Fred," he roared. He always roared. He had formerly been a sea captain of a fishing schooner off the Banks, and the fog had never gotten out of his throat. He was red-faced, side-whiskered, and as rough as he was ready.

"What's new in dry goods? Speak quick, for I'm going to take the one o'clock train for New York and I've got to get my lunch."

Hubbard looked at the clock. It was half-past twelve. His heart sank. Of course nothing could be done until the Colonel came back and he had hoped that things would be pushed right through for him. But he did not know McCloud any better than he knew Weatherby. The editor would attend to half a dozen things besides taking a hasty bite at Young's, and yet he would catch the train inevitably. And Weatherby would do what he had set out to do if he had to go as far as Providence with the Colonel to do it. That's why both of them were eminently successful.

"It's nothing about dry goods. I won't take five minutes, but I will take that because it will be worth it to you. This is my friend Hubbard Wilson, and I've brought him here to draw a picture of you, and then I want you to give him a place on your staff. Make a place if there isn't one vacant. He'll keep his end up all right."

This was cold-blooded, to say the least, and if Hubbard had been alone he would have been frightened to death at the grim, ruddy-faced old sea-dog and newspaper magnate rolled into one, but for once he was quick. Weatherby's encouraging words were tonic. He took a letter-head of Slater, Weatherby & Co.'s out of his pocket, and he saw Weatherby smile as he recognized it, and that gave him more heart.

"Say, Fred," roared the Colonel, "you ought to have been a newspaper man. You have more nerve than any of us."

To an accompaniment of breezy talk Hubbard worked swiftly. He was now doing what he loved to do, and was nerved to his best by the prospect that lay before him. In three minutes he had finished and handed the drawing to Weatherby. "By Jove!" exclaimed Weatherby, breaking into a hearty laugh. "That's your photograph. You'll never better that."

The Colonel took it and looked over his spectacles at it for nearly a minute before he spoke. To Hubbard it seemed hours.

Finally he grunted, "I'll show that to Maria," and put the picture in his pocket. Then in his roaring voice he said to Hubbard, as he rose: "Young man, you're the fellow I've been looking for—quick and accurate. I guess Mr. Taylor, the art editor, has some work for you to do. I'll take you in to see him on my way out. Fred, I'm obliged to you. Now get out of here, for I've got to catch that train or there'll be the deuce to pay."

Bench Shows and Blue-Ribbon Dogs

By H. L. Fitz Patrick

"'Faithful an' true'—them be words i' Scriptur', an' Faithful an' true
'I be fan' upo' four short legs ten times lur one upo' two."

MOST dogs, like their masters, owe much to environment. Well nurtured and raised with wisdom, a dog will be the most trustworthy of companions and a very Turveydrop in deportment; yet the same creature unfriended, ignored and forced to maintain existence by a never-ceasing strife with its fellows and mankind, will grow up a snarling, vicious cur, and, at last, likely be killed for some misdeed.

In the diminishment of rabies and in other instances facts may be marshaled to prove that our dogs are at a higher point of development than they have ever been before. One reason is that the public has been educated through the bench shows to value only the pure types, which, with the general improvement of the canine breeds, is the purpose for which these exhibitions were first instituted. It is usually as dangerous to coddle and make a family pet of a stray mongrel as to fool with dynamite. The bench shows, by exploiting what is good, teach the sorts to avoid in caninity. Once the lesson is learned the visitor, whether rich or poor, is thereafter not to be content with the ownership of anything but a blue-blooded dog. This does not necessarily mean the ownership of a blue-ribbon dog, but it is a step in the path that leads to bench-show glory.

THE POOR FANCIER'S ADVANTAGE

The new fancier of wealth may spend a small fortune for a great dog and so be in the winning honors from the start, but, in the highest degree of bench-show success—the winning with dogs of the owner's breeding—the rich and poor amateurs have an even chance in the race for the blue ribbons. The latter often has the best of it, for he devotes usually his own time to the dogs, while the rich man must depend on salaried kennelmen. In rare instances blue-ribbon dogs have been picked up very cheap by good judges. Quite a noted Greyhound was bought as a puppy for twenty dollars from a curbstone vender in Manhattan, and Trafalgar, a famous Bull-Terrier, was bought for not much more from an Adirondack guide by one of a hunting party who knew the points of the breed.

MR. C. G. HOPTON'S L'AMBASSADOR

CROSSING THE CONTINENT TO SHOW

Under the cognizance of the American Kennel Club there are from fifty to sixty bench shows held each year throughout the United States. Many of the best dogs are sent with proper pride by their owners to the shows each season at New York, Boston, St. Louis, Chicago and Providence, or on a smaller circuit near the home kennels. Philadelphia has this season rejoined the bench show fold and San Francisco has also a fine show, the culminating point of the Pacific Coast circuit. The smooth-coated St. Bernard, Le Prince, Jr., was sent across the continent, after it had beaten the best dogs near the Golden Gate, to show at New York last year.

The number of dogs benched at a show depends, of course, on the size of the city or town in which it is held, but, large or small, no bench show, save of a specialty club, is regular until it has the sanction of the American Kennel Club. This means, in brief, that the premiums will be paid, the judging fairly conducted, and that the methods of improving on nature, termed "faking up" a dog, will not be tolerated. The A. K. C. is omnipotent in its powers. It was established in 1884, at New York, ten years later than the founding of the English Kennel Club. The latter, however, is a self-constituted power to rule the dog affairs of the United Kingdom, which commenced with fifty members, but, since 1883, has had a large associate membership, which has no voice in the management.

CONGRESSMAN RUPPERT'S ROUGH-COATED ST. BERNARD, LE ROYAL

Within two years the English Kennel Club has had a rival in the Ladies' Kennel Association, which, although limited to women, has a membership of 800. This organization has the energy of youth, and it has established a reciprocal agreement with the American Pet Dog Club of New York, which is maintained by ladies, with Mrs. Walter C. Stanton as President.

The American Kennel Club differs from the English club in being a congress of delegates from the different specialty and kennel clubs—sixty in all—who meet annually to elect officers and a board of governors. This, it will be seen, is a difference quite opposed to the conservative English principle of organization. The A. K. C. has had but four Presidents, Major J. M. Taylor, Mr. Elliot Smith, Mr. W. H. Child and Mr. August Belmont—the latter in office since 1886; and three Secretaries, E. Sheffield Porter, G. Edward Osborne and A. P. Vredenburgh, who has held office since 1886. In 1889 individual owners were admitted to associate membership. Dogs with unknown pedigrees but of recognized breeds may be listed for show purposes on the A. K. C. books, but no dog will be registered unless of established breeding. To date, the A. K. C. has registered the pedigrees of 54,327 dogs.

THE MISSION OF THE SPECIALTY CLUB

The specialty clubs are organizations to promote the development and encourage the breeding of certain breeds. The American Spaniel Club is the oldest and strongest, and perhaps the youngest is the St. Bernard Club, organized in 1898 to take the place of a previous organization which had disbanded. The clubs devoted to Fox-Terriers, Collies, Bull-Terriers and Pointers have particularly strong membership. In this respect a club's standing fluctuates with the rise and fall of its breed in popularity. At the Westminster show the specialty clubs make a brave front in the way of prizes to supplement the regular premium list. There are countless cups and pieces of plate offered, ranging in value from $300 to $50, in the more important breeds, open, however, only to competition among the members of each club. The specialty clubs are especially keen in offering prizes for dogs bred in this country and in promoting produce stakes. The leading exhibitors in each breed, as a matter of course, are the most active members of the specialty clubs. When a dog not owned by a specialty club member sweeps the boards, as Ivel Rustic has done in the Bulldog classes since his début at New York last year, it is usually because he is owned in England, for since amateur fanciers are nothing if not gregarious, the specialty club is usually the first goal of the American beginner.

SOME HIGH-PRICED RIBBON WINNERS

There have been many changes in canine fashions since the first Westminster show, when Mastiffs, Newfoundlands and Pugs were conspicuous in the array of some 400 types on the benches. Newfoundlands were ousted out of favor by the St. Bernards, often called the "Holy Breed." Including rough and smooth coated, there were 126 at the 1899 New York show, and for the same divisions this year over $500 was on the premium list in twenty-one classes. Colonel Jacob Ruppert, Jr., who made his bow this session in Congress from the Fifteenth District of New York, is President of the St. Bernard Club and one of the best-known exhibitors. Miss Anna and the Empress of Contoocook, respectively rough and smooth types, were two of his noted winners. When last seen at New York the former was catalogued at $2500 and the latter at $5000. One of his best now is Le Royal, a splendidly headed, rough-coated dog, bought for a long price last year from Mr. C. A. Pratt, of Arkansas, who bought the great Sir Bedivere from W. C. Reick a few years ago for $10,000. Le Royal, like Le Prince, Jr., F. H. Bushnell's smooth-coated California winner, is by Le Prince and was bred in Arkansas. Perhaps the most conspicuous exhibitor of St. Bernards is Mr. Frank J. Gould, who brought out the large, massive and densely coated Marvelcroft at the last New York show, which is undoubtedly the best of her sex in the country. His kennel is at Irvington, and, although a new hand, the Gould string will be very strong in the puppy classes this year, as well as in his imported division.

Mr. George J. Gould has been a successful exhibitor of Pointers for some years, and he enjoys shooting over the blue ribbon dogs at his hunting preserves in South Carolina in the season. Two Pointer amateurs, also in the millionaire division, are Mr. Clarence H. Mackay, who had some fine importations at the last New York show, and Mr. W. Gould Brokaw, who owns in Sir Walter the best Pointer of the times.

Cactus, long renowned as the handsomest of the English Setters, is now only a memory at the shows, but the Setters of this and other types are perhaps the leading classes at the Westminster exhibitions, and nearly all are homebreds.

In Field Spaniels, Mr. Rowland P. Keasbey's Saybrook Popcorn is a noted winner, and at the 1899 New York show Mr. Keasbey also won the team prize for the best exhibit of four. Mr. Keasbey is another wealthy amateur fancier, a note that may be made against the names of H. K. Bloodgood, Moses Taylor, Mrs. D. W. Evans and many more who bench Field or Cocker Spaniels. Persons of this sort in the "fancy" indicate an abiding vogue for a breed at the shows.

THE RECORDS OF FAMOUS KENNELS

Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan has the best kennel of Collies in this country. From old Sefton Hero and Rufford Ormonde to his latest importations he has paid fully $60,000 for prize Collies. Mr. Morgan has also bred many grand specimens. His kennels are managed by Rob Armstrong and are at the Morgan place at Highland Falls. Armstrong and his brother Jack, who has charge of

Mr. George Gould's Pointers, are Englishmen and types of a class who earn good salaries there by handling dogs. A large number of Americans have taken up the calling, and with the increase in the number of wealthy enthusiasts this occupation will open up a profitable field of industry for young men willing to master its secrets. Mastiffs are now a class light in number at our shows, and the last great homebred brought out was J. L. Winchell's Beaufort's Black Prince, which was sent abroad four years ago and beat everything in England but Peter Piper. When still a young dog death cut short his career. The leading Mastiff of the day is by Beaufort's Black Prince, but a decided contrast in color, for instead of a light fawn he is the darkest of fawn brindles. This is Black Prince Brampton, owned by Dr. C. A. Louguest, who has also the strongest string of Bloodhounds, another breed no longer in great esteem as far as numbers go. Deerhounds, of the type of Sir Walter Scott's Maida, are also far from being a craze, but A. L. Page has some fine descendants of the royally bred Dunrobin. Russian Wolfhounds, of the kindred breeds, are more in favor. Mr. George Gould's children have one called Czar, that is a great pet and has won its share of blue ribbons. The fleet Greyhounds have many admirers, and if Jackrabbit coursing was not under the ban in the East there would be still more to exhibit, just as the Hempstead field trials have brought the Beagles into the fashionable category.

BULLS, TERRIERS AND BULL-TERRIERS

Most kennels use a distinctive prefix or suffix to their dogs' names, which is registered at the A. K. C., so that no other owner may "jump the claim." Mr. Morgan uses Cragston; Mr. August Belmont, Blemton, once the mightiest slogan of them all in the Fox-Terrier classes, and the Rutherfurds use Warren. In the kennels, too, the blue-ribbon dogs have usually a pet name less cumbersome than their registered name. Mr. Rustic, for instance, is Billy. In Bulldogs, [illegible] of this present [illegible]ge, the homebred stock is fast coming [illegible] distinction. A famous dog now is [illegible] Hopton's L'Ambassador, which has [illegible]ned from England with a share of [illegible] ribbons. Mr. Tyler Morse's Beaver kennels show yearly some fine young [illegible] breds. Since the retirement of Dr. R. Huidekoper's Cardona the Bull-Terrier [illegible]ges seem to be in want of a strong individual for the winner's class. Mr. Frank Dole, with the imported Woodcote Wonder, and Starlight, a winner at twelve years old, a rare age for the breed to show well, has won many prizes. Mr. J. Lorillard Arden, however, has run him close and has some beautiful types of the breed. Bull-Terriers are very well supported. Two notable exhibitors are Mr. C. Albert Stevens and Mr. William Faversham.

The Terrier breeds are now represented by the best lot of dogs ever seen in "these United States." In England sixteen types are recognized, but the A. K. C. can go one better by producing the American product, the Boston Terrier. This breed originated in Boston thirty years ago, the fountain-head being an imported cross between the Bulldog and the white English Terrier called Judge and owned by Mr. Robert C. Hooper in his Harvard days. Whether light or heavy weight, the type is a brindle and white dog, short and blocky in body, with a round head, showing intelligence and activity. Mr. L. A. Burritt's Tom shows the strongest type of the Boston. The breed is now in great fashion and demand.

SOME FANCY TERRIER BREEDS

Of the true Terrier breeds, the largest and most valuable in varied merits, the Airedale, was not known at our shows in strength until last year, when Mr. J. Lorillard Arden bought for $3500 the three best of the breed in England, viz., Clonmel Marvel, Clonmel Sensation and Clonmel Veracity. Mr. A. DeWitt Cochrane, Mr. Henry D. Steers and Mr. Perry Tiffany are also keen on the breed. Two notable Fox-Terriers were also imported last year: Go Bang, that cost Mr. G. M. Carnochan $2500 in England, the highest price ever paid for a Fox-Terrier, and Claude Duval, which Mr. Carnochan purchased afterward for nearly as much money. They were the acknowledged champions of the wire and smooth coated Fox-Terriers abroad and they won all their classes at New York, besides being the spectacular sensation of the show. Irish Terriers, to cut short this résumé of the blue-ribbon wearers of the "varmint" strains, have a representative in Mr. M. Bruckheimer's Masterpiece that is believed to have a great future. He is an American-bred specimen and was first seen at the Pet Dog Club show, where he won the special prize for the best dog of all breeds, a wonderful achievement for a puppy.

A BLACK PUG AND A PINK SPANIEL

Pet dogs have had many leaders since the fawn Pugs ceased to be the Beau Brummels of the boudoirs and lawns. Poodles may be said to have an established place—the influence largely of the importation of Milo, first of the curly Poodles, by Mr. H. G. Trevor, in 1889. The Prince Charlie and Ruby Spaniels and Yorkshire Terriers are also permanencies, and, like the Japanese Spaniels, each has in turn for a season or two been a craze. Now the white and fluffy Maltese Terriers are very fashionable, but the greatest novelties are the black Pugs and the Pomeranians. The latter have been the fad in England for some seasons. The most famous specimen in this country is Nubian Rebel, a towzled-furred, $1500 beauty, owned by Mrs. Smyth, of Philadelphia. This dog won at the Pet Dog Club show and has a string of over twenty-five blue ribbons won in England, where among others Nubian Rebel beat Tina, the Pomeranian that took the prize for the best dog at the Ladies' Kennel Association show at London last June.

CHAMPION MILO, OWNED BY H. G. TREVOR, SOUTHAMPTON, L. I.

The black Pugs have the muzzles and characteristics of the old type. Candace, the first high-class one seen in this country, was brought out by Mrs. Howard Gould at the Pet Dog Club show. The Yorkshires, however, may boast of an honor above any attained by their pet-dog brethren, for Miss Maria Louisa Pool dedicated one of her books to the Yorkshire, Orlando, "most gay, most sagacious, most devoted of companions."

With Our Fighters in the Philippines

By Albert J. Beveridge

Copyright, 1900, by The Curtis Publishing Company

THE system and order of our operations in Manila and throughout the Philippines is manifest the very first step you take. The city of Manila and, indeed, our lines everywhere, are carefully sentineled, and the sentries are vigilant and strict. General Otis gave me a pass within and through our lines, and the privilege of carrying arms; but I lost it in one of my rides into the interior. He then issued the following:

OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES MILITARY GOVERNOR IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

MANILA, P. I., May 13, 1899.

PASS:

TO ALL GUARDS AND PATROLS:

The bearer, U. S. Senator Albert J. Beveridge, and party, have permission to pass at their pleasure within and through the lines of the United States forces, and to carry arms.

By Command of MAJOR-GENERAL OTIS:

C. H. MURRAY,
Major and Inspector-General, U. S. V.,
Secretary.

This enabled me to take a great number of side excursions without a waste of time, and afforded opportunities for a study of our soldiers, and, what was more important, of the common people, as valuable as it was rare.

The whole atmosphere of our army is a good-humored but fervent desire not only for action, but for danger. The man, the company or the regiment who has not been under fire is pitied and commiserated by those who have had that good fortune. A song has grown up, as songs do grow up among soldiers and among the people, which illustrates this pity, bordering on contempt, felt by the men who have been under fire for those who have not had what they consider such excellent luck. It is sung to the tune of The Streets of Cairo, and a single verse will illustrate it:

"He never smelled the smokeless powder,
Never heard the Mauser bullet sing;
He never slept behind the trenches,
Poor little 'rooky' thing."

I have heard not only the privates, but even the officers, sing this song.

A SOCIETY MAN WHO FIGHTS FOR LOVE OF IT

It may be thought that I am unduly emphasizing the militant quality of our men. Instead of that I have not been able to express an adequate idea of the intensity of that spirit. The following illustration may be supported by many others like it; and they all show that the militant spirit is common not only to all of our soldiers, but to all young Americans to-day. Whether he wears the uniform or not, the American is a soldier by instinct.

The second time I was at our extreme front in Luzon I met a young man who is of one of the first families of the South. He is wealthy, highly accomplished, and is what is known as "a society man." All that is charming or delightful in American life is his. You would not imagine that this low-spoken, rich-voiced, quiet-mannered gentleman, with all the characteristics of the ultra-fashionable American "swell," could be induced to fight in any manner, and much less to fight in the deadly contest of arms. Yet he had left all the allurements with which life and fortune and his own talents had surrounded him and enlisted as a private soldier in Cuba. There he had risen, by cool gallantry, to the position of a commissioned officer. He had won his promotion absolutely without influence and solely by his courage and soldierly qualities.

He had been in every fight up to the capitulation of Santiago. The fever had seized him and his health had been impaired. One might have imagined that his desire for army experience would have been satiated; but instead of satisfying the thirst for war, the hardships and dangers of the Cuban campaign only put a keener edge on it. So he traveled half way around the world, and here I found him in the interior of Luzon, not a member of the army, but, nevertheless, wearing a khaki uniform and seeking further opportunities to fight. Nor would he wait until the regular engagements came on. I saw him up at five o'clock in the morning, mounting his horse with a small scouting party, going on one of those desperate reconnaissances which, to the mere observer, look like expeditions to certain death. On one occasion he and two companions charged a group of sixty Filipino soldiers, and he himself captured four of them. I saw him the evening of the day on which the exploit was performed. He had already forgotten it and was "nosing around" for some further adventure.

THE SPLENDID DARING OF THE AMERICAN SCOUTS

These reconnaissances are made every day. We never hear of them back here at home; but a few perfectly fearless men are in the saddle constantly and ride, with an apparent disregard of all danger, far beyond our lines into those of the enemy. These men carry their lives in their hands every moment. Sometimes they are ambushed; sometimes they find themselves almost surrounded; sometimes they come suddenly upon a large force of hundreds of the enemy, and very frequently, indeed, they boldly, and to a mere observer, apparently madly, charge a whole division. A book as fascinating as Froissart's Chronicles could be written describing nothing but the desperate adventures of the scouting parties of American soldiers in the Philippines. It is not a reckless exposure of life, however. It is a necessary thing. If the English in South Africa had availed themselves of the scouting system and the scouts we employ in the Philippines, the dispatches would not have been so full of British reverse and repulse.

HOW THE BLUE-EYED DOCTOR SPENT HIS HOLIDAY

These expeditions are led by officers, sometimes very young men, and sometimes men well past middle life. But always there is the same absolute fearlessness, the same dash, the same exhaustless endurance, the same vigilance, the same almost abnormal alertness. Indeed, if there is a characteristic which might be considered next to that of courage among our soldiers in the Philippines, it is that of alertness. It is as though every pore were an eye and every drop of blood a separate intelligence.

The incident of the Southern society man may be thought an exception. No; it is not. His was not the case of one who had grown so blasé that for the sake of experiencing a new sensation he was willing to risk his life. It was merely satisfying an inherent and what would appear to be a common craving for combat which distinguishes all young Americans whom I met in the Philippines and the far East, whether they were soldiers or civilians. How common this quality is an incident will show:

A party of young physicians went from Johns Hopkins University, as a commission to study Oriental diseases and especially those of the Philippine Islands. I became well acquainted with this company of soldiers of science. None of them was over thirty-five. One now occupies the chair of pathology in one of the greatest of American universities. Another is at present professor of nervous diseases in another university of equal eminence; and so on. The youngest member of this party was a small, pale-faced, blue-eyed, yellow-haired fellow, whom you might take for a Sunday-school teacher, but never for the steel-nerved fighter that he really was, and is. The day of the advance in the Antipolo campaign he and three of his companions went out to where General Lawton was observing and directing the movement. They had no business there. They were scientists, and their place was not on the firing line; but they had been working night and day—sometimes all night, too—investigating diseases in Manila, and they had a right to take a day or two off if they wanted it. But the firing line was a singular place for scientists, was it not? They were perfectly satisfied until the artillery began to boom and the steamlike puffs of smoke rose from the guns. Then the little Sunday-school-teacher-looking doctor became very nervous. Soon a village burst into flame, and it looked as though serious fighting might occur. He could restrain himself no longer. He asked me to get permission from General Lawton for him to join the soldiers making the advance. I asked General Lawton, and the latter, in his characteristic way, with a twinkle in his eye (for how he loved a fighter!), said:

"I will give him no permission, but there's the road, and there's the soldiers, and you say he has a horse. Well, I don't see anybody holding him. I reckon the horse ain't lame, is it?"

That was enough. I wrote a note, introducing him to Colonel McCoy, of the First Colorado, and away he rode at a mad gallop to join that regiment and become a part of the common fighting soldiery in that campaign. He reminded me for all the world of a schoolboy out for a picnic. The next day we met the column which he had joined, in another portion of the country. It was very hot; the men had been constantly moving; there had been little or no real work, although the fighting had been brisk enough to keep up interest. At the head, by Colonel McCoy's side, rode the doctor, happy as a girl at Easter, and looking very much like one in face and eye. I learned from his temporary comrades that, during the time he was with them, he had, with foolhardy daring, rushed into every point of danger, or rather that promised danger, that he could find or imagine. Not belonging to the regiment, he was under nobody's command, and could seek an opportunity to get killed when, where and how he pleased. It was only fun, only sport, only relaxation, only a vacation to this young scientist, who, if you were to meet him in your home, you would believe to be the most peace-loving of men.

AMERICA A MILITANT, NOT A MILITARY NATION

And yet it is sometimes said that we are a people of peace; that we are distinctly non-military and non-militant. This is true in its highest sense. We are a people of peace; but we are a people of peace in the only way in which a people is ever able to preserve its peace, aye, and its liberties too, and that is by being a people of war, if need be.

As a matter of fact we are by far the most militant nation on earth; not the most military, but the most militant. It could not be otherwise. Courage, daring, willingness to fight and die, is one of the great attributes of liberty, its highest attribute, perhaps. That is how we came to have liberty. And now that we have it, it would be a sorry circumstance if the great quality which procured it should become atrophied.

We come of a fighting race. It would be as fell a development for our future, as it would be a remarkable incident in history, if the fighting qualities of our race should die out of us. And so the military instinct, the emphasis of which in our soldiers in the Philippines I have recorded, is not at all extraordinary. Its absence, or a less degree of it, would have been the really remarkable thing—and as melancholy as remarkable. How could our soldiers be less than what they are? Consider not only the characteristics of our race, but think of our history. Every step of our national progress has been made at the expense of the blood of our bravest and best. Through resistance to tyrants and tyranny; through the overthrow of undesirable institutions grown up among ourselves; against the resistance of Nature itself—over mountains, through wildernesses, across deserts, our fathers have fought their way, fought always, and fought ceaselessly.

There is hardly a young man in America who cannot justly boast a soldier of glorious service to his country within two generations. And so the American soldiers in the Philippines to-day are merely the old heroes of Lexington and Valley Forge, of Saratoga and New Orleans, of Buena Vista and Monterey, of our Indian wars, of Gettysburg and Missionary Ridge, and all those other fields of glory and of death, risen again from their sepulchres of fame and fighting once more at the old bugle's call, charging once more with the old resistless spirit which never yet has known defeat, and never will! Yes, it is the old soldiers once again, of South and North, and East and West, tenting again on the old camp ground, albeit their bivouac now is far advanced, yes, even half way around the world, and over it shine the tropic stars.

THE YOUNG KANSAS BOY'S TIMELY WARNING

The qualities of bravery, generosity, unselfishness, which are distinctively characteristic of American manhood, are reproduced in italics in the American soldier in the Philippines. At least this was true of those whom I met.

It was natural that the war should catch, on its first high tide, specimens of our best spirit and most fervent disposition. On one occasion we had dismounted at one of the outposts on a road leading across an open plain, to and past the Filipino lines. Trees and undergrowth ended abruptly where our men were stationed. From there to the Filipino lines the space was absolutely free from vegetation, and quite flat. The road was a shining pathway of white. The Filipinos were visible to the naked eye, and under the glass every detail was distinct. It had not occurred to me that it was possible to shoot so far, so I unslung the glasses, and, fixing them, stood in the centre of the road some yards in the open, surveying with much pleasure the Filipino lines. Suddenly a young Kansas boy, who, with his comrades, constituted this outpost, came up to me and said:

"If you stand here long, Senator, you will get h—ll shot out of you."

I said, "Why? Can they shoot so far?"

"Yes," he replied, "and farther, too. The air was full of boles here not an hour ago."

I quickly stepped out of danger, but the generous, thoughtful young fellow, who had given the warning, remained himself standing at the point where he declared they would "shoot h—ll out of" a man. He had great thought, caution and care when it came to danger for others, but for himself none at all.

It is a beautiful trait of self-forgetfulness which is characteristic of the American soldier in the Philippines. I did not get the name of this young man, but if he was not killed in some of the subsequent fights, he is in this country now, and will perhaps remember the incident.

THE RELIGIOUS SENTIMENT OF OUR FIGHTING MEN

Those who imagine that military qualities are inconsistent with religious feeling are in error. Most of the world's great soldiers have been inspired by profound religious conviction. Where the religious sentiment is not present in some form, war degenerates into mere physical struggle. The American soldier, from the beginning, has always felt that in some sense he was the soldier of the forces of light against the forces of darkness. His commanders have always called on the Almighty Father. Perhaps the deepest feeling of our nation is a religious feeling; and our national qualities are all present in our soldiers. The American soldier, therefore, like the American citizen, no matter what his surface conduct and attitude may be, has a deep religious sentiment as the basis of his character. Perhaps he does not manifest it. It may be that he would himself deny it; but you have only to put him to the touchstone of large events to see that it is there.

It is not the practice of our race, as individuals, to wear our hearts upon our sleeves, to advertise our love, to proclaim our religion to the world. These are the sacred things of life, and men of our race treasure them in silence and in secrecy. It is so with the American soldier in the Philippines. The boys may be rude, apparently; it is the rudeness of the excessive vitality of youth. They may even be profane in speech; it is only one form of the manifestation of their superabundant energy. But so far as irreverence is concerned, I think it very rare.

Most soldiers have Bibles. I would venture the belief that the immense majority of soldiers whom I met in the Philippines had a Bible, or at least a Testament. Going into a bookstore in St. Paul, to lay in a supply of books for the ocean trip, I noticed a strong, serviceable Testament, so stoutly bound that it could endure a good deal of hardship, so large in print that it was easy to read and yet so small that it could be carried in the vest or shirt pocket. I was informed that the Minnesota soldiers, as they were starting for the Philippines, had, nearly all, supplied themselves with these Testaments. It was an incident full of meaning, was it not? Here were young men going to war on the other side of the world. They were of the vital producing classes of our great Northwest. Their last act, before they left their State, was to provide themselves with that Book of Books which had been the comfort and the stay of their fathers, and of their fathers' fathers. They carried with them, in that volume, the counsels of their Christian mothers, which, after all, are, in various forms, the divine words of the Master.

GIGANTIC APPETITES THE RULE

Except when in a fight or on a flying march in pursuit of the enemy, the men are great eaters. Even then they are still great eaters, but do not get the opportunity, and do not grumble for their food as they do at other times if the meal is delayed for a moment. Here, again, they are the type of their race. They are devourers. Their hunger appears unappeasable. They will perform any service, but must have their meals, "chow" as they call it, regularly and in abundance. On shipboard, on the Fourth of July, very severe sports, requiring immense physical exertion, had been planned. They were delayed until an hour before the noon meal. The men who had entered for the contests refused to proceed until they had had their food. They ate with immense heartiness and, without giving a moment for digestion, dashed into the exhausting physical contests.

Ordinarily the food served to our soldiers is excellent. Under a bamboo tree, on the Bagbag River, I ate as fine steak as will be served to you in very good American hotels. A private soldier cut it for me from a quarter of beef, and I ate what they ate. As far as the railroad communications extend, sterilized water is brought to the men daily. An incident occurred which is highly illustrative of a general belief and the actual condition. Some good fathers and mothers from one of our Northwestern States thought to send their boys some excellent food, fearing that that which they had in the Philippines was inferior. They sent them certain canned vegetables and meats. The box came and the boys opened it with gleeful anticipations. They took out precisely the same brand and quality of canned goods to which they had been accustomed day after day.

THE "THINKING BAYONETS" IN THE TRENCHES

The American soldier has been called a "thinking bayonet." That is what the American soldier in the Philippines is. The general intelligence of the faces is remarkable. I cannot speak for the regulars who are now there, but the volunteers, and the regulars, too, who were there during my stay, were distinctly intellectual in appearance and speech. A great many of them were college graduates. My recollection is that the men of one entire company were from Leland Stanford, Jr., University. A private soldier gave me a set of Napier's Peninsular War, in French, which he could read himself. There is none of the stupidity, none of the fatalistic stolidity, none of the fatness of mind which is said to characterize the Russian or the Turkish common soldier. The American soldier in the Philippines has none of the Hessian qualities. If he is engaged in a war of subjugation, as is charged, it is a thing which he has thoroughly thought out because he is capable of thinking it out, and is so active in mind that he could not help it if he wanted to.

THE FAITH OF OUR FIGHTING MEN IN OUR GLORIOUS FUTURE

Though the American soldier in the Philippines has no fatalistic stolidity, it cannot be truthfully said that he has not fatalism. It has been said that the compounding of many different races in the great crucible of the American continent has produced a new race superior to all the rest. This is the belief of the American soldier in the Philippines. As a people, he thinks the American people superior to any other nation on the globe. As a class, he thinks the American soldier superior to any other soldier on earth. To him, nothing in the world is of great importance but the American Republic. To him, that great Republic holds in its hands the future of the world. To him, his masterful race is the saving and redeeming force from which the world must draw its new youth now and in the future, as, in the past, the Old World, from age to age, has renewed its youth from the overwhelming vitality of the master race of each particular period.

The American soldier doubts not that we are chosen by an infinite wisdom for an infinite purpose. Mankind has progressed, not steadily, but by successive high tides of humanity which in one age we call the Greeks, and in another we call the Romans, and in a third we call the English. The American soldier profoundly believes that the highest, strongest, noblest tide of all is rising to-day, and that the philosophic historian of the distant future will call it the Reign of the American. This belief in the divine destiny of the American people is a faith so profound with the American soldier—as it is with the American citizen—that he is not conscious of it, just as we are not conscious of any of the elemental functions that sustain us, such as breathing or the beating of the heart, or the action of the blood in feeding the changing tissues. It is a belief so deep that trifling attention is not constantly given to it, just as our hourly attention is not given to the sacred things, such as our affections, because the little things, such as our business, intervene; although for those affections alone we would be willing to lay down our lives. So the American soldier's faith in the divine mission of America is a part of his being.

THE INSTINCT OF SOVEREIGNTY

If the Filipinos feel that our soldiers have a bearing of superiority, it is nothing more than the superiority they feel, in varying degrees, toward the entire world. Not that they have the contempt for other people that the barbarian has; not that they have the egotism of the overrefined; but that they feel a racial virtue within their veins which they know is not in any other veins on earth, and which gives them a sort of instinct of sovereignty. The American soldier looks the master; his face is the face of nobility; his stride is the stride of a prince. In the Philippines, in China, in Japan, he looks the lord of the land. He has a fine loftiness of conduct. He goes every place. All doors open before him. He absorbs everything. He has the spirit of acquisitive inquisitiveness. In Japan, every street of every port at which he touches is full of him. The shops are infested by him. He inspects the palaces with the curiosity of intelligence. He wanders among the temples of the ancient gods, a modern Omar meditating a new Rubáiyát. At the giant tombs of the dethroned Shoguns he sits and muses on the ceaseless tide of time which changes all and finally submerges all. He is a learner at first hand. No printed books or papers for him when the book of the world is before him. No painted map for him when the chart of the earth itself is beneath his feet. No dry nor fanciful account for him of the strange peoples of humanity's first homes, when he may see and know and absorb the spirit of those peoples themselves.

The American soldier in the Philippines will, by his original information gathered at first hand, make America more familiar with the Orient than any other people on earth. We Americans are infinitely logical. The expansion of our territory was only the minor premise of the great syllogism of expansion through which we are passing. The expansion of our knowledge of the world has been far greater than the spread of our dominion. We have more of the world; we know more of the world; we are better prepared to bless the world and thus to bless ourselves. The great people of the American Republic, from whom flow all our large and elemental movements, feel that the day of our empire, as a sovereign force of earth, is in its first gray dawn; and of this mighty, irresistible and imperial common people of the American Republic, the ones who feel this most intensely are those matchless soldiers of that common people who followed their flag over eight thousand miles of sea and planted it upon and above the Gibraltar and the garden of the great Pacific and of all the East—the Philippine Archipelago.

The Story of the Pony Express

The Fast Mail Over the Plains

By Homer Bassford

THE death of Alexander Majors, which occurred in Chicago not long ago, removed the last of three men who had to do with a unique and interesting enterprise of the pioneer days of the West. Alexander Majors, usually called Colonel Majors, was of the firm of Russell, Majors & Waddell, who owned, for a great many years, the most notable stage-coach system on the Western plains. It was in the management of the Pony Express, however, celebrated on its own account and broadly advertised by Mark Twain, Buffalo Bill and innumerable story writers, that greater renown came to this Western firm along about the early sixties.

Colonel Majors, always willing to talk about the bold enterprise of his frontier firm, was never so happy as when explaining some point in connection with the Pony Express. In the old mining exchange at Kansas City, years after the last pony express post-house had rotted away in rain and blizzard, I have seen the white-bearded pioneer, in the centre of an intensely interested group, telling how Buffalo Bill acted on his first trip, how this rider or that escaped with his life after a terrifying experience, how the Buchanan message of 1860 was delivered at Sacramento in less than eight days, and then—Colonel Majors always ended his stories in one way—he would lower his voice and speak of the time when the telegraph came and, after that, the railroad—the telegraph to put an end to the Pony Express and the railroad to drive the stages into oblivion.

THE MEN WHO STARTED THE PONY EXPRESS

William H. Russell, who died at his home in Palmyra, Marion County, Missouri, in the spring of 1871, was the head of the firm that controlled the Pony Express. The third member was John W. Waddell, who died in the same year, at Lexington, on the Missouri River. The other partner survived them almost thirty years.

There has been much discussion at various times as to the identity of the person who first suggested the idea of a string of fleet ponies across the Western plains and mountains from the railroad at the Missouri River to the Golden Gate. Among the friends and acquaintances of Colonel Majors there was never a doubt as to this point. He said, many times, that a certain Duke Gwyn—and the Colonel was always sure to say that Gwyn's name had but one "n" in it—was the suggester of the plan to "run the ponies across the plains," again quoting Mr. Majors.

"He got the idea at Washington, I think," Mr. Majors said, "and he used to urge it whenever he could get an audience. For a long time no one paid any attention to him. But when business got more pressing, and when it was found that the stages would make about a given time and no better, we were approached for our views on the subject. After canvassing it for a while we finally agreed, in the fall of 1859, to go into the thing in good earnest.

LETTERS AT FIVE DOLLARS AN OUNCE

"We had first sounded a lot of the important business men of both the coast and Eastern cities as to its desirability. We learned that the fixed charge of five dollars a letter of one ounce weight would be welcomed as surprisingly low—that is, if we were able to keep our promise as to the delivery of a letter in something like eight days.

"The expense, at the outset, was enormous. We bought, in round numbers, six hundred hardy, healthy ponies, sure of foot and well tried. We employed all the brisk, dare-devil young men of good habits whom we could find; we built post-houses every ten miles, unless it chanced that our stage posts would serve the purpose. The ponies were stationed at these post-houses, with bedding for extra riders, food arrangements, and a keeper in charge. We paid each of our riders from $100 to $125 a month, and nearly all the boys were in love with the work, hard though it was. It sometimes happened that illness actually prevented a man from taking up his trip as assigned to him, but there was never difficulty in getting the other rider to take up at least one extra leg of the long journey across the plains.

"I have been asked, sometimes, whether the express stopped on account of weather. This question used to make me smile, but it has been repeated so many times that I have concluded that our present-day folks, who know little of pioneer life, are to be excused. Why, I have seen a man jump from the back of one pony to the back of another, in zero weather, and start away like the wind, with never a thought of entering the post-house for a drink or a sniff of the fire."

BUFFALO BILL THE BEST OF THEM ALL

Colonel Majors used to tell the story of how he met William F. Cody, "Buffalo Bill," and set him to work. Young Cody was practically the head of the family, his father having died when "Bill" was a boy, and it was from Majors that he earned his first money. He carried messages from one freighting outfit to another, and at that time these outfits were strung all the way from Westport to California. Cody was one of the first to have a place as rider tendered to him.

"Will Cody was one of the best men we ever had," Mr. Majors often said. "He was in love with the work, and although it was seen that the exposure was telling upon him, entering into it as he did, he never whimpered up to the time other plans took him out of it. He was always on time, whatever the weather, and sometimes when we were not looking for him there would be a whirl of dust, a shout, and Cody would be in ahead of schedule, before the change pony was out in waiting for him!"

No pony express ever started away from the Missouri River without the leather parcel bags, filled with letters and precious packages, locked tight, to be opened at the far other end. Highwaymen were not feared, for the reason that, as a rule, the money value of the mail, from the standpoint of the highwayman, was not much. But the Indians were a source of danger.

Colonel Majors, who was so closely identified with this strange enterprise, was, in the heyday of his career, the most important man of his type in the country. He was the moving, energetic figure in the establishment of a stage company that ran the only great, uninterrupted line across the plains. The company built a superb outfit of Concord coaches at a cost of about $600 apiece. There was a mail subsidy for a large sum applying east of Salt Lake; beyond that another company carried the mail. The first of these coaches left Atchison, Kansas, in the fall of 1859, and carried a great number of passengers, capacity being considered. This line, famous in its time, took the South Pass course, by Fort Fetterman and Fort Laramie, along the North Platte and Sweetwater to Fort Bridger, over Green River, through Echo Cañon, over the hills and down Emigration Cañon to Salt Lake. There was a branch running over from Julesburg to Denver, but at a later period the branch was discontinued and the main line ran to the Colorado capital. The post stations built at regular intervals for this service were used in many instances by the subsequent Pony Express.

There were whispers of Western telegraph and Western railroads at that time, but Majors and his men went on in their immense work until they were actually driven from it by electricity and steam.

"The Pony Express went first," said the old Colonel, "and it went in a hurry. We kept it going as long as we could, but when the telegraph came it snipped the life out of the thing almost in a day. What was the best thing we ever did with our pony service? Well, in the first place, we proved that it could be done, that our Western brain and brawn were equal to the task. Then we laid out a way for the railroads, for the great lines of to-day follow our tracks. We built up business, too, so that there was enough of it, when the railroads and wires came, to lend support to both. Of specific achievements I think that the most notable was the delivery of President Buchanan's last message. We were expecting it and had planned to break records by landing it in San Francisco under eight days. When the document was received by wire at St. Joe we had it put on thin paper. The best ponies and the best men were ready, for all along the line word had gone forward that we were out with the President's message. It was much under eight days when the message was all over San Francisco."

The Troubles of Martin Coy

By Joel Chandler Harris

WHEN Mrs. Nicklin, on the day of Colonel Flournoy's funeral, was informed by her husband that he had seen and spoken to Martin Coy, it is no wonder that she was astonished. Nor is it any wonder that she was ready to entertain and express a suspicion that the man was responsible for the Colonel's taking-off. For Martin had innocently and unintentionally made for himself the most gruesome and mysterious reputation that ever attached itself to the name and character of any other human being in Middle Georgia. He was a living ghost, and it was only necessary to mention his name to send children to bed silent and shivering, and to cause negroes to remain indoors. The reason there was no Ku Klux organization in that immediate region was because it was only necessary for one white man to say to another within hearing of a negro: "Have you heard the news? Martin Coy has sent word that he'll walk about to-night." This was sufficient to keep every negro at home on that particular night.

On one occasion, the evening before a State election, the negroes gathered in large numbers not far from town, ready to march in early next morning and mass themselves at the polls. A happy thought on the part of one of the young politicians of the community caused this plan to miscarry. He dressed himself up after the style of the "Fantastics," as modern mummers were called in the South just prior to the war, donned a hideous mask and a wig and beard of long, white hair, and went to the camping-place of the negroes. "Who dat?" cried one of their pickets. "Martin Coy!" replied the young man in a terrible voice, striking a match, as though he would see who his challenger was. But the negro gave him no such opportunity. Uttering one terrified shriek, he turned and fled, pursued, as he supposed, by Martin Coy. The shriek, coupled with the name of Martin Coy, was sufficient to stampede the colored citizens. The noise made by their feet as they ran along the firm clay road could be heard for some distance, and it sounded like the wild rush of a drove of cattle.

In a word, Martin Coy was a ghost, alive and palpable, and yet as mysterious and as unreal as the spooks that figure in fireside tales. No man in all that section had been better known than Martin Coy. For several years before the war he had made himself obnoxious to some and popular with others by running a distillery and keeping a "doggery" just outside the corporate limits of the town. This still and doggery soon became eyesores to the good citizens of the community. They attracted all the reckless and irresponsible characters in the county. Young men with no fondness for drink went there for the sake of the gayety of the crowd, and were soon drawn into the whirlpool of intemperance. On Saturday nights especially the orgies that took place at Coy's stillhouse were something to be remembered, especially by those who lived within earshot.

Various efforts were made to remove this blot upon the social order, but Martin Coy had taken sound advice so far as the legality of his business was concerned. Moreover, the attacks made on him in the courts aroused the real obstinacy of his nature, and when the citizens clubbed together and raised enough money to buy out a dozen such distilleries, he laughed at their offer. They had attacked him in the first place, and when they went at him with fair words they found him with his bristles up, as the saying is.

Now, in Georgia, since the days of George Whitefield's campaign against Satan, one of the specialties of the population is the ease and certainty with which it turns out revivalist preachers, one for each generation of sinners. Uncle Jimmy Dannielly, one of the most celebrated, flourished in the thirties, and Uncle Johnny Knight in the fifties. They were rough and uncouth in their ways, it may be, but they were men of genius, gifted with a power to stir the hearts of their fellows. Many strange stories are told of the results of their appeals to the consciences of their hearers. Camp-meeting, when a series of services was held in midsummer in the deep bosom of the green wood, was the special harvest-time of these revivalists. They preached day and night, and some very astonishing scenes occurred as the result of their ministrations.

Martin Coy never attended a camp-meeting, nor any other religious service, but it was while one of these meetings was in progress not far away that the good citizens of the community concluded to make him the object of special attention on the part of the preachers. Some of the young men got wind of the plan, and made haste to inform Martin that a vigorous attempt would be made to convert him.

"Well," said Martin, "I reckon I need something of that kind as bad as the next one. But they'll not pester me."

But on Saturday night, while the young men who favored Martin Coy with their presence and their patronage were in the midst of one of their revels, two or three revivalists, accompanied by a dozen or more of the most substantial citizens of the community, suddenly made their appearance. The young men had prepared for a great time. They had secured the services of Fiddling Bill, a one-legged negro, whose lack of limb and knack as a shoemaker had secured him many privileges, and had made all arrangements for what is called a "stag-dance." But Fiddling Bill, perceiving this grave and threatening accession to the crowd, slipped his fiddle into its bag, and was for slipping away. A word from Uncle Johnny Knight detained him.

"Don't go, William," said the great revivalist, his face beaming with smiles. "The fiddle is a vile thing when its strings are tuned to sin, but can't you tune it to play a hymn, William?"

The young men slipped away one by one, but Fiddling Bill remained, and so did Martin Coy, who was running a doubling of low-wines. "If you git dry," he remarked to his new guests, "you'll find a jug by the water bucket there." With that he went on attending to his business, chunking up the fire, and testing the strength of the run, which was slowly dribbling through the coils of the copper pipe into a cask, or half-barrel.

"We have come, Martin," said Rev. John Knight, "to have a little friendly talk with you about your soul."

"All right, neighbors and friends," responded Martin Coy cheerfully, "fire away."

"But first we'll have prayer," said the preacher; and they all knelt except Martin Coy. The fact that made Uncle Johnny Knight's prayers more impressive than those of any other person was their conversational tone. He addressed his Maker as if the Great Infinite were standing before him.

"We know, Lord, that our poor friend, Martin Coy, has a good heart and a clear understanding. If we know that, Heavenly Father, how much better do You know it! Oh, touch that heart, and make that understanding clearer, and lift our poor friend out of the depths of his misery. He doesn't know, Lord, how deep his misery is, but show it to him; make him feel it; brand the knowledge of it on his dead conscience, and bring that conscience to life, all quivering with the despair that leads to repentance."

The prayer was long and earnest, and grew more vivid toward the close; but it seemed to have no sort of effect on Martin Coy. Then a hymn was sung. Acting on orders, Fiddling Bill, after one or two trials, picked up the tune and carried it along very sweetly, the tones of the violin striking through the male voices with singular effectiveness.

"Purty good, Bill," remarked Martin Coy, with a grunt of satisfaction; "I'll give you a big drink for that when the company goes."

"Thanky, marster," said Fiddling Bill enthusiastically.

The upshot of it was that the efforts of the revivalists appeared to have no appreciable effect on Martin Coy, until at last one of them—it may have been Rev. Caleb Key—who, when all other tactics failed, had a way of seizing sinners by the scruff of the neck, metaphorically speaking, and shaking them over the bottomless pit, raised his hand and said solemnly:

"Martin Coy, in the presence of your God and these consecrated brethren, I denounce you for sowing the seeds of crime and sin in this community. Your wicked heart is harder than flint, but it will be broken. The day will come, be it soon or late, when you will hide from the light of the sun—when you will slink about in the darkness—when you will be a dead man, though yet alive! Mark my word, Martin Coy! the God of the widow and orphan will take vengeance on you!"

These words may not seem very impressive in print, but charged with the emphasis of a sonorous and living voice, and rising and falling with the inflections of an earnestness as strong as passion itself, they proved more effective than all the prayers and preaching. As soon as the words were uttered Martin Coy turned around and faced the revivalists, but they were already retiring. He advanced a pace or two and raised his hand as though he would attract their attention, but their backs were turned and they were swallowed by the darkness.

Then Martin Coy turned and looked at Fiddling Bill. "They give out some rough texts," he remarked.

"Dey sho does," said Fiddling Bill, who was staring at Martin Coy with wide-open eyes. "A little mo' an' de preacher would 'a' cussed you out."

"I wish he had 'a' done it on his own hook," suggested Martin Coy with a sigh. "Then I could 'a' grabbed him and give him a frailin' that would 'a' lasted him till the next time he pestered me."

"Would you 'a' done it, Marse Coy?" asked Fiddling Bill.

"As certain as gun's iron," replied Martin Coy.

"Well, suh!" commented the negro. After that there was silence for some time. The negro, narrowly watching Martin Coy, saw that he was in a soberer mood than usual: not that he was ever drunk. It was his boast, indeed, that, though he had made thousands of gallons of spirits, and had tasted nearly every gallon of it, not a drop had ever gone down his gozzle. After a while Fiddling Bill ventured to make another remark.

"De man sho' was a rank talker."

To this Martin Coy made no reply; whereupon, after waiting a reasonable time, Fiddling Bill made as if to tune his violin—he had lowered the pitch to suit the solemnity of the hymn tune—but Martin shook his head.

"No more tunes to-night, Bill. We've had enough music to last us over Sunday. There's a jug there with a tin cup tied to the handle. Take a dram if you want one."

Fiddling Bill looked at Martin Coy and then at the jug, and then, for a wonder, he shook his head.

"No, suh; I speck I done had 'nuff. Dat ar man put a bad tas'e in my mouf." He lingered a little while, looked anxiously at the jug more than once, and then bade Martin Coy good-night.

The white man leaned back in his split-bottom chair and smoked his pipe, listening intently to the thump, thump, thump of the wooden leg as the negro went along the path. When the sound died away, he turned to the boiler of the still and remarked:

"Well, well, well! when a nigger fiddler says 'no' to a dram, it's about time for the stars to fall ag'in."

In Martin Coy's opinion, another fall of stars such as he witnessed when a lad of seven would be the prelude to the final judgment and day of doom.

—NORA, WHOSE INTEREST AND CURIOSITY IMPELLED HER TO LISTEN AT THE LIBRARY DOOR

Now it need hardly be said that Martin Coy did not go out of the distilling business. He kept it up, not only because he was a most obstinate and self-willed individual, but because he had no other business to fall back on. He kept it up until the beginning of the war, and succeeded, meantime, in buying a farm close to town, and a half dozen negroes to work it. But when the war began it opened up a new line of business for young and old—unprofitable as the event proved. Along with many others, but beyond all question new, Martin Coy was drawn into it.

He joined the company organized in the little town, the company with which Colonel Flournoy went to the front, and engaged in the arduous work of perfecting himself in the dull tactics and various manœuvres which are so imposing to average spectators, but which are never really employed when war actually opens its mouth and begins to drink the blood and crunch the bones of its victims.

It was while Martin Coy was engaged in these duties that he received a long and an affectionate letter from his brother, Harvey Coy, who, following his wife's relatives, had emigrated to Missouri. In this letter Harvey Coy begged his brother not to enlist in any effort to destroy the Union. He owned slaves himself, he said, and his wife's family was made up of slave-owners, and he declared that he had good reason for saying that Mr. Lincoln had no intention of disturbing slavery. Moreover, Harvey said that the Southern leaders knew this as well as he did; nay, better, if such a thing could be, and they were simply trying, not to preserve slavery, but to destroy the Union. As for him, he proposed to join the defenders of the Government, and he advised his brother to sell out in Georgia, bring his wife to Missouri, and either remain neutral or take sides for the Union.

Martin Coy read his brother's letter over very carefully, and then made his wife read it aloud.

"Well, and what do you think of that, Molly?" he inquired.

"Why, I think the brazen fool is tryin' to insult us," she exclaimed. "I allers did hate him," she added. "He was as poor as you before he married Carry Biggers. And after that he used to talk about 'my niggers,' and 'my property.' I declare if he hadn't 'a' been your only brother, I believe I'd 'a' spit in his face. I felt like it over and often. And now he wants us to go up there and be Yankees along wi' him! If you ever meet him in the war, I hope you'll make it convenient to put a hole plumb through him."

Martin Coy winced at this. "I hope not," he protested. "I don't think any more of Harvey's wife than you do; but a woman's a woman the world over; and you can't blame a man for what a woman does. The capers of Harvey's wife didn't prejidice me ag'in' Harvey; but when he comes a-preachin' this doctrine, me and him can't gee hosses."

With that Martin Coy tore his brother's letter into little bits of pieces and set them adrift on the wind with an exclamation of bitter disgust.

Time, which carries all human efforts forward to their culmination, carried Martin Coy to the front, and, in the beginning, Providence placed him in West Virginia. The brigade to which his company was attached was stationed at Laurel Hill, and a more desolate place, especially during the winter season, could hardly be found. The snow or the sleet fell for weeks at a time, and even when the sun shone it simply illuminated and brought into stronger relief the vast and desert loneliness that fell impartially on valley and on mountain.

Martin Coy said long afterward that a million men gathered in that region wouldn't have lifted the "lonesomeness" of the place. "It was so lonesome," he declared, "that men choppin' wood a quarter of a mile away made you feel like you was in t'other world." And when he was asked which of the other worlds he meant, his reply was: "Arry one would 'a' suited me for a change."

But the truth is, Martin Coy looked back on the Laurel Hill experience through a long vista of trouble and keen anguish that colored and warped his vision.

In the spring of '61, a brigade or two of Federals heard of the occupation of Laurel Hill by the Confederates and, being on their way southward, concluded to pay the lonely place a visit. They carried out this intention early one morning, and their visit was so unexpected that they were right in the camp before most of the Confederates knew there was a blue coat within twenty-five miles of the place. It was a surprise, and, according to all recognized rules of warfare, should have been a very disastrous one; but American troops have a way of getting over their astonishment, as was abundantly demonstrated on both sides during the war. The Confederates rallied behind the cabins they had built, rallied by twos and tens, and then by companies, and they soon succeeded in giving the enemy a warm good-morning.

But the position was untenable—so the officers decided—and the Confederates retreated. This retreat, orderly enough in the beginning, soon developed into a movement in which every man was for himself. The troops were not demoralized, for there was no pursuit, but they began to straggle. If the history of that retreat has ever been written, the account has never fallen under the eyes of the present writer, but the stories told by survivors all agree that it was the most horrifying experience they were called on to endure throughout the war; and some of them, be it remembered, lay for months in prison, while others suffered from terrible wounds.

The demoralization that occurred was probably the best thing that could have happened, for if any considerable body of the retreating troops had remained together, starvation would have been the result. But they scattered about in small companies and squads as they went tramping through this vast wilderness. No doubt a great deal of that country has been opened up by this time, but in 1861 there were miles and miles of forest that had never been explored by white men. The statement may seem hard to believe, because at rare intervals along the eastern fringes of this wilderness rude huts had been built. But a veritable jungle of interminable width, which stretches for hundreds of miles along the tops and sides of a range of mountains, offers no inducement to exploration on the part of those who have even a vague idea of its extent.

It was June when the retreat began. In Georgia the blackberries and other wild fruit are ripe at that season. In that vast and mountainous wilderness the trees and shrubs, with the exception of the laurel, were just beginning to throw out leaves, and the pale green of the new foliage was but the sickening sign of barrenness to the lost Confederates. Some of the unfortunates were never heard of again, but the squad with which Martin Coy found himself managed to preserve life by feeding on roots and barks, especially the inner bark of the red elm and sassafras. On several occasions they managed to shoot high-flying crows; and once they killed a wild pig, and had a most joyous feast.

Finally, after wandering about for many dreary days, Martin Coy and his companions came to a stream of running water, the first they had seen. By following this they not only returned to big hominy and fried chicken, which are the equivalents of civilization in that region, but plump upon an adventure which brought Martin Coy face to face with an event that changed his whole life, and made existence dark for him in a very real sense for many a long day.

The stream which they had been following through a narrow and somewhat tortuous gorge suddenly leaped off a precipice so high that some of the water was shattered into a mist which arose from the pool below as vaporous as though it had emanated from a steaming caldron. There was nothing for the weary and famishing Confederates to do but to retrace their steps a little distance and climb from the gorge the best they could. It was not an easy matter for men so torn by hunger and so burdened with fatigue, but, led by Martin Coy, whose dogged energy had been the means of keeping up the spirits of his companions, they crawled out and proceeded in a direction parallel with the stream. They had not gone far before they found themselves gazing upon a scene which, after their terrible experience, seemed a foretaste and first glimpse of Paradise. It was as if the vast wilderness had rolled away behind them, or as if a black veil had been lifted.

In the valley below them a farm lay nestling in the sunshine. A small flock of sheep browsed busily in a field near the barn, and a number of cattle stood contentedly chewing their cuds. Fowls were running about, a small dog barked intermittently, and blue smoke curled from the chimney of the dwelling. The Confederates gazed on this scene of beauty in joyous silence until one of them, a man from Putnam County, Georgia, true to his raising and his first principles, exclaimed:

"Boys, I smell hog meat a-fryin'!"

"No," said Martin Coy, after sniffing the air; "it's chicken a-fryin'."

"Then to-day's Sunday," was Putnam's comment.

Whereupon Martin Coy drew from his coat pocket a dirty envelope, counted the marks upon it, and after a brief calculation, asserted that the day was Sunday. He had kept tale of the number of times he had wound his watch, so that every mark stood for twenty-four hours.

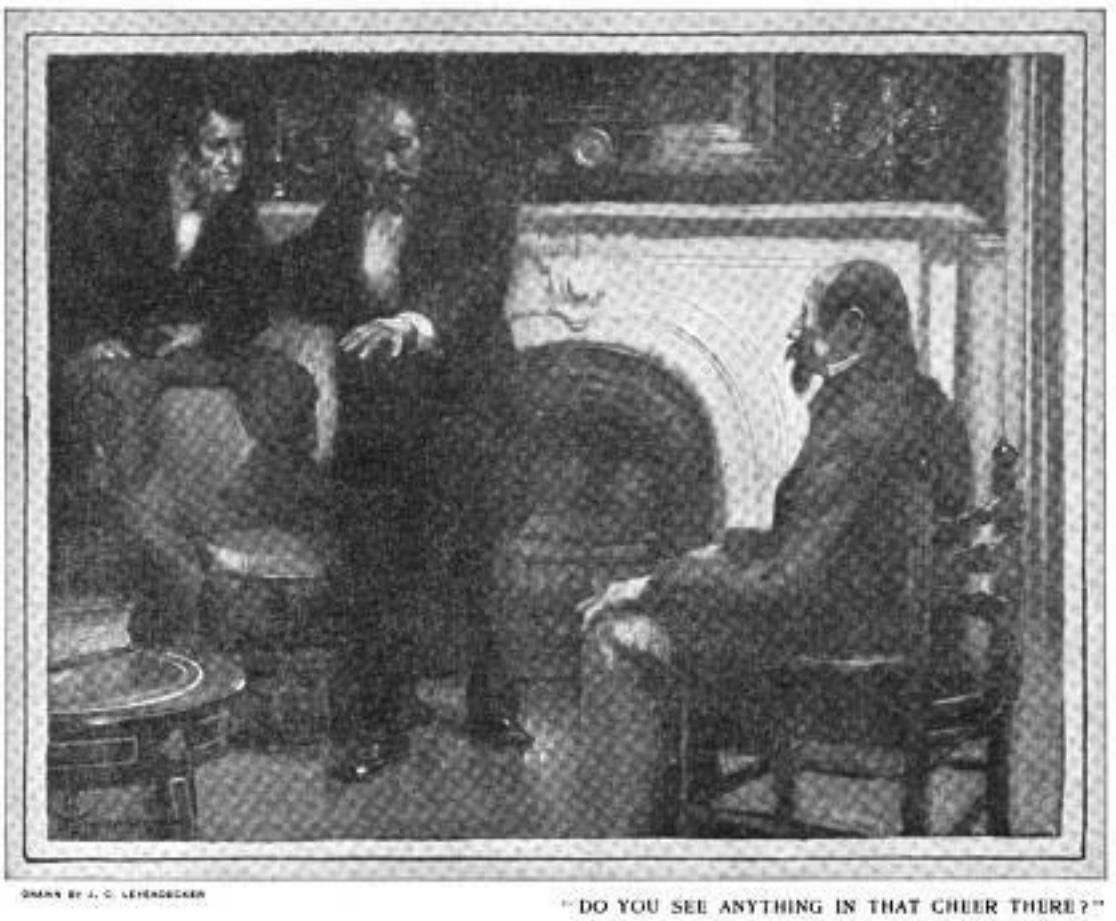
The farmhouse seemed to be close at hand: one of the party said it looked like a man might back up the hill a piece, get a good running start, and jump right spang into the garden. Nevertheless, they had to walk nearly a mile and a half before the house was reached, and when they arrived there they walked right into the arms of a squad of Federal troops. They had been warned of the troops by a man who appeared to be one of the farm hands, who was hitching a small mule to a wagon; but as you may toll a pig into a butcher's shop with one ear of corn, so, on the same principle, these famished and weary Confederates determined to risk everything in order to satisfy their hunger.

If there had been a man among them of the dash and energy of Forrest they could easily have captured the Federals, for there was a momentary stampede among the latter, who were lounging about without their arms, when they saw this grim and determined-looking little band filing into the yard; but the Confederates were clean forespent. In spite of the warning cry of "Halt!" they came shuffling toward the house, some of them staggering by reason of the reaction that had set in. The officer in charge of the Federals took in the situation at a glance, and so did the motherly looking housewife, and it was not long before they were seated around a bowl of steaming chicken-broth, in which wheaten dumplings had been stewed. Simple as this was, it was more than a feast; and it restored hope and energy, and gave them strength and courage. The truth is, while they had been weak from hunger, their chief trouble had come from the fact that they were lost in a wilderness that seemed endless. The interminable jungle had racked their nerves and sapped their vitality far more completely than hunger and fatigue; and when they were once free from that incubus and had satisfied their hunger, they found themselves in pretty good condition.

Now, Martin Coy's terrible experience in this mountain jungle was made more terrible still by reason of his keen and vivid remembrance of the awful prophecy of the revivalist who, with other preachers, had visited his stillhouse. From the moment that he realized the plight of himself and his companions the words came back to him with piercing power: "The day will come, be it soon or late, when you will hide from the light of the sun—when you will slink about in the darkness—when you will be a dead man though yet alive."

They came back to him and stayed with him; he mumbled them over to himself by day, and they became living things in his dreams and flitted to and fro in his slumbers by night. And now, when he came to realize that he was a prisoner, and that in all probability he would be immured for months, even years, the words of the preacher gathered fresh force.

Owing to the physical condition of the Confederates, which, as has been hinted, was not nearly so bad as it seemed to be, their captors determined to remain at the farmhouse over night. The prisoners were placed in the loft of the barn, which was half filled with hay, and here they found no difficulty in addressing themselves to slumber. Some time during the night, or it may have been toward morning, Martin Coy felt himself roughly shaken. He would have started up with an exclamation, but a hand over his mouth pressed him back with a force that was irresistible, and an angry whisper sounded close to his ear:



"Don't speak, but listen! You're all a pack of cowardly whelps, or the Yanks would be where you are. Do you hear me?" The hand was still over Martin Coy's mouth, and he could only nod an affirmative. "None of you is worth the powder and lead it'd take to blow your heads off, but I'm going to give you a chance to show what's in you to-morrow morning. Are you listening?" Again Martin Coy nodded. "Well, when you get about five miles on the way you'll see a man, a mule and a wagon in the road. The mule will be unhitched. When your crowd comes along she'll back right into it and begin to kick—do you hear? Pass the word to your men, and tell them to keep their eyes open, and when the mule cuts her caper let each man grab a Yank and take his gun away from him. You are six to eight, and the mule will take care of the two extra men. Is it a go?"

Martin Coy nodded emphatically. "It'd better be a go," said the whisper. "The man that flunks will never see daylight any more. What is your name?"

The hand was cautiously raised, and back came the answer, "Martin Coy." "Well," said the other, "don't be coy in the morning. When you hear your name called out, grab the gun of the man next to you and kill him, and tell your men to do the same. Good-night."

Martin Coy felt the straw move once, as if some one was turning over to find a more comfortable position. After that there was silence, except for the squeak of a mouse, or the fluttering scamper of a rat along the rafters. He was awake at dawn. He heard some one quarreling with a mule in the same tone and language he would use with a person.

"It's a mighty good thing I come out here when I did; if I'd 'a' waited till sun-up, you'd 'a' chawed up the whole inside of the barn. You wait till I git you whar nobody can't see us; I'll cut me a stick, an' I'll pay you for the old an' the new."

Thus said the man to the mule. When Martin Coy looked about him he saw no one but his companions in misery; and when he would have told these of the information he had received, the first one he spoke to remarked sulkily: "Why, you told us that last night; you'll keep on blabbin' about it until everybody in the neighborhood knows it."

Blabbing! Whatever faults and weaknesses Martin Coy had, blabbing was not among them. The charge stung him so that he withdrew into his shell, and had nothing more to say to his companions on any subject whatever.

The six Confederates, accompanied by their eight captors, were on the road early. The Federals seemed to know the ground, and were in no hurry. Their main force was not so very far away, as the Confederates learned afterward. Martin Coy was at the head of the little squad of prisoners, and he not only marched close to the Federal guard on his right, but kept a sharp lookout for the man, the wagon and the mule.

When they had traveled about four or five miles they came suddenly upon the man, the wagon and the mule. The mule was unhitched, a part of the harness hanging loose, as though it had been torn off, and the wagon was half-slued across the road. The arrangement seemed to be an ideal one, but Martin Coy's heart sank when he saw a mounted Federal officer talking to the man. How many more were there in the neighborhood?

Martin Coy never lifted his eyes to the face of the mounted officer. He only noted in a general way that the man was large and fine looking. He watched the man and the mule, and drew closer to the guard on his right. Would the scheme work? He would soon know. They were not ten yards from the wagon. The man was saying:

"Why, she's the plague-on'dest creetur in the known world. Whoa! didn't I tell you to whoa?" he cried. The mule had flung herself around with incredible swiftness and was now letting fly both heels at the officer's horse, which, backing into the ravine, suddenly slipped and fell.

The prisoners were only a few steps from the wagon. "Oh, what are you up to? Why don't you whoa before I borry a gun an' kill you?" The mule, backing and kicking, dragged the man after her (to all appearances) around the end of the wagon. "If Martin Coy was here he'd fix you!" yelled the man.

The prisoners accepted this as a signal, and each grabbed the gun of the Federal nearest to him. It was over in a moment, or would have been over, had not the mounted officer, whose horse had recovered his footing, come spurring toward the mêlée, pistol in hand. "Stand up there, men! Who called for Martin——"

The sentence was never completed. Martin Coy had leveled his gun and fired as the officer spoke. The Federal swayed and would have fallen from his horse, but one of the men caught him, and eased him to the ground. "Martin!" he feebly cried, then groaned and seemed to be quite dead.

The groan had an echo, for Martin Coy, coming forward, found that he had shot his brother.

"It's a judgment!" he exclaimed hoarsely. "A judgment! Now I'm done! You-all can take me where you please."

"Well, I reckon not—not much!" said the man who had been manipulating the mule. "War's war, and when family connections git on both sides of the fence where shootin's gwine on, somebody's bound to git hurt." With that he detailed two of the Federals to look after the body of the officer. One of them mounted the horse and rode off to the Federal camp, the other remained by the roadside.

The countryman, who was no other than John Omahundro, on his way to Richmond, left his wagon where it was, and turned the mule loose, giving her a friendly slap as he did so. She went cantering back to the farmhouse in double-quick time.

"Now you Yanks, jest make your minds easy. You've swapped places with these chaps here. Form in line there; single file. Right about face, and forward march, with a hep—hep—hep! Keep step there, Coy. Don't tangle up my army."

On the side of the hill, as they retraced their steps, a footpath was visible. It was narrow, but well marked. Into this Omahundro filed the men, and they were soon on their way South.

Martin Coy seemed to be a changed man; he would obey orders, but he would not answer when spoken to. The only words he uttered were mumbled to himself, and his companions never knew whether he was praying or cursing. As a matter of fact, he was simply repeating the prophecy of the revivalist: "The day will come, be it soon or late, when you will hide from the light of the sun—when you will think about in the darkness—when you will be a dead man, though yet alive."

Instinctively the men knew that Martin Coy was in great mental trouble. Omahundro was especially full of sympathy. When they reached Richmond, by a word he secured a furlough for Martin Coy, and saw that he was provided with the papers necessary for his transportation and with a sufficient supply of money.

Just when Martin Coy reached home no one knew except his wife and himself. He kept to himself as rigidly as a monk who dwells alone in a cell. He felt that he was under an awful judgment from Heaven, and his penance, self-inflicted, was that he never allowed the sun to shine on him, or permitted his eyes to rest on the light it gives forth. It was literally as the preacher said it would be: he hid from the light of the sun, and when he went forth at all, he slunk about under cover of the darkness. So far as the world was concerned, it was the same as if he had been dead and buried.

—Martin Coy turned around and faced the revivalists

He was so earnest in his beliefs and purposes that he convinced his wife of the spiritual utility of his asceticism, and she, being a woman of considerable energy, and possessing a good head for business, took charge of his affairs and proceeded to manage them with a success that attracted considerable attention.

To quote Mrs. Nicklin, "Old Moll Coy is tryin' so hard for to be a man, she's act'ally and candidly begun to sprout a beard." A remark which drew from Mr. Nicklin the response that, "A 'oman as smart as any man, and a plegged sight smarter'n most on 'em, is got a good right for to have a beard."

Martin Coy was at home for nearly four years before anybody knew it except his wife. He occupied a room in the second story of his house, and the windows to this room were not only closely shuttered on the outside, but heavily hung with curtains on the inside. He limited himself to one meal of cold victuals, and took that at night by the light of a tallow candle. Sometimes he read the Bible, but more often he paced back and forth as far as the narrow limits of his room would allow. But after the first fever of his repentance (if it can be called that) passed away, he ventured to walk about at hours when he judged that the rest of the community were sound asleep.

When the surviving members of his company returned home in 1865, people wondered that Mrs. Coy made no inquiries after her husband, who had failed to return with the others. Then rumors of various kinds flew about. Some said that he, with a number of others, perished in the retreat from Laurel Hill; others that he died in a Northern prison, and there was one persistent story that he had deserted from the Confederate Army and joined his brother on the Federal side. Now, in his walks at night he had been seen and recognized by various negroes. This, however, was no evidence to them that Martin Coy was alive. Quite the contrary. It was an evidence that he was dead. Fiddling Bill, who had known him well and liked him, saw him one night and spoke to him. Receiving no response, he spoke again in a louder tone; whereupon Martin Coy turned slowly around, looked at the negro hard, and groaned.

This was sufficient for Fiddling Bill, who had serious doubts even before he ventured to speak. The negro turned and went back the way he had come as fast as his heavy wooden leg would permit him. He was going at such a rate that when he came to a plank sidewalk the thump of the leg could be heard blocks away; and at one point, where the iron-shod foot of the wooden leg was forced between two planks and held there as in a vice, Fiddling Bill gave one despairing wrench and tore up a whole section of the walk.

The negro's testimony and the evidence of the wrecked walk were sufficient to convince all the negroes, and not a few whites, that the ghost of Martin Coy walked abroad and refused to be laid. The reason was plain. He had died in strange parts, and had been buried in strange soil, and his perturbed spirit would never be satisfied until his bones were brought back home. This was manifest on the face of it, since he had been seen most frequently near the village burying-ground.

Of course, the more sensible people of the community never bothered their heads with these stories, but they flew about all the same, and so much life and substance has a myth of this sort that it persists to this day, and "Coy's Ghost" is still supposed by the superstitious to be walking in that region, flitting about, as it were, from neighborhood to neighborhood to meet emergencies or to explain manifestations that appear to be mysterious.

Slowly, however, the real facts of the case became known to the older citizens, and these, as usual, were disposed to be sympathetic; especially Colonel Fontaine Flournoy, of whose family the Coys had, in old times, been retainers—not in the feudal sense, of course, but by reason of long association and mutual obligations. As soon as Colonel Flournoy returned from his South American adventures he called on Mrs. Coy, and from her learned the facts. He also held a brief conversation with Martin Coy through the closed door of his room, and tried to convince him of the folly of his course. The effort was unsuccessful. Martin Coy clung to the idea that the revivalist who denounced him had been the means of bringing down upon his head the judgment of Heaven.

Now, among those who took a sincere interest in the case of Martin Coy was Captain McCarthy. He was one of the few who had heard all the facts. As he was a very practical man, he went to work in a practical way, saying nothing of his plans. But his daughter Nora observed that he was engaged in a very extensive correspondence. One morning she counted as many as twenty letters lying on the library table, all sealed, stamped and addressed. One, she noticed, was addressed to the Pension Office, and this she made the basis of a series of inquiries which were leveled at her father in a tone at once innocent and serious.

It was, "Dada, dear, do you think I'll ever draw a pension? I carried your laundry to you when you were in the hotel; don't you think I deserve a pension for that?" Or, "Has the Government ever rewarded you for not taking charge of the paper which was to settle everything?"

Captain McCarthy was very much puzzled by such questions as these until he happened to remember that Nora had been dusting in the library, whereupon, in mock indignation, he tried to catch her. Nora ran screaming and laughing around the room, out of the door into the hall, and from the hall straight into the arms of young Francis Flournoy, who had called at that hour on pretense of asking the Captain's advice on some business matter. He thought, poor young man, that he was very sly and shrewd, and that no one except Miss Nora knew why he called so often; whereas, Miss Nora was the only one in all that neighborhood who wasn't really certain. She had her suspicions, and they were very pleasant ones; but she had her doubts, too—and she was very reserved and circumspect; and she never, under any circumstances, betrayed her real feelings except in a thousand different ways which were plain to everybody except to young Flournoy. It is the way of lovers the world over, so the story-tellers say.

But when Nora startled Francis Flournoy and herself by accidentally running into his arms, with her father looking on, and not attempting to conceal his triumphant amusement, she didn't know whether to laugh or cry. As a matter of fact, she did both at one and the same time, and blushed and bit her lip, and pretended to be very much amused at everything, and very angry with everybody. But after a while, as they were talking on the veranda, she became very much subdued. Wonderful for Nora, she fell into a fit of melancholy; and this young Flournoy had sense enough to take advantage of. He was used to young ladies who were romantic and troubled with a gentle melancholy, but Nora, with her various and versatile emotions, chief among which was a keen and restless humor, had been very much of a puzzle to the young man.

When, therefore, she remarked with a little sigh, that she supposed he came to see her father, he remarked that he was in no hurry, and that if—well, in short, he then and there took opportunity by the foretop and said what he had been trying to say for many months. And as for Nora, she said that she never could enter into any engagement so serious until her father had approved of it, and so forth, and so on. This suggestion was promptly followed by Francis Flournoy. He could talk to a man; and he had a long and serious talk with Nora's father, who, after pointing out, as thoughtful fathers will, what a solemn and sacred bond marriage is, said that nothing could please him more than to see his daughter the wife of the son of his old friend.

And Nora, whose interest and curiosity impelled her to listen at the library door, became so frightened at the serious character of the conversation that she went off somewhere and cried—a fact which thoroughly restored her high spirits. Her father, however, must have his joke, for when he saw her he put on a very serious and perplexed countenance.

"Nora," he said, "until son Francis came and talked with me, I was sure that the event of this morning was an accident."

"What event, dada?" inquired Nora, blushing.

"Why the performance of rushing out and jumping into the young man's arms."

Strange to say, she forgot to be teased. Instead of protesting against his whimsical suggestion, she threw her arms around him and exclaimed, "Oh, you are the best man in the whole world!"

"There are exceptions," he remarked; "but what else

What an Isthmian Canal will do for the South

By Senator John T. Morgan

IN 1849, in a letter to Hon. John A. Rockwell, Lieutenant Matthew F. Maury so thoroughly discussed the advantages to the United States of a ship canal through the Isthmus of Darien; that nothing remains to be said that would add any material facts to his statements, or any additional weight to the value of his conclusions.

This great geographer of the seas made so clear a demonstration of the necessity for such a canal that it is almost a matter of national reproach to us that the United States has considered the subject for more than half a century without having taken a decisive step toward its construction.

During that period we have supplied a population that has increased one hundred per cent., and have contributed, to a large extent, to feeding and clothing the world with our surplus productions; we have borne the cost and the waste of three great wars, and we now have a foreign commerce that exceeds, annually, two billion dollars.

THE KEYSTONE OF BRITISH COMMERCIAL DOMINION

MUCH the greater part of this traffic has crossed the Atlantic Ocean to reach the peoples of the eastern hemisphere. The trade with the Orient has traveled an average distance of 8000 miles farther in its voyages over the Atlantic route than if it had crossed the Pacific Ocean.

The cost of the land carriage by rail, and the commercial dominion of Liverpool as the clearing-house of the world's commerce and the most central point for its distribution, have been the controlling factors in the transportation of our commerce with European and Asiatic countries. It is a false assumption that we have not the capital to float our crops and other productions until they reach the hands of their consumers. A country that has a great trade balance in its favor for a long series of years must acquire the financial strength to control its productions until consumers can pay for them.

The factor of difficulty in our commercial situation is that Liverpool and neighboring places have shorter and cheaper lines of transportation to the fields of consumption than our great ports enjoy.

MAURY'S ANALYSIS OF TRADE CONDITIONS

LIEUTENANT MAURY, in the letter to Mr. Rockwell, thus describes the geographical situation:

> "Owing to the course of the winds, the direction of the currents, and other physical circumstances, British merchants are ten days' sail and upward nearer than we are to all the markets of the world, except those of the Caribbean Sea and Gulf of Mexico. They are next to all the markets of Europe; to Brazil, to Cape Horn, the Cape of Good Hope, and, consequently, to all ports beyond them they are practically some ten or fifteen days' sail nearer than we are.
> "A vessel from the United States, bound for the southern hemisphere, first sails nearly an east course until she arrives in the vicinity of the Azores and Canary Islands; she then puts her head south for the first time. Now, while the American vessel is sailing this route, the English vessel that sailed on the same day for the same market has passed those islands and is far on her way. For the reason that the Cape de Verde Islands are some ten or fifteen days nearer to England than to America, England is that much nearer to the southern hemisphere; for vessels generally, whether from the United States or from England, are in the habit of passing by these islands on their way thither. Therefore the Englishman meets the American in all markets, except those of the Gulf and the Caribbean Sea, with the advantage of ten days and upward.
> "Notwithstanding this disadvantage, the United States in their commercial race with England have for the last fifty years been gradually gaining."

These facts prove that we must look for competitive trade to the Pacific Ocean and its best markets for our staple productions, where we can have at least equal advantages with European countries in the time required to make our commercial voyages.

This can only be done through a ship canal in the Isthmus of Darien. When this is done, the clearing-house of the commerce of the Pacific Ocean will be at New York instead of Liverpool.

As to the ports of the American and Asiatic coasts and of the islands of the Pacific Ocean and the Indian Ocean, this advantage of ten days in favor of Liverpool will be lost to British trade and commerce when a ship canal is cut through the Isthmus of Darien.

THE AREA DIRECTLY BENEFITED BY THE PROPOSED CANAL

LIEUTENANT MAURY, in designating the rivers whose commerce will flow naturally into the Gulf of Mexico, and whose drainage area is tributary to its commerce, includes the Amazon, Orinoco and Mississippi Rivers, with many smaller ones, whose waters unite in the Gulf as affluents of the Gulf Stream and pass into the Atlantic Ocean through the opening between Florida and Cuba. The opening of a canal through Darien, he insists, will give a commercial highway to the Pacific for the vast area drained by these water-courses, and will create local resources for the traffic on the canal far in excess of those of the Mediterranean Sea. If there were no other advantage than this in favor of such a highway, it would be worthy of the efforts of the whole commercial world to start the circulation of commerce through the vast cul de sac of the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico; that is, virtually, a dead centre in the heart of the Atlantic Ocean.

It cannot be that the progress of the twentieth century will pause at the slight barrier of thirty miles of canal excavation that interrupts the full dominion over land and sea that the Creator has given to man. It is impossible to conceive that a Government and people who have spanned this continent from ocean to ocean with six great railroad systems within thirty years will hesitate to complete its plan for the defense of its coasts, for the strengthening of its sea power, for the connection of its coast lines, and for the increase of its coastwise and foreign commerce, by the construction of a ship canal for the common use of the Government and the people of the United States and of the whole world. The new opportunities and duties that have fallen to our lot in the control of the insular possessions derived from Spain add immensely to the argument in favor of this waterway. It will be an inexpressible honor to the United States when we have united the East and West Indies with the thoroughfare for ships that has been the hope of all navigators and merchants since the voyage of Christopher Columbus.

SENATOR JOHN T. MORGAN

THE FUTURE OF OUR OCCIDENTAL MEDITERRANEAN

THE future results of such an enterprise are beyond the reach of computation in their benefits to mankind. When our Mediterranean Sea, which this canal will people, has contributed its wealth and glory to the world, it will not be lessened by comparison with that of the Eastern Mediterranean, with all of its historic renown.

In the broad and national view of this subject it is quite safe to say that, in addition to the advantages that the Government will derive from the canal, there is no place and no industry in the United States that will not derive benefit from it, and there will be few, if any, Americans who will not feel that its construction is a national duty and an honor to the country. The South Atlantic and Gulf States, with their cotton, iron and coal productions, and their vast forests of yellow pine timber and hard woods, will be directly benefited by the facilities of transportation for their heavy productions, and the increase of their prosperity will add a new chapter to the most advanced achievements of human endeavor in all the annals of time. Instructed by recent history in all countries where the cheap and rapid transit of commerce has been encouraged, it is a safe calculation that the value of property in our Gulf States alone would pay for the construction of this canal ten times over in a single decade, but this view is far short of the national advantages of this waterway, as it is insignificant when contrasted with the benefits that it will confer upon all commercial nations.

Figures that indicate the sums of profit and loss in business matters are not adapted to the computation of the real benefits that we must derive, as a people, from supplying the missing link that is necessary to the geographical and political unification of our Atlantic and Pacific coast lines, now separated by a distance of more than 10,000 miles through the most dangerous seas.

THE COROLLARY TO LIEUTENANT MAURY'S PROPOSITION

THE profits of the canal as an investment are attracting the attention of capitalists, and they begin to combine with each other to interfere with the Government in its rightful and necessary control of the subject. This ought to be sufficient proof of the cash value of this work, but it is always difficult to prove a proposition that is self-evident by an arithmetical statement of its elements, or a calculation of its value. Argument becomes burdensome when it is addressed to the proof of what everybody knows to be true. Whatever may be the future political disposition of the recently acquired Spanish islands, and the Hawaiian and Samoan groups, the opening of a short line of navigation between them must be of the greatest benefit to our own commerce and to our naval defense, and to them a blessing of inconceivable value. No such field of peaceful enterprise was ever placed within the control of any nation as that which reaches from ocean to ocean between Puerto Rico and the Philippines; and no greater prospect of wealth, earned by just and honorable work, was ever offered as a reward to any nation.

If no other inducement offered to stimulate our Republic to exert its influence in blessing the people of these islands, its traditions and promises and its noble spirit of humanity would compel us to open the grand highway that will bring together these ends of the earth.

A Hint for Delaware

By René Bache

MANY people think the peach tree is a born fool, but this notion is not altogether just. The peach plant came originally from Persia, and properly belongs in a much warmer latitude than that of the northern part of the United States, consequently it is not on its guard about blossoming too early. That is the reason it is so apt to be nipped by frost after a warm spell in spring, with the result of the loss of much of the crop.

A very simple expedient has been found recently, by which it is likely that future peach crops will be saved from this cause of destruction. It consists simply in spraying the twigs and dormant buds with a solution of whitewash. The effect of this application, as has been ascertained by trial, is to hold back the blossoming for about a week.

In our climate there are apt to be warm spells even in midwinter, when the thermometer climbs quite high, and this is very dangerous for the peaches. The dormant buds, encouraged by the sunshine, proceed to swell and ripen; then comes a cold wave, and they are killed. In this way promising crops of the fruit are frequently lost, and it is a comfort to learn that the whitewash application is a fairly sure preventive of such disaster. Buds and twigs coated with it, because they are white, reflect the sun's rays, instead of absorbing them; thus their temperature is not raised perceptibly, and they have no tendency to ripen.

This is the basis of the theory and practice of the whitewash treatment, through the help of which it is hoped that the peach crops of future years will be much more successful than they have been in the past. So much difference does color make that varieties of peach trees which have purple buds are much more apt to be winter-killed than those having green buds. Blue and purple in plants have the power of absorbing more heat than other colors, and on that account many species in cold regions are bluish or purplish.

Many methods of protecting peach buds in winter have been tried with more or less success, one of these being to bend the trees down to the ground and cover them with soil or mats. Another plan is to coat the buds by spraying them with glue, and a third consists in drawing the branches together and wrapping them in a vertical bundle with coarse grass or cornstalks. Shading the trees with board sheds has given admirable results.

One advantage of the whitewash process is that it costs very little. Half a bucketful to a tree is about enough, and each tree should have two sprayings to begin with. The wash will last for weeks, and two subsequent sprayings are sufficient. The cost is about ten cents the tree.

Elaborate experiments with this process have been made by experts of the Department of Agriculture, with the striking result that sprayed trees "set" much more fruit.

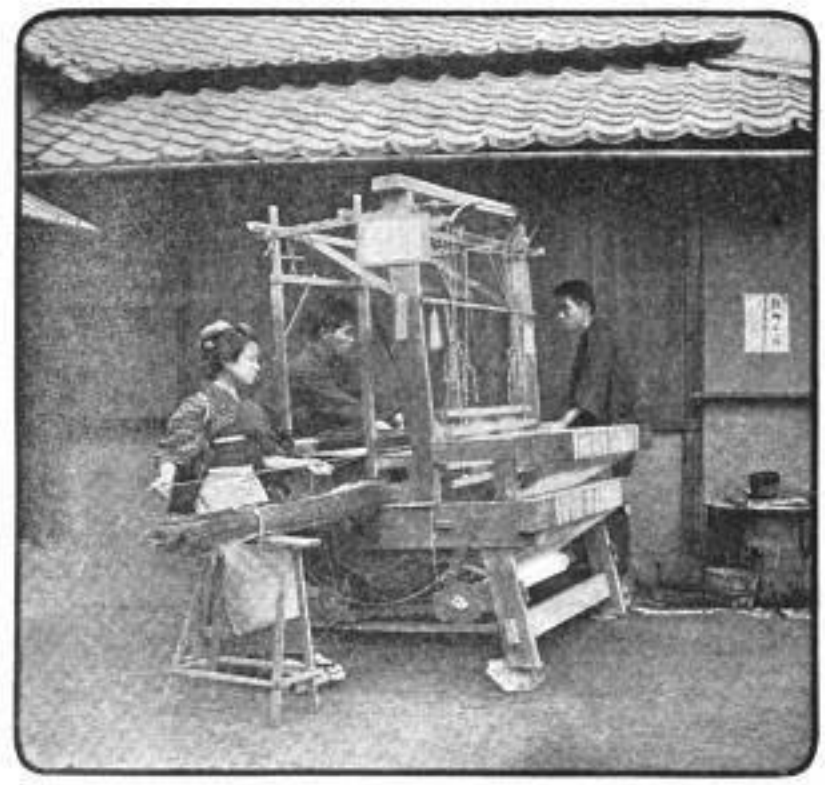
Chances for Young Men
II - In Japan
By Frank G. Carpenter



ON THE steamer in which I crossed the Pacific from San Francisco to Yokohama, a few months ago, were a number of young Americans who were starting out to try their fortunes in the countries of the far East. One had an engagement to act as bookkeeper for a great exporting company of Kobé, Japan; another was on his way as the representative of one of the biggest milling machine organizations of the United States, to put up a modern flouring mill at a cost of more than one hundred thousand dollars, for some Chinese capitalists at Shanghai; a third expected to take charge of a wholesale foreign grocery at the same port.

We had, also, several mining and electrical engineers who had been sent out to look into opportunities for investments in Asia, an American professor connected with the University of Tokyo, and several commercial travelers, each of whom had a line of American goods for which he expected to take orders in the different countries. Two of the commercial men were selling machinery, one was introducing fancy American groceries, another carried with him a stock of jewelry and plated ware which he expected to dispose of at different ports of Japan and China, and another was the agent of an Ohio encaustic tile company, who was making an experimental trip of about fifty thousand miles, to take orders for and introduce his wares into the chief cities upon the way. In addition to these there were a number of young Americans going to China, Japan and the Philippines to take advantage of whatever good things they could turn up, and several buyers for some of the largest importing establishments of San Francisco, Chicago and New York. It was altogether a typical crowd of the classes of our young men who may now be found on almost any of the large trans-Pacific steamships, a living evidence of how the Young American is reaching out into the new fields of trade beyond the seas.

NEW COMMERCIAL CONDITIONS IN JAPAN

Among these fields Japan, just at present, seems to have an especial attraction. The new treaties which went into effect about a year ago have radically changed the rights and opportunities of foreigners. Until last July they could not do business outside of a limited number of seacoast cities known as the treaty ports. They could not travel over the Empire without passports from the Japanese Government, nor could they go from place to place and make their own bargains directly with the manufacturers. All of the business had to be done through middlemen who were native Japanese. The foreigners lived at the ports and were subject largely to the jurisdiction of their respective consuls. Now they are subject to Japanese laws and taxes, but they can go where they please and engage in business as they please. They can establish their own factories anywhere in the Empire, and can employ the cheap labor of Japan to make goods for America or Japan or the big Chinese market over the way. The change is so radical that it is not yet known how it will affect Japanese manufacturing and trade, and the operation of the Japanese laws and taxes are such that there is still quite a difference of opinion among the foreign residents as to whether the advantages of the new régime are as great as they would seem to be.

If many young Americans are to find places in Japan it must be in connection with manufacturing for our markets, and in the use of Japanese cheap labor. The opportunities given to young men by the foreign firms now doing business in the Empire are necessarily limited. There are now, all told, not more than ten thousand foreigners in Japan, and of these, five thousand are Chinese. This leaves only five thousand whites, of whom the English number two thousand and the Americans ten hundred and seventy-six. Probably two-thirds of the Americans are missionaries, so that, all told, there are not more than three hundred who are engaged in business and other professions. There are thirteen Americans employed in our consular and diplomatic service; eleven only have offices under the Japanese Government, and the remainder is made up of merchants, doctors, dentists and members of other professions. This is a very small showing, considering the enormous trade which Japan has with America, and her population of 46,000,000—more than half that of the United States. It is comparatively much less extensive than Japan's mercantile occupancy of the United States, where every large city has its Japanese stores and where there are now living and doing business more than five thousand native Japanese—more than five times the American population of Japan.

WEAVING MATTING

Japan was opened by Americans to the world and many of the foreign improvements were introduced by Americans. At one time scores of our young men were employed in the various departments of the Government. They acted as the professors in the universities, taught in the schools, took charge as civil engineers on the railroads, and also helped construct them and other of the modern engineering works. Americans had charge of the telegraphs, and it was an American who introduced our postal system into the Empire. To-day, as I have stated, there are only eleven Americans in the employ of the Government, and these would be dispensed with if it were possible to do so. The Japanese believe that Japan is for their own people. They will take a foreigner for a time, but as soon as they have learned all he knows they will cast him off. They are apt at learning, and not only believe they are able to master anything that any other people can master, but are really able to do so.

JAPANESE POLICY TOWARD FOREIGN PROFESSIONAL MEN

Starting with a few foreign professors less than a generation ago, they have now an educational system managed by themselves which will compare favorably with ours. They have an Imperial University in Tokyo with more than two thousand students, and in their common schools the pupils number more than four millions. In the private and higher schools there are probably a million more, and the number of teachers employed is more than one hundred thousand. These schools have studies like ours, and in some cases they use the same text-books, pirating the American editions. They have also their technical schools of engineering and their professional schools of different kinds, so that they are producing all kinds of skilled and professional labor. Thousands of their young men are sent to the United States and Europe to study for the professions, and these, when they return, are believed by the people to be fully the equals of foreigners, and hence have filled the demand which formerly existed for foreign professional men.

TRANSPLANTING RICE

CHANCES FOR AMERICAN DOCTORS AND DENTISTS

This leaves the young American professional man who would come here practically dependent on the foreign population for his practice. The chances for great results are therefore limited. American dentists who do so well in Europe can do something, but not so much, here. They will get higher prices, one of the Yokohama dentists receiving six dollars for fillings, whether of amalgam or gold, and three times as much for crown and other difficult work, as in America. The young dentist who comes must expect competition from the Japanese dentist, who will work for lower prices.

No young dentist should come to Japan unless he thoroughly understands his profession; nor should he come unless he has money to enable him to maintain a respectable establishment and to take his place in the society of the foreign circles for two or three years. He must have good offices, keep himself well dressed, and take his part in the life of the foreigners of the city in which he settles. If he does this, he will in a short time begin to get patients, and eventually will find that he has a good practice and a life place for himself. It is the same with young doctors and other professional men. A success has one additional advantage over that of such professions in the United States in that a practice, once built up, has a commercial value, the good-will lasting as long as the firm name is kept, although the original members may have sold out, died or gone away.

A PROMISING OUTLOOK FOR YOUNG LAWYERS

As to lawyers, about a thousand are graduated every year from the law schools of Tokyo, and there are tens of thousands in the Empire. The foreign attorneys are comparatively few, and since the new treaties have come into effect these have in nearly every case formed partnership with native lawyers in order to further their practice. The laws in force are modeled after the French law system, and the young man who would engage in the practice should not only understand French, but also the Japanese. There is no jury system; the judges decide everything. The amounts involved in trials range from five cents to thousands of dollars. All of the large firms and corporations have their own lawyers, just as with us, but the fees paid are usually much less. The new treaties which make foreigners subject to Japanese laws will probably create a demand for foreign lawyers, for no American would like to trust his case to a Japanese. Learning the language is a matter of several years, and the young man must come to Japan expecting to study hard to fit himself for the position.

FORTUNES MADE IN SMALL FANCY GOODS

In commercial lines there should be many openings for the more enterprising of our young men. At present more than two-thirds of the export and import business of Japan is in the hands of foreigners. In 1898 over fifty million dollars' worth of Japanese goods were sent abroad by the foreign merchants doing business here, and the amounts imported by them footed up a grand total of more than ninety million dollars. The business is done by firms with large capital and on a close margin, but I see no reason why our young men, having made their connections at home, should not come out here and get their share of it. The Japanese prefer to buy direct of the home manufacturers and they are now ordering large amounts of goods by catalogues. The commercial traveler who will come here with his samples and work the trade should be able to do a good business.

There are many opportunities for money making in Japan for young Americans who understand the tastes of our people and can use the cheap labor here to supply them. There are many knickknacks made which can be sold in the United States at a good profit, and every now and then some sharp Yankee picks one up and makes a good thing out of it. Last year, for instance, an American buyer for one of the largest department stores of Chicago saw a little lacquer box which he thought American girls would buy as a powder-box. It was selling here for about four sen, or two American cents. The Chicago buyer arranged for the manufacture of two millions of them at a cent and a half apiece, with the result that they retailed in our markets readily at ten cents apiece.

Another man, a tourist who visited Japan some years ago, bought several millions of little boxes which cost less than a cent each, and used them at home for selling tacks. The boxes were very pretty and women bought the tacks in many cases to get the boxes. The dealer made a little fortune from the investment.

MAKING BRONZE CURIOS

I see beautiful tea canisters of all sizes, from that of a wine glass up to some which would hold one and two quarts. They are beautifully decorated and would command a ready sale in the United States. They are very cheap.

There are several different kinds of Japanese candies and sweets that might be profitably sold in the United States, either by importation from Japan or by manufacturing the same articles at home. One especially is a sweet known as Midzu-Amme. It is sold in Japan as a syrup and in the form of a paste somewhat like gum drops or fig paste. It is made from millet, but I am told it can also be manufactured from wheat or Indian corn. In the paste form it is a delicious candy, of a transparent light amber color, and in a syrup it looks like a rich golden molasses. This stuff is not only good to taste, but it has for years been used in Japan as a digestant and as a cure for dyspepsia and other stomach troubles. Children can eat all they please of it and not need castor oil as an after-dose. The most dyspeptic American could swallow his buckwheat cakes without danger if he had Midzu-Amme instead of maple molasses to sweeten them.

I mention these things only as samples of a number which the live Yankee may find here if he keeps his eyes open. There are different kinds of wall papers, fancy papers, curios of all kinds and other knickknacks which are awaiting the young man who has the brains to see what they are worth and how they can be sold at home.

THINGS THEY MAKE MORE CHEAPLY IN JAPAN

The encaustic tile salesman of whom I spoke as being on his way around the world to sell goods showed me a wall paper as thick as Lincrusta-Walton which he proposed to introduce into America. He said we have nothing that will compare with it in design and texture, and he believes it can be sold for ten times its cost in Japan. There is letter paper made here which has a gloss like silk, and at one of the factories I was shown a sheet of heavy silk paper which was so tough and strong that it would support my weight when four men lifted it at the corners.

Another field for young men with some capital is in the use of Japanese labor and skill to manufacture things for our home markets. There are many articles which can be made here for much less than in the United States. The Japanese have known this in the past and they have taken advantage of it, but by the new treaties the field is now open to all. As to what the Japanese have done, one or two examples will illustrate their ability in such lines. Take the little round lead cones which, fitted with a knife, are sold for lead-pencil sharpeners. These cones, a few years ago, were sold by our merchants at wholesale at fifteen dollars a gross. The Japanese have copied them and can make them to sell at a profit at seventy-five cents a gross. Rulers which used to sell at six dollars a gross have been supplanted by a better article, made in Japan, which can be sent across the Pacific to San Francisco and sold at retail at two cents apiece, and one of the best makes of American lead pencils has been imitated and is now sold here as an imported article at one-fourth the price it brings in the United States. They can copy anything and do not scruple to steal patents and trade-marks, though they have laws which nominally protect such properties.

MAKING MONEY IN RUGS, MATTINGS AND OIL STOVES

There are, however, many things in the line of legitimate manufacture which could be made here to sell in America, and they may be patented in Japan. The Japanese are, it must be remembered, anxious for any new and good thing, and any man who comes here and makes a success in any way must expect competition as soon as the people realize that his business is profitable. If the young American brings an unpatented article to sell to the Japanese he must expect to make all his profits out of his first or second importation, for if it is an article that can be imitated these people will make the same thing cheaper than he can bring it from home. Just now there is an American who is doing well selling portable oil stoves. Petroleum is the light of Japan and charcoal is the chief fuel. None of the common houses have stoves or good heating arrangements and the oil stoves are in demand. They are, however, already being imitated and their foreign importation cannot long withstand Japanese competition.

Among the new industries of Japan in which foreigners have been making money are those which have used the cheap labor to make matting and rugs. One firm had paintings made of the most beautiful rugs from the great museums of the world. The paintings were brought here and the rugs were copied in jute and cotton. They are now sold in all American cities.

The mattings which Japan made until within a very few years ago were exclusively for home consumption. They were as thick as your wrist, were made in pieces three feet wide and six feet long. White was the only color manufactured. These mats were used as carpets for the floors of the Japanese stores and houses as they are to-day. Then the Japanese discovered the foreign demand for matting. Now hundreds of thousands of rolls are sent to the United States every year. They make the most beautiful matting in the world. The weaving is done by the Japanese, but the sales are chiefly made through the foreign firms. Many of the new designs are suggested by the importers, but of late the Japanese have been designing themselves and some of the most beautiful patterns are of native origin.

THE WAGES OF JAPANESE ARTISANS

Since the war between Japan and China there has been a radical increase in the wages of Japanese laborers. From our standpoint they are still very low, and the mode of living among the common people is such that it will be many years before they approximate the wages paid to similar workmen in the United States. From a table prepared by the Japanese Government I give the average wages paid at the present time. The hours are in all cases for days of ten or eleven hours and for seven days of the week. I have reduced the figures to American gold.

Mechanics are paid less than twenty-five cents a day. Carpenters and plasterers receive twenty-one cents; stone cutters and masons twenty-three cents and bricklayers twenty-four cents per day. Shoemakers are paid seventeen cents, paperhangers twenty-one cents, jewelers twenty-two cents, and saddlers and harness-makers twenty cents. Those who make tobacco and cigars get seventeen cents, compositors and printers seventeen cents, and blacksmiths twenty cents. Tailors who can make European clothes receive twenty-six cents, and common workmen who do the hardest of manual labor are paid twenty-one cents a day. On the farms men are paid thirteen cents and women receive eight cents per day. Of the weavers, men get twelve cents and the women eight cents a day, and in other manufacturing industries about the same, the wages ranging from ten to twenty-five cents, with less wages for women and children, the latter often receiving not more than five or six cents a day. These wages, it must be remembered, are the average wages over the Empire. In some of the cities they are higher, and in others lower than the sums stated.

With such wages and with the extraordinary skill and industry of the people, Japan must for many years offer opportunities for the making of all kinds of goods. There are already forty-seven modern cotton mills operating more than a million spindles, and within the past two or three years many woolen mills have been established. A great deal of the manufacturing is done in small factories and vast quantities of goods are woven in the homes of the people, it being estimated that there are more than half a million hand looms in the Empire. For this reason many undertakings can be started with small capital, the only danger in such cases being from the competition of the Japanese. The manufacturing of the future for a large part of the Chinese market will, it is believed, be done in Japan, and a combination of American and Japanese capital has been suggested by Marquis Ito. Such combinations would, however, be possible only between men of considerable capital.

THE MATTER OF RETURN PASSAGE MONEY

Taking the whole field into consideration, the young American who would go to this part of the far East to make his fortune had better think long before he starts. He should not come expecting to get a place as a clerk or employee of one of the foreign firms unless he is thoroughly capable and unless he can show letters from former employers stating that he is so. He must not come without enough money to keep him for several months while he is looking about for a job, and enough to take him back home in case he fails to get one. The round trip across the Pacific Ocean from San Francisco to Japan and back will cost for passage alone $300, and three times that sum would be a small amount to allow for the experiment—a risky experiment, indeed, with no positive certainty of success. The young man who would engage in manufacturing must have capital, of course, and he must at the same time have brains enough to know a good thing and have the nerve to take advantage of it. For such men there are opportunities everywhere, and just now the rapid developments and changes which are taking place in Eastern Asia should furnish them a fair opening in Japan.

The VETERAN

By Frank L. Stanton

NUTHIN' but fightin' an' fightin'! I'm gittin' too old fer it now,
But when I hear bullets a-whizzin', I want to jine in anyhow!
Jest readin' the news in the papers o' how they air blazin' away
Makes me cut up the queerest o' capers, an' hooray the old-time hooray!

Nuthin' but fightin' an' fightin'—guns from the East to the West,
An' me on a furlough that's left me forever an' ever at rest!
Step sorter haltin' an' feeble—eyes that air lackin' the light,
An' my heart keepin' time to the drum-beat when I see the boys hep to the right!

Nuthin' but fightin' an' fightin', an' nuthin' that's left me to do;
An' yit I'm as willin' as ever—an' yit I wuz raised to it, too!
I tell you, my eyes they git misty when I'm hearin' the news o' the fray,
To think I kin only jest hear it, an' stay home an' holler "Hooray!"

Didn't I face it with "Stonewall"? Didn't I foller "Bob" Lee?
Didn't he say fer a-many a day there warn't any fighter like me?
An' now, whilst they're rippin' an' rearin', an' doin' their deadliest do,
I can't take a han' in the scrimmage with the boys in the jackets o' blue!

"Laid up!" Them's the words I'm a-sayin' all o' the days an' the years:
Laid up! whilst the ban's air a-playin'—laid up on the shelf fer repairs!
An' I hear how they're fightin' the battles—I see the boys marchin' away,
An' all I kin do fer my country is to stay home an' holler "Hooray!"

MRS. CYNTHIA WESTOVER-ALDEN

Mrs. Alden and the Princess

The International League of Press Clubs, which recently organized a Benevolent Association for the building of a home for newspaper workers, elected a woman as one of the directors and a member of the Committee on the Site. She is Mrs. Cynthia Westover-Alden, woman editor of the New York Tribune and an author of many successful books for girls. She accepted the position and will lecture in the principal cities of the country during the season for the benefit of the home. Mrs. Alden's journalistic career was inspired by long and faithful service in several branches of the New York municipal government, where she furnished the city press with bright reports and interesting articles incidental to her work. Her best piece of reporting was among her first newspaper experiences.

"One day when I was writing for the now defunct Recorder," she said the other day, "I was assigned to interview the Princess Eulalie, the Spanish royal representative to the World's Fair at Chicago. I missed her in New York, so I paid my own expenses to Washington to interview her there, but I did not succeed. She would not see reporters. I interviewed the master of ceremonies, an American who had charge of the royal party, and asked him to help me. He replied that 'Her Highness would return to New York the next day, but you cannot meet her unless you are introduced by Mayor Gilroy himself.'

"I went back to New York crestfallen. The next day I induced the editor to send me on the chartered boat which took the royal party up to West Point. The boat started and Eulalie and her escort took up a position on the main deck. The Mayor stood on one side and navy and army officers on the other. All about were soldiers with crossed sabres. The procession of invited guests started two by two to be presented to the Princess, but when I saw that they did not get near enough to her to touch her hand, I determined not to take my place in the line but to devise other means of being introduced. Finally a bright thought occurred to me, and, breaking through the ranks, I said to the soldiers:

"'Let me pass; I've a message for Mayor Gilroy.'

"I went through. I walked up to the Mayor and said, 'Mr. Mayor, everybody has met the Princess but myself. Will you present me?'

"He recognized me and replied, 'I am delighted to have the honor. Your Highness, this is Miss Cynthia Westover, who has for many years been a part of the city government.'

"The Princess looked up and smiled, and I spoke to her in Spanish and told her how pleased I was to meet her. She answered that I was the first woman she had met who spoke her own tongue. We talked for over an hour on Spanish and American customs. She told me of her love of horses, music and literature, and of the training of her Spanish sisters. She asked me to step outside with her, and I did so. We walked up and down the deck for about ten minutes when I saw the master of ceremonies coming. He instantly recognized me, and advancing quickly toward the Princess he spoke hurriedly in Spanish and put his finger to his lips. I looked up to him and said:

"'I've got my two-column interview, thank you, and I obeyed your orders strictly. I was presented by the Mayor.'"

A Cruel Joke on Andrew Lang

Even the shrewdest persons may at times be deceived. No matter how much people may differ upon the genius of Andrew Lang, they are unanimous in regard to his quick intelligence and his talent for playing golf. Not long ago he was a guest at a very distinguished dinner, which he is said to have described as an extraordinary survival of savage mysteries. The culinary part was faultless, but Mr. Lang's enjoyment was utterly ruined by having, as he put it, "a budding funny man on the one hand and a diabolically deaf Socialist on the other. I could not," added the famous critic, "tell which of the two was the more mournful companion."

Two weeks afterward it got out that the Socialist was not deaf; that he had come to the banquet prepared to be bored by less learned guests; that he had been seated alongside "an idiotic middle-aged gentleman who did nothing but talk of golf," and that to protect himself he had simulated a deafness which kept his neighbor bawling.

F. W. CUSHMAN

The New Humorist from the Far West

In the House of Representatives one of the most picturesque and buoyant figures was James Hamilton Lewis, who added greatly to the gayety of the routine. His successor is Francis W. Cushman, who began very soon after Congress met to maintain the reputation of the State of Washington in the councils of the nation.

He is one of the humorists of the House, and he enlivens his speeches with various stories that take the edge off of his bitter partisanship, such, for instance, as calling a Senator a traitor to his country.

Mr. Cushman will be thirty-three in May. He was born in Iowa, and he had the characteristic career of the self-made man of the West.

He was a section hand on the railroad, a cowboy, a laborer in a lumber camp, a school teacher, and finally a lawyer. His law office is in Tacoma.

This is the first office he ever held and his nomination was unanimous. He is a Congressman-at-large and he fell into the usual pitfall of telling the old story about it. The political importance of his election was due to the fact that he ran on a gold-standard platform against Mr. Lewis, and beat him by over 2000 votes in a total vote of about 75,000. This is the way he expressed his financial views: "There would be no greater inconsistency to me in hearing a man talk of biyardism, biquartism, or bibushelism than to hear any one discourse on the beauties of bimetalism in the sense of using both metals as a standard. But one metal only can or will ever be the standard."

John Sherman on Himself

A politician who was very near to Senator John Sherman in the campaign of 1892 says he will never forget the effect that the first kodak picture of himself had upon the Senator. Mr. Sherman had been speaking the night before in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, and the newspaper artists had taken some life-like snapshots of him in many attitudes. To the politician the Senator said, upon looking over the newspapers the next day: "Well, well, our time for criticising the newspaper men is over. They have us to rights now. Here I am just as I am, and I'm a caricature of what I have always thought I was."

Judge Fitzgerald's Double Entry

Judge James Fitzgerald, of the New York Supreme Court, is an excellent example of what perseverance and singleness of purpose will accomplish. The Judge, who is about forty years old, supported not only himself but helped his family while serving as a cash-boy in a store and at night he attended Cooper Union. Later he read law at night and managed to be admitted to the bar at the same age that most young men begin practice. The Judge has had more than fair sailing, though, since he became a lawyer. He is a powerful man physically, ruddy, and as active as a lynx. To his native Irish wit is added a power of speech that nearly approaches eloquence. He soon took a prominent part in politics and was for years a member of the Legislature.

Several years ago he was appointed an additional Assistant District Attorney at the comfortable salary of $7500 the year. Before taking office he married and went on a prolonged wedding trip. When he returned a month's pay was due him and he went to the office for it. During his honeymoon he had traveled over a good part of this country, and as his funds were low he went direct from the train to the office.

"Here is your money, Counselor," said the pay clerk, deferentially, after his kind.

"All right," replied Mr. Fitzgerald, pocketing the roll of bills.

"Sign the pay-roll, please," continued the clerk.

"Of course," responded the bridegroom, and, absent-mindedly, he wrote as follows:

"James Fitzgerald and wife."

And the entry is on the city books to this day.

Should Have Tried a Deaf Mute

Even distinguished artists have their domestic sorrows. Miss Cornelia Dyas, the eminent pianist of New York, belongs to a musical family and from her early years has devoted her life to her favorite art. She studied in this country, went abroad and completed her musical education in Germany. Her brother and sister had similar careers and finally they all came together in New York. There they tired of hotel life and determined to engage in housekeeping on their own account. They secured a beautiful apartment on the upper part of the island, furnished it to suit their artistic fancies, engaged a servant and were happy. The place resounded with music from dawn to eve and late into the night.

Then the girl left.

They secured another who also left. A third behaved in the same way. The housekeeping scheme began to lose its charms. One day Miss Dyas met one of the ex-domestics who greeted her very pleasantly.

"I am so sorry you left me," said the pianist. "Was there any trouble?"

"Well, you see the place was very nice and the work was light and the people were very fine, but there was just a little bit more music than I could stand."

New England's Silver Man

To be a silver man in New England is almost as difficult as to be a gold bug in Arkansas, but George Fred Williams, lawyer, ex-Congressman and upholder of Mr. Bryan's cause in "the enemy's country," seems to prosper upon the antagonisms which his views arouse. He is the most cartooned man in all the New England States. The newspapers ridicule him seven days a week, but it does not seem to affect his equanimity, and many of those who have seen only the caricatures always express astonishment when they get their first sight of him, for he is a strikingly handsome man, of large personal popularity, and is the best-known citizen of Dedham, the beautiful Massachusetts town where he resides. Mr. Williams has been mentioned among the possibilities for the second place on the Democratic ticket.

OF THE HOUR of Contemporaries

A Rough and Ready Schoolmaster

When Charles D. Folsom, the New York lawyer, left Phillips Exeter Academy, New Hampshire, he had a distinct feeling of pride that he was graduated from the same school that sent Daniel Webster out to fight the battle of life, and, because Webster's second step was school teaching, and because he needed the money, he adopted this profession. From this time on, to use his own words, all likeness between his own and the great statesman's career ended.

It was in Sanbornton Square, New Hampshire. There were four giants of boys in the school, all over eighteen years of age, and Mr. Folsom was only nineteen. But he had the advantage of practical physical training on his side. One day the father of one of the giants, who had a bad reputation as a local fighter, drove up to the schoolhouse with an ax and asked for the teacher. He hammered on the door for several moments, and when the teacher appeared he returned to his buggy. The irate parent said:

"Young man, did you lick one of my boys yesterday?"

"I did, sir."

"Well, if you do it again I'll fix you."

"No, you won't," was the answer; "I'll whip your boys so long as they are under my charge and disobey the rules."

"Well, we'll see," said the man, preparing to get out.

It just then occurred to Mr. Folsom that this was his time, and he lifted the bed of the light buggy off the wheels and tipped it over. Into the ditch rolled the man with the ax, while the teacher and thirty-five school children looked on and grinned. It was too much for the man, and, adjusting the buggy top, he rode quietly away.

Senator Gorman's Success as an Interviewer

Of all the politicians of this generation none has a larger reputation for reserve than former Senator Arthur P. Gorman, of Maryland, who is again taking a prominent part in Democratic politics. Senator Gorman applies to public affairs the famous rule of the great soldier who said that the art of war consisted in finding out what the enemy intended to do. Mr. Gorman is affability itself to the newspaper men that crowd around him for information, but it is a standing joke among them that he does all the interviewing himself.

Every summer Senator Gorman goes to Saratoga for several weeks. One evening Judge Grubb, of Delaware, remarked: "Senator Gorman, you and I have been coming to this hotel now for nearly a dozen years, and every summer when I get back home I find that I have told you everything I know, whereas you never tell me a thing."

The Senator smiled and so did those about him, for they appreciated that the Judge had given a capital description of Mr. Gorman.

"Uncle Dick's" New Billet

President McKinley hardly could have picked out a more popular naval officer for the superintendentship of the Naval Academy, at Annapolis, than Commander Richard Wainwright. Of his dauntless courage and his seamanship the world knows the story, but of the gentler sides of his nature the knowledge is confined to men of his own calling. The new superintendent is known to naval officers the world over as "Uncle Dick" and "Uncle Richard." In his desire to increase the happiness of his officers and men he has made it a rule to keep lists of scenes and objects for sight-seers, curiosity-seekers and lovers of adventure. In the early nineties, while commanding the Alert, he visited the Port of Amoy, China. He called upon the American Consul, and, after exchanging the compliments of the season, spoke about the places of interest in the neighborhood. To the Consul's surprise, Wainwright knew almost as much of the place as he did. He had all the facts about the port.

"I like to keep myself informed upon such matters," explained Mr. Wainwright, "on account of my boys on board. I remember when I was a youngster in the navy nothing gave me more misery than to find out after I had visited a port that I had missed something worth seeing."

Comptroller Coler's Bid for the Governorship

Bird S. Coler, Comptroller of the city of New York, frequently acts for the Mayor in public functions of a social nature. The latest one was the opening of a new armory late in January. Among his duties on this occasion was the reviewing of the troops, who were to occupy the structure. Now there are certain things which a man must know when he reviews a body of troops, and none of these things did Comptroller Coler know save in the vaguest possible way. Therefore, before the ceremonies began he sought the advice of General McAleer, who commands the Second Division of the State Guard, and was in charge of the ceremonies.

"I never reviewed a regiment before," said Mr. Coler.

"That's all right," responded the General. "I'll fix you," and he thereupon wrote plainly on a small slip of paper a set of directions, covering the custom of reviewers, telling when he should uncover his head and to whom, and such other things as were of use. With this paper deftly concealed in his hand Mr. Coler faced the ordeal bravely. The General stood by his side and, as the evening wore on, faithfully nodded approval as his pupil followed his directions like a trained soldier.

COM. RICHARD WAINWRIGHT

At length came the regimental colors. The Comptroller glanced down at his paper and then turned a quick and appealing glance at the General. The veteran made some mute signal and leaned forward as if to whisper. Then he straightened himself, turned white and looked fixedly at something a long ways off. The paper had no reference to colors on it. But the Comptroller had not witnessed the Dewey parade for nothing. Remembering Governor Roosevelt's impressive salute to the Admiral, he drew himself up and waited.

In a second the color bearers were in front of him.

With a superb gesture the Comptroller raised his hat, threw out his chest and placed his hat with a resounding thump over his left breast. It was more than patriotic—it was dramatic, and the spectators burst into applause.

When the last soldier filed by, the General caught him by the hand and said: "For Mercy's sake! where did you get that? I forgot to mention the colors and I trembled for the result."

"I remembered Governor Roosevelt's salute to Admiral Dewey just in the nick of time. Did I do it all right?" he asked anxiously.

"All right?" replied the General admiringly. "You did it out of sight. A few more reviews and you will be Governor of New York yourself."

PRINCESS SALM-SALM

MISS ADÈLE RITCHIE

On the Free List

The comic operatic star, Miss Adèle Ritchie, has a great love for French art and visits Paris for several months every year. Here she studies the stage and also the dressmakers and milliners. During a recent trip outward there was a pleasant passenger list on the steamer and nearly every evening something entertaining took place in the main saloon. The singing was, of course, the chief feature of the program. At Havre a fellow-passenger, whom Miss Ritchie had seen only once or twice on the voyage, approached her and said, "I want to thank you for the great pleasure you have given me during the trip."

Supposing that his remark was polite commonplace she answered, "I am much obliged to you and glad that you enjoyed my part of the programs."

"But," continued the passenger, "I mean it from the depth of my heart. You don't know what good you did. I was very sick from the rolling of the ship because I'm a poor traveler. My cabin was not far from the saloon and I could hear nearly all that went on. Most of what I heard increased my suffering, but last night when you sang three songs I became reconciled to death, no matter what form it took."

At Havre she encountered a customs official who deserves to be remembered. He went through the regular formality as to the trunks and other baggage, but was painfully slow. Miss Ritchie grew a little nervous and said, "I hope there is no tariff upon passengers?"

The official proudly drew himself up, bowed and remarked:

"With passengers like yourself, madam, we believe in absolute free trade, and could our Government be here and see you they would undoubtedly offer a bounty upon the importation."

Princess Salm-Salm's War Record

Of all the women of the present day and generation there is probably none who has had a more crowded or a more interesting and romantic career than the Princess Salm-Salm, of Bonn, Germany. She was Miss Agnes Le Clerq Joy, a Vermont girl, and she has many relatives throughout the United States. At the age of fifteen and one-half years she married Prince Félix Constantine Alexander John Nepomucene Salm-Salm, who came to the United States as a soldier of fortune and in the Civil War rose to the rank of Brigadier-General. Princess Salm-Salm took part in three wars. In the Civil War she followed the fortunes of battle with her husband, and the Governor of Illinois commissioned her a captain of volunteers and she received a captain's pay. She was wounded during the war. Afterward her husband fought with Maximilian in Mexico, and she was with him. Her deafness to-day is due to a wound she received in that conflict. In 1868 the Prince and his wife went to Germany and the Prince was killed before Metz. The Princess was wounded at Amiens. She has written a book of her experiences and she has traveled all over the world. Her present visit in this country is for the purpose of raising a fund of $30,000 for an ambulance corps to accompany the Boer army in the field. She bears with her a certificate from professors in Bonn testifying to her skill as a nurse.

The Princess recently described how she was able to maintain her youthfulness after all her hard experiences. "I must be doing something all the time," she said.

"I sleep only three or four hours in the twenty-four; never slept more since I can remember, but I sleep like the dead when I do sleep. When I awake I take a cold bath every morning and then begin on my letters."

She is enthusiastic in her championship of the Boer cause.

How German Students Amuse Themselves

BEING wishful to obtain an insight into the ways of student life (a curiosity that the courtesy of German friends enabled us to gratify), we passed through a German university town.

The English boy plays till he is fifteen, and works thence till twenty. In Germany it is the child that works, the young man that plays. The German boy goes to school at seven o'clock in the summer, at eight in the winter, and at school he studies. The result is that at sixteen he has a thorough knowledge of the classics and mathematics, knows as much history as any man compelled to belong to a political party is wise in knowing, together with a thorough grounding in modern languages. Therefore his eight college semesters, extending over four years, are, except for the young man aiming at a professorship, unnecessarily ample. He is not a sportsman, which is a pity, for he would make a good one. He plays football a little, bicycles still less; plays French billiards in stuffy cafés more. But, generally speaking, he, or the majority of him, lays out his time bummeling, beer drinking and fighting. If he be the son of a wealthy father he joins a Korps—to belong to a crack Korps costs about four hundred pounds a year. If he be a middle-class young man he enrolls himself in a Burschenschaft, or a Landsmannschaft, which is still a little cheaper. These companies are again broken up into smaller circles, in which attempt is made to keep to nationality. There are the Swabians, from Swabia; the Frankonians, descendants of the Franks; the Thuringians, and so forth. In practice, of course, this results as all such attempts do result; I believe half our Gordon Highlanders are Cockneys; but the picturesque object is obtained of dividing each university into some dozen or so separate companies of students, each one with its distinctive cap and colors, and its own particular beer hall, into which no other student wearing the colors of his corps may come.

The chief work of these student companies is to fight among themselves, or with some rival Korps or Schaft, the celebrated German Mensur.

The Mensur has been described so often and so thoroughly that I do not intend to bore my readers with any detailed account of it. I merely come forward as an impressionist, and I write purposely the impression of my first Mensur, because I believe that first impressions are more true than opinions blunted by intercourse or shaped by influence.

A Frenchman or a Spaniard will seek to persuade you that the bull ring is an institution got up chiefly for the benefit of the bull. The horse which you imagined to be screaming with pain was only laughing at the comical appearance presented by its own inside. Your French or Spanish friend contrasts its glorious and exciting death in the ring with the cold-blooded brutality of the knacker's yard. If you do not keep a tight hold of your head you come away with the desire to start an agitation for the inception of the bull ring in England as an aid to chivalry. No doubt Torquemada was convinced of the humanity of the Inquisition. To a stout gentleman, suffering from rheumatism, an hour on the rack was really a benefit. He would rise feeling more free in his joints, more elastic than he had felt for years. English huntsmen regard the fox as an animal to be envied. A day's really excellent sport is provided for him free of charge, during which he is the centre of attraction.

Use blinds one to everything one does not wish to see. Every third German gentleman you meet in the street still bears, and will bear to his grave, marks of the twenty to a hundred duels he has fought in his student days. The German children play at the Mensur in the nursery, rehearse it in the gymnasium. The Germans have come to persuade themselves there is no brutality in it, nothing offensive, nothing degrading. Their argument is that it schools the German youth to coolness and courage. If this could be proved, the argument, particularly in a country where every man is a soldier, would be sufficiently one-sided. But is the virtue of the prize-fighter the virtue of the soldier? One doubts it. Nerve and dash are surely of more service in the field than a temperament of unreasoning indifference as to what is happening to one. As a matter of fact, the German student would have to be possessed of much more courage not to fight. He fights not to please himself, but to satisfy a public opinion that is two hundred years behind the times.

All the Mensur does is to brutalize him. There may be skill displayed; I am told there is; but it is not apparent. The mere fighting is like nothing so much as a broad-sword combat at a Richardson's show; the display as a whole is a successful attempt to combine the ludicrous with the unpleasant. In aristocratic Bonn, where style is considered, and in Heidelberg, where visitors from other nations are more common, the affair is perhaps more formal. I am told that there the contests take place in handsome rooms; that gray-haired doctors wait upon the wounded, and liveried servants upon the hungry, and that the affair is conducted throughout with a certain amount of picturesque ceremony. In the more essentially German universities, where strangers are rare and not much encouraged, the simple essentials are the only things kept in view, and these are not of an inviting nature.

Indeed, so distinctly uninviting are they that I strongly advise the sensitive reader to avoid even this description of them. The subject cannot be made pretty, and I do not intend to try.

The room is bare and sordid; its walls splashed with mixed stains of beer, blood and candle grease; its ceiling, smoky; its floor, sawdust covered. A crowd of students, laughing, smoking, talking, some sitting on the floor, others perched upon chairs and benches, form the framework.

In the centre, facing one another, stand the combatants, resembling Japanese warriors as made familiar to us by the Japanese tea-tray. Quaint and rigid, with their goggle-covered eyes, their necks tied up in comforters, their bodies smothered in what look like dirty bed-quilts, their padded arms stretched straight above their heads, they might be a pair of ungainly clockwork figures. The seconds, also more or less padded, their heads and faces protected by huge leather-peaked caps, drag them out into their proper position; one almost listens to hear the sound of the castors. The umpire takes his place, the word is given, and immediately there follow five rapid clashes of the long, straight swords. There is no interest in watching the fight. There is no movement, no skill, no grace. (I am speaking of my own impressions.) The strongest man wins—the man who with his heavily padded arm always in an unnatural position can hold his huge, clumsy sword longest without growing too weak to be able either to guard or to strike.

The whole interest is centred in watching the wounds. They come always in one of two places: on the top of the head or the left side of the face. At the end of each round the doctors rush up, and press together the wounds, dabbing them with little balls of wet cotton wool which an attendant carries ready on a plate. Naturally the moment the men stand up again and commence work the wound opens again.

As the object of each student is to go away from the university bearing as many scars as possible, I doubt if any particular pains be taken to guard, even to the small extent such method of fighting can allow. The real victor is he who comes out with the greatest number of wounds; he who then, stitched and patched almost to unrecognition as a human being, can promenade for the next month, the envy of the German youth, the admiration of the German maiden. He who obtains only a few unimportant wounds retires sulky and disappointed.

But the actual fighting is only the beginning of the fun. The second act of the spectacle takes place in the dressing room. The doctors are generally mere medical students—young fellows who, having taken their degree, are anxious for practice. Truth compels me to say that those with whom I came in contact were coarse-looking men who seemed rather to relish their work. Perhaps they are not to be blamed for this. It is part of the system that as much further punishment as possible must be inflicted by the doctor, and the ideal medical man might hardly care for such a job. How the student bears the dressing of his wounds is as important as how he receives them. Every operation has to be performed as brutally as may be, and his companions carefully watch him during the process to see that he goes through it with an appearance of peace and enjoyment. A clean-cut wound that gapes wide is most desired by all parties. On purpose it is sewn up clumsily, with the hope that by this means the scar will last a lifetime. Such a wound, judiciously mauled and interfered with during the week afterward, can generally be reckoned to secure its fortunate possessor a wife with a dowry of five figures at the least.

These are the general bi-weekly Mensurs, of which the average student fights some dozen a year. There are others to which visitors are not admitted. When a student is considered to have disgraced himself by some slight involuntary movement of the head or body while fighting, then he can only regain his position by standing up to the best swordsman in his Korps. He demands and is accorded not a contest, but a punishment. His opponent then proceeds to inflict as many wounds as can be taken. The object of the victim is to show his comrades that he can stand still while his head is half sliced from his skull.

Whether anything can properly be said in favor of the German Mensur I am doubtful; but if it can it concerns only the two combatants. Upon the spectators, I am convinced, it exercises nothing but evil. I know myself sufficiently well to be sure I am not of an unusually bloodthirsty disposition. The effect it had upon me can only be the usual effect. At first, before the actual work commenced, my sensation was curiosity mingled with anxiety as to how the sight would trouble me. With the second duel, I must confess, my finer feelings began to disappear; and by the time the third was well upon its way, and the room heavy with the curious hot odor of blood, I began, as the American expression is, to see things red.

I wanted more. I looked from face to face surrounding me, and in most of them I found reflected undoubtedly my own sensation. If it be a good thing to excite this bloodthirst in the modern man, then the Mensur is a useful institution. But is it a good thing? We prate about our civilization and humanity, but those of us who do not carry hypocrisy to the length of self-deception know that underneath our starched shirts there lurks the savage, with all his savage instincts untouched. Occasionally he may be wanted, but we never need fear of his dying out. On the other hand, it seems unwise to overnourish him.

In favor of the duel seriously considered there are many points to be urged. But the Mensur serves no good purpose whatever. It is childishness, and the fact of its being a cruel and brutal game makes it none the less childish. Wounds have no intrinsic value of their own; it is the cause that dignifies them, not their size. William Tell is rightly one of the heroes of the world, but what should we think of the members of a club of fathers, formed with the object of meeting twice a week to shoot apples from their sons' heads with cross-bows? These young German gentlemen could obtain all the results of which they are so proud by teasing a wildcat! To join a club for the mere purpose of getting yourself hacked about reduces a man to the intellectual level of a dancing Dervish. Travelers tell us of savages in Central Africa who express their feelings on festive occasions by jumping about and slashing themselves. But there is no need for Europe to imitate them. The Mensur is, in fact, the reductio ad absurdum of the duel; and if the Germans themselves cannot see that it is funny one can only regret their lack of humor.

But though one may be unable to agree with the public opinion that supports and commands the Mensur, it at least is possible to understand. The university code, that, if it does not encourage, at least condones drunkenness, is more difficult to treat argumentatively. All German students do not get drunk—in fact, the majority are sober, if not industrious. But the minority, whose claim to be representative is freely admitted, are only saved from perpetual inebriety by ability, acquired at some cost, to swill half the day and all the night, while retaining to some extent their five senses. It does not affect all alike, but it is common in any university town to see a young man not yet twenty with the figure of a Falstaff and the complexion of an elderly Bacchus. That the German maiden can be fascinated with a face cut and gashed till it suggests having been made out of odd materials that never could have fitted is a proved fact. But surely there can be no attraction about a blotched and bloated skin and a "bay window" thrown out to an extent threatening to overbalance the whole structure. Yet what else can be expected when the youngster starts his beer-drinking with a "Frühschoppen" at ten A. M. and closes it with a "Kneipe" at four in the morning?

The Kneipe is what we should call a stag party, and can be very harmless or very rowdy according to its composition. One man invites his fellow-students, a dozen or a hundred, to a café, and provides them with as much beer and as many cheap cigars as their own sense of health and comfort may dictate. Or the host may be the Korps itself. Here, as everywhere, you observe the German sense of discipline and order. As each newcomer enters, all those sitting around the table rise, and, with heels close together, salute. When the table is complete a Chairman is chosen, whose duty it is to give out the number of the songs. Printed books of these songs, one to each two men, lie around the table. The Chairman gives out number Twenty-nine. "First verse," he cries, and away all go, each two men holding a book between them exactly as two people might hold a hymn-book in church. There is a pause at the end of each verse until the Chairman starts the company on the next. As every German is a trained singer, the effect is striking.

Although the manner may be suggestive of the singing of hymns in church, the words of the songs are occasionally such as to correct this impression. But whether it be a patriotic song, a sentimental ballad, all are sung through with stern earnestness, without a laugh, without a false note. At the end the Chairman calls "Prosit!" Every one answers "Prosit!" and the next moment every glass is empty. The pianist rises and bows, and is bowed to in return; and then the Fraulein enters to refill the glasses.

Amos Cummings, Journalist

By N. A. JENNINGS

IT IS to be doubted if any man ever managed to get more genuine fun out of Washington official life than Amos Jay Cummings, member of Congress from New York, who has been mentioned as a Democratic Vice-Presidential "possibility." His years of training as an active metropolitan newspaper man—reporter, correspondent, city editor, managing editor—gave him a wonderfully keen observation and taught him, as nothing else could, the gentle art of squeezing good stories out of men. There can be no doubt that he is a good Congressman—for every two years his constituents enthusiastically reelect him by big majorities—but there are many old newspaper men in New York to-day who will tell you "it is a pity Amos Cummings ever went to Congress, because it spoiled forever a rattling good managing editor."

Of Mr. Cummings' official life I know but little, but of Mr. Cummings, the managing editor, I know a great deal, and it has occurred to me that it is time the public had a few anecdotes of the man who has written so many good stories about others.

Mr. Cummings began newspaper work in New York on The Tribune, under Horace Greeley. Shortly after Charles A. Dana left The Tribune and assumed the editorship of The Sun he sent for Cummings and offered him a good position. On The Sun, Cummings was reporter, correspondent and, eventually, managing editor. It was while he was the Washington correspondent that he had a memorable interview with Lincoln's Secretary of State, Seward. Cummings received orders one day to get certain information from Secretary Seward without fail, and accordingly he went to the Secretary's office to see him. Mr. Seward did not receive the newspaper man very cordially.

"I won't talk to a representative of The Sun on that subject," said the Secretary. "I am very busy. You are taking up my time, young man, and I can't be bothered with you."

In an instant Cummings was boiling with anger and hurt pride. He drew himself up, looked the Secretary straight in the eyes and said:

"You forget, sir, that there are three parties to this interview."

"Three?" queried Seward in surprise. "How do you make that out?"

"First, sir, there is you, Secretary of State, and one of the foremost figures in the world of men of the day. Second, there is the correspondent of the New York Sun, who has come to you on a perfectly proper errand in the service of his newspaper; and third, sir, there is an American citizen who considers himself the equal of any man on earth, and who will not be insulted by you or any man alive!"

The great Seward looked at Cummings and smiled.

"Sit down," he said, "and tell me exactly what you want, young man."

The Sun not only got the news it wanted, but also one of the best interviews with Seward ever published.

KILLING ADVERTISING TO MAKE ROOM FOR NEWS

When Mr. Cummings was managing editor of The Sun, many years ago, an important news story came in late one night and was sent to the composing-room with "must" written above it, which meant that on no account must the news be left out of the paper. A few minutes later the copy boy returned to the editorial rooms and reported that the foreman had said the paper was already overset, and that two columns of other news would have to be killed if the "must" story was to get in. Cummings took the copy from the boy and went himself to the composing-room. He demanded an explanation. The foreman told him that there was a pressure of advertisements that night, and that they had usurped some of the space usually given to news.

"What shall I kill?" asked the foreman.

"Kill two columns of advertisements and print all the news," ordered Cummings; and it was done.

The next day there was trouble around The Sun office. A hurried meeting of the stockholders was called and it was a stormy one. Some of the stockholders wanted to have Cummings discharged, but Charles A. Dana stood up for him, and as Dana owned the greater part of the stock his voice was all-powerful. After the meeting Mr. Dana walked out of his office and straight to Cummings' desk. He put his hand affectionately on the managing editor's shoulder and said:

"Amos, you have my permission to throw out advertisements to make room for the news whenever in your opinion it is necessary. We are publishing a newspaper, not an advertising poster."

Shortly afterward an improvement was made in the presses, so that two or more pages could be added to the paper at the last moment, if necessary.

EDITORS ENGAGED ON SIGHT

When, in March, 1887, it was decided to publish an evening edition of The Sun, Cummings was put in charge of the new paper. In some way it had leaked out that the paper was to be published, and great preparations were being made in the office of The World to get out an evening edition before The Sun did. When Mr. Dana heard of this he told Cummings he must get out the first copy of The Evening Sun in two days, although nothing was in readiness. Cummings said he would do it. Mr. Dana told him he could have all the help he wanted from the staff of the morning paper. Cummings said he didn't want any help, but would get his own staff of reporters and editors. Then he let it be known in Park Row that reporters and editors were wanted. He took the first twenty or thirty men who applied for work. I happened to be the third man who applied.

"Well," said Cummings, "go out and get a story. I'll pay you eight dollars a column for it."

"But what kind of a——"

"Oh, anything you see that's interesting. Use your eyes."

Mr. Cummings is devoted to fishing and is very fond of sailing. One summer, a number of years ago, he passed two weeks on a pilot boat and took Ernest Jarrold, the author of Mickey Finn Idylls, with him for company. One day a great storm arose and the pilot boat was tossed about on the waves like a chip. Every minute a wave would dash over the deck and threaten to carry everything away and swamp the boat. Cummings and Jarrold were in the little cabin, the former lying in a bunk intently reading a book on the French Revolution. Jarrold poked his head out to look at the storm, when a mountain of sea water fell with a boom on the deck and filled his eyes with spray. The boat gave a fearful lurch and careened until it seemed that she must turn completely over.

"This is awful, Amos," said Jarrold. "I'm going to put on a life preserver, for I don't think the boat can stand it many minutes longer."

"Oh, keep quiet and let me read, Mickey," said Cummings, never lifting his eyes from the page. "The men on this boat draw a regular salary to keep her afloat."

The Plain Way of Government

THE general turning of public attention to South Africa has popularized knowledge of the Transvaal Republic. One feature which has attracted special notice is the simplicity and directness which characterize the relations between the executive and legislative branches. President Kruger is in the habit of participating in the sittings of the Raad. Soon after the Raad has been called to order, the President enters by a side door leading into the executive chamber. The members rise as a mark of respect for the dignity of his office, and remain standing until he has seated himself near the Speaker's chair. The President listens to the discussions of the legislators and offers explanations or advice whenever he sees fit.

The practice in Switzerland, also an intensely democratic commonwealth, is similar. The President and the members of the Federal Council have not only the right to take part in the discussions of either House of the General Assembly, but they have also the right to make motions on any matter under consideration. They cannot vote, but they have full opportunity to explain and advise. In practice the actual initiative of legislation is in the hands of the President and Council. Bills are prepared in advance of the meeting of the Assembly, and, together with full explanatory reports, are published in the official gazette, and are thence carried by the newspapers into every corner of the confederation. The measures are discussed by the people, and when the Assembly meets, public opinion has already taken definite shape on the measures to be considered. There is as little debate in the Assembly as at the meeting of a board of directors of a business corporation. The members of the Federal Council are present to give any information that may be desired. Questions are asked and answered, but the tone of the discussion is businesslike, and not political, in the sense in which the word is used in this country. The system is not only thoroughly efficient, but it is also extremely economical. The cost of maintaining the executive department of Switzerland does not exceed $17,000 a year. It has sometimes cost as much as that to prepare and print the reports called for by a single resolution of inquiry addressed by Congress to our executive department, whereas under the Swiss system the matter would have been satisfactorily disposed of at once by statements and explanations from the Federal Council.

Widely different as is the actual practice in the United States, it is more the result of usage than of constitutional intention. The original idea was that close relations should exist between the executive department and Congress. The rules of the Senate still provide that "when the President of the United States shall meet the Senate in the Senate chamber, the President of the Senate shall have a seat on the floor, he considered as the head of the Senate, and his chair shall be assigned to the President of the United States." The rule is dead letter now, since the President never sits with the Senate, but in Washington's time the President and his Cabinet officers would go into either House and make oral communications on public affairs. So far as the intent of the Constitution and the original practice of the Government are concerned, there is no reason why methods as simple and democratic as those which prevail in the Transvaal Republic or in Switzerland should not exist in this country.

The causes for the ceremonial distance at which the relations between the executive department and Congress have been placed are to be found in the accidents of our political history, and, being the result of gradual development, they cannot be removed except by influences as profound as those which produced them. It is, however, easy to discover that just here is to be found the secret of the extraordinary violence of partisanship in this country. The gap between executive direction and legislative control leaves room for a dense growth of prejudices, misconceptions and animosities, through which the public business must force its way, and it is able to do so only by a fury of party activity that keeps our politics in a strange state of heat and turmoil.

Ruskin's Idea of Beauty

THE most remarkable fact in John Ruskin's character and influence has hardly been indicated in what has been said of him since his death. Devotion at once to beauty and to goodness is a combination rarely met in the great men who have given themselves to art or to literature. In most cases the one seems to exclude the other. It is exceptional when a book combines artistic worth with a spiritual purpose, as is true of The Pilgrim's Progress, and even that was an unintentional exception. And it is too common to find really artistic writers exhibit that repugnance to spiritual truths which John Foster deplored in a famous essay. Even when they do not dislike them, they, with Shakespeare, avoid them.

The exceptions to this among minds of the first class embrace Plato, Augustine, Michael Angelo, Milton, Pascal, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Schiller, Tennyson and Browning. But in none of them, except, perhaps, Michael Angelo, was there such a fusion of ethical and æsthetic enthusiasm as in John Ruskin. To him, beauty was a matter of the highest moral import. The beautiful was to him a gate of the divine temple through which a man might press into the holiest of all. He had no patience with the notion that art exists to adorn and to please, and has no higher mission for human life. In his view, the vocation of the artist is as solemn as that of the prophet or the preacher, and the highest success in it can be attained only through the mastery of the baser self—of the laziness, the irreverence, the conceit, and the frivolity which unfit men for grave dealing with truth. And his influence over his generation has been greatest in just this direction. He has taught it not to divorce what God has joined in His world and in His Word, both of which show the blending of goodness with beauty.

The type of building which was associated with religious worship in this country in the early half of the century shows what a need there was for such a message. The churches and meeting-houses of Colonial times had their merit, even to an artist's eye, in the exact adaptation of structure to use, and the simplicity which is an elementary form of beauty. It was when we became rich enough and ambitious to do better than simplicity that the evil days set in. Elaborate and pretentious ugliness raised its head, imitating every form of building, from the Greek temple to the American circus, and all dedicated less to the worship of God than to the comfort of His creatures. All symbolism was ruled out, and only the lowest utilities were considered in the details of the structure. They were designed to make the attendants on church services as comfortable as possible and to display their collective wealth.

The desire for beauty is not yet disassociated from these faults in the building of our churches. There is still too much of the old leaven of ease and self-importance in their arrangements. But the uses of the edifice are kept better in view, and truer ideas of what constitutes beauty are shown in general design and in detail. We are ceasing to associate our religion with elaborate and studied ugliness, such as found its rebuke in every cloud visible through the church window, and every tree that outlined its winter's lacery, or spread its summer's wealth of greenery before the eye of the worshiper within. And to all this Ruskin has been a great helper.

In the darkest hour Hope used to strike a match, but now it presses the electric button.

Getting Acquainted with Life

OF OLD, men took observations to note the peculiarities of various movements in Nature, which, because they were inexplicable, seemed probably connected with the great secret of chance and change so fascinating to simple minds. The stars apparently wandering in the heavens, the birds coming out of unknown regions and returning again year after year, the tides, the winds, the lightnings, the inaccessible mountain heights flung up by some unimaginable power, indeed all the large throbs of force and life, called for that childish attention and interpretation which to our modern minds can seem but strange in connection with the tremendous virility of the ancients. Yet when we take a perfectly sincere look at our own attitude toward Nature we easily discover that, after all, we have made but a short step since the days of Homer, so far as actual solution of the great problem of life is concerned.

Very trite all this; but the trite things are often simply the knots we cannot untie, the gnarled difficulties that have lain so long by the wayside that the generations have become too familiar with them to be curious about them. We have learned a great deal about how to apply Nature's forces; but of their origin, what they really are, we know absolutely nothing. Trite again; but there is just here a constant quantity of ignorance to which we may always refer the overconfident philosopher who assumes to pass the limit of common human understanding.

Men are not always quacks when they give way to a sudden access of enthusiasm and proclaim a discovery which threatens the ancient barriers that guard life's awful secrets. At one time Dr. Elliott Coués thought he had without doubt discovered the soul of a bird. Many a savant has trembled when he felt what he sincerely believed was a waft of essential knowledge betraying the very heart of Nature. Pythagoras in his time came just as near hearing the very tune the spheres were playing as the astronomers of our day can come to seeing what the inhabitants of the moon or of Mars are doing. A few years ago we were on the point of surprising the cell in its obscure yet tremendously effective work of originating life. The "physical basis" was a phrase flung from distance to distance by the tongues of science, and the microscope was going to make the final disclosure; but upon the crucial test even the cell was no better to go by than a flight of birds or a reeling constellation.

Gravitation is but a name for mystery; heat and light and the flowing of air and water are just as inexplicable to us as they were to Pindar. We generate electricity and chain it to our wheels, yet we can no more account for it than for our own heart-beats and nerve-action. The heathen in the oldest Egyptian time, when he saw the lightning rive the cloud, knew far less about machinery and the equation of forces than we know; but to the question, "What is lightning?" he could have answered just as nearly as we the last refinement of truth.

The trouble with us is that we do not realize how little we have advanced in the direction of ultimate discovery. We treat certain prime mysteries as if they were mere axioms, too simple and obvious for further examination. This, however, has always been a human weakness, and the strange men whom we call by the name of genius distinguish themselves by breaking these old axioms up into manageable fragments and building out of them new forms of poetry, philosophy, prophecy.

Each of these masters has his way of startling the world afresh and making it for a moment expect some disclosure which shall rob life of its mystery and remove or modify the tyranny of death.

The one vital advance, the one true biological increment of which we can boast over the high heathens is that we have lengthened the average of human life. Can we continue this increment through future years? If we can, here is the solution on scientific grounds; for it is known that Nature moves slowly, with lingering steps, not by cataclysms.

—MAURICE THOMPSON.

Overheated Cars and Idiotic Passengers

EXCEPT on extremely cold days American railway cars are overheated to a scandalous degree, being at least ten degrees warmer than is healthful. Now if the reason that American men and American women come into these cars and keep on their coats and capes and wraps is because they like to be heated to the point of roasting, then are they salamanders and this editorial is not for them. But if they are lazy and keep on their ulsters and paletots because it is too much trouble to remove them, then they may learn the practice of wisdom from one of the humblest of travelers, remove their furs and shawls and overcoats, and be comfortable. And if they are merely absent-minded and wonder why they dread the daily ride to and from their suburban homes, then let me tell them loudly that it is because they forget to take off those outdoor wraps that they would never think of wearing in their own living-rooms.

To a nervous man whose blood circulates freely, the spectacle of seemingly sane men and women buttoned up in garments of fur or other heavy stuffs when the temperature is exploring the tube in the neighborhood of ninety degrees is one calculated to plunge him into an untimely perspiration, and yet there is not a day in the winter when such a scene may not be witnessed wherever there are steam or fire heated steam railroads.

How can you stand it, fellow-passengers? And how can you run the risk of letting that little boy of whom you are so fond keep his heavy pea jacket on when you know perfectly well that as soon as he reaches outside air he will be at the mercy of that biting nor'easter, with nothing extra to cover his shivering, because erstwhile superheated, body?

Disease stalks up and down the train like the vender of candles, crying in inaudible but none the less terrible tones: "Plenty of time before the train gets there to catch pneumonia, consumption, laryngitis and all the other unpopular ills! Keep your coats buttoned up while the brakeman hermetically seals the ventilators and runs the steam heat to the topmost notch!"

To-morrow, when the doctor calls you will say, "I'm sure I don't know how I caught cold, for I have kept myself so warm."

But your mortal enemy, the brakeman, could tell you. He and the fur wraps and that heavy ulster and the sizzling hot steam heat and the bad air and your crass idiocy all helped with a right good will. And if you escape pneumonia and have another chance to ride in the swiftly propelled inferno, do you think that you will remember what you have escaped and hang your little coat on the hook provided for that purpose?

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES"

The Modern Revival in Political Oratory

On one of the buildings of Harvard University are seven sculptured heads, supposed to be those of the greatest orators of the world—Demosthenes the Greek, Cicero the Roman, St. Chrysostom the Syrian, Bossuet the Frenchman, Chatham and Burke the Englishmen, and Daniel Webster the American. If any one should have any doubt whatever about the practical value of oratory, all he need do would be to read the lives of these seven men. They gave voice to the sentiments and the destinies of their peoples, and arrayed the forces of civilization and patriotism upon definite issues.

In this country, at the close of the century, the office of the orator has undoubted usefulness. It has been said for many years that the multiplication of newspapers and printing would inevitably destroy the orator, but now we are beginning to see that in the very promiscuousness of modern education and publicity we need the work of eloquence to give direction to our statesmanship and politics. Even the newspapers need this service; and surely when the orator takes into consideration the broader view, he must appreciate the fact that never in the world's history was the opportunity so great as at present. Not only does he address a splendid concourse of people, but his thoughts go to millions of attentive readers within a dozen hours of their deliverance.

New Congressmen and Old Precedents

For a long time it was the unwritten rule in both branches of Congress that the new man should sit patiently in his seat one or more years before daring to make a speech. In the House of Representatives a new member of ability usually succeeded in saying something in his second year, and, using this speech in his campaign for renomination, added in his own behalf, as a claim for his candidacy, that a man must be in Congress at least two years before amounting to anything, and that the constituents would therefore serve their own interests by reelecting him; otherwise they would lose his experience. Thus it came about that in probably one-half of the Congressional districts of the United States it has been the rule to give every Representative two terms. As a matter of fact, the new member, if he has ability, is often a better Representative than the old stager, because he is fresher from the people and is better able to interpret their sentiments and desires.

In the Senate the precedent of waiting, of sitting reverently at the feet of those who had served longer, was being carried to ridiculous extremes. We see now, however, that this modern custom in both Senate and House was largely due to the fact that great men of other generations naturally took the leadership of debates, and when the great men disappeared from public life the smaller ones maintained the etiquette for their own dignity.

In recent Congresses there have come to the front new men fully equipped for their duties and sensibly determined to avail themselves of their rightful opportunities—and thus the precedents have been broken.

The Great Orators of Other Years

In this new order of things Congress is simply returning to its former habits. Randolph, Calhoun, Clay and Webster, the wonderful orators of the first half of the century, wasted no time in participating in the discussions. They took at once the place to which their abilities admitted them, and in the stress and strain of those strong, tense times which led to the Civil War, when passion ran high and collision drew the brightest sparks, there was a vigor in the oratory which was superb. The feeling of the times can be judged when such a man as Wendell Phillips, one of the greatest of our orators, who was as gentle and as winsome as a woman, would not honor Henry Clay or Daniel Webster even after death, because neither of them realized his abolition views.

The speakers of those times had larger opportunities not only in their themes, but by reason of the fact that both branches of Congress were much smaller than they are to-day, and were not held in check by cast-iron rules. When Speaker Reed revolutionized the parliamentary government of the House of Representatives he made it a better business body, but he did not help its oratory. In many cases it was almost a humiliation for a member to get an opportunity to speak, for it had to be literally begged. Speaker Henderson is not quite so strict, but his committee on rules keeps a tight hold upon the speechmaking.

Members of Congress Who Have Won Fame

The two men in the present Congress who, more than others, have made reputations by first speeches are Senator Beveridge, of Indiana, and Representative Littlefield, of Maine. Mr. Beveridge was criticised for presuming to make a set speech so early in his Senatorial career, but the criticism was answered by the performance; and not only his crowded audience and his colleagues, but the country itself applauded him. In the debate which ended in the exclusion of Roberts, the Mormon, from the House of Representatives, Mr. Littlefield, by the sustained excellence, the clear reasoning and the eloquent expression of his speech, placed himself literally in the front ranks of Congressional orators; and again in pleading for Puerto Rico he deepened the first impression. His star is still rising. When Mr. Wolcott, of Colorado, first went into the Senate his brilliant oratory refused to remain quiet under the old precedents, and whenever he rises to speak the galleries are filled, and the newspapers print what he says. Senator Depew, a new member, has already made a set speech—and a good one, too. Representative John M. Allen, the famous humorist of Mississippi, by his inimitable drollery helped in the first years of his Congressional life to upset the same old precedents in the House; and thus it has gone on, until now a Congressman in either branch need not keep himself bottled up for fear of shocking the sensibilities of the older members.

The General Demand for Good Speakers

One reason that the present is a great time for the orator is the fact that more people can appreciate good English and eloquent sentences. Indeed, the supply is not keeping up with the demand. There are of course many excellent people who think that they can be eloquent, but somehow they fail to impress others with their own confidence. Eloquence is something that cannot be made by training or by desire. The fire must be in the soul.

Recently the present writer spent an evening with one of the most eloquent men in the United States. On his desk were letters by the dozen asking him to speak in six different States in the same week, the occasions being banquets and anniversaries, and there were telegrams from three of the principal cities of the country begging him to accept invitations to important functions. In one case letters and telegrams had poured in upon him for a full week, and two delegations from the same organization had come several hundred miles to get him to be their orator. Those who accept to the extent of their ability practically have every moment of their time mortgaged. But few men have been able to stand the strain, because it generally means midnight hours and insufficient rest. Some of the wisest of them have chosen between a post-prandial reputation and time and strength for public service. Eventually it may be that our speechmaking will be arranged so that every great banquet shall have its special political usefulness and significance.

Congress as a School of Oratory

After all, however, the chief forums must be the Senate and the House of Representatives. More and more Washington becomes the centre of our interests. The big questions there concern all, and every one who studied the tendencies of the past decade has observed how much more attention is being paid each year to the work and the character of Congress. There is a physical reason for this. A speech goes farther from there than from any other point. It is read by more people. Another thing is that the most perfect record of what is said is kept in the archives and proceedings of the Nation. The fact that we have three differences of time in the United States, and that our Capital is well within the first division, makes it possible that any speech or debate worth telegraphing can be placed before the people of the country in the morning. Indeed, often the afternoon papers contain the full details. And the modern orator, however much he may strive to arouse his immediate audience, never forgets the millions of the newspapers. Thus Washington, as the best and most accurately reported place in the world, has advantages that statesmanship needs.

The Larger Field in the Presidential Year

In a few months, however, the orators will be doing their best all over the country. Speechmaking is the show part of a campaign. Every party man who has the gift of saying things well and holding the attention of a crowd is asked to participate. The opportunities are abundant and attractive, and nearly all of our public men began in that way. It is the real American school of eloquence, and it has some of the best graduates the world has ever known. Of course the simple experience on the stump breeds extravagance of statement and manner, but these things are generally smoothed down if the man gets into public life.

There is where Congress becomes a post-graduate school. It is often called the graveyard of village reputations, but more than that it is the fortune or the finish of local eloquence. If the orator can combine the force and commonsense of his district with the higher demands of the national forum, he will soon take his place among the few men who are honored for their balance as well as for their brilliancy. The criterion of oratory is the result. "A good speech is a good thing," said O'Connell, "but the verdict is the thing."

In Ebenezer Pulpit
A Story of Jim-Ned Creek
By M. E. M. Davis

I

THE Rev. John Skaggs sat in the box-pulpit awaiting the conclusion of the hymn which, sung according to a time-honored custom by a sister in good standing in the church, invariably followed the sermon.

The pulpit of Ebenezer Church had a ramshackle and unstable appearance; it was in reality perfectly safe. The underpinning and the scantlings by which it held on to the wall were of seasoned post-oak; the hewn floor was half a foot thick. The bench within was correspondingly sturdy. Otherwise it must long ago have crashed beneath Elder Groves, the Baptist, who preached at Ebenezer the second Sunday in every month; or splintered under Parson Daniel, the Soul Sleeper, who, at irregular intervals, hurled fire and brimstone from Ebenezer pulpit.

These reverend gentlemen, who—pitted against each other in Christian debate—sometimes sat side by side on the pulpit bench, were uncommonly hefty. Brother Skaggs, the Methodist circuit-rider, however, was lean and lank, and would have been comparatively safe even had the box been as uncertain as it looked. He occupied it the first and third Sundays of the month, leaving the fourth to a New School Presbyterian, whose written sermons were heard with grave disapproval by the Ebenezer congregation.

Brother Skaggs on this particular Sunday morning listened devoutly while Sister Beasley's voice vibrated shrill and insistent on the warm September air:

"P-s-a'ms of vic-to-ree,
Cr-owns of glo-er-ee,
P-s-a'ms of vic-to-ree
We shell wear!"

The congregation, take it all in all, listened decorously. There was, as usual, a little flutter around the place where Polly Maria Pinson was sitting; and some of the children tittered audibly when Pap Beasley, nodding in the amen corner, thumped his bald head against the wall. But saint and sinner for the most part remained stolidly attentive through the interminable hosanna. As the last note quavered into silence and the singer reached down into her pocket for her snuff-box the preacher arose.

"Bretheren and sisters," he announced solemnly, "there will be no preachin' in this church for three Sundays hand-runnin'——"

"Glory be!" shouted Mr. Beasley, his habit of backing up the preacher sticking to him even in his slumbers. His wife poked a finger in his ribs, and Mr. Newt Pinson groaned aloud in a laudable endeavor to cover the blunder.

"Elder Groves," continued the preacher, "is to meet Parson Daniel in dee-bate next Sunday at Fork Valley schoolhouse; I myself must attend Quarterly Meeting the following Sunday; and Brother Milford (the Presbyterian) will be unable to fill his regular appointment this month. On the first Sunday of next month, God willing, I will be here to point out to you the error of your ways. Let us pray."

Mr. Tolliver, the Jim-Ned Creek school-teacher, knelt down with the sanctified. He was not a professing member, but he held religion in great respect; and he always conformed to the ritual of that branch of the church militant which chanced to occupy Ebenezer pulpit. He even knelt in prayer on the Presbyterian Sunday. On the present occasion he remained on his knees some seconds after the Rev. Skaggs' long drawn amen. When he stood up he had, as Mrs. Pinson, sitting near him, afterward recalled, "a cur'us look out'n his eyes."

He responded courteously but absently to the familiar greetings of the women lingering within the church to exchange neighborhood gossip, and to the hearty salutations of the men grouped about the hitching posts outside.

"Ole Toll 'll stump his big toe ef he don't look out," remarked Joe Trimble facetiously, glancing at him as he unhitched a slab-sided mule and prepared to mount. "What in thunderation business hez a man got teachin' of school anyhow!" Mr. Trimble continued in a reflective tone. "Twelve year an' better the ole man hez been school-teachin' on Jim-Ned, an' what's he got? Not even a dern steer!"

"Shet up, Joe!" interrupted Tobe Cullum good-humoredly; "much steer you'd have yo'se'f if it wa'nt for Mis' Trimble."

"He knows enough Greek an' Latin, old Toll does, to down the Governor of Texas," said Sid Northcutt, following the movements of the pedagogue with his handsome, lazy eyes, "but he ain't got as much horse-sense as a blind mole. You can fool him as easy as lyin'! Why, day before yesterday me an Jack Carter gave him——"

The story was cut short by the sudden appearance of Miss Pinson. She came out of the church and sprang unassisted upon the horse-block, where she stood looking like a butterfly poised for flight. Her pink muslin skirts were gathered coquettishly in one hand; with the other she held the fluttering ribbons of her wide-brimmed straw hat.

Polly Maria Pinson was, at this time, far and away the prettiest girl on Jim-Ned Creek. She was slim and graceful, with dancing brown eyes, and a wealth of red-gold hair that tumbled in ringlets about the whitest neck in the world. She had a saucy tongue to her head, and an adorably hot temper; and she enjoyed the distinction of having been expelled from Mr. Tolliver's school for disobedience and inattention three times in as many consecutive school-terms.

Miss Pinson also gazed after the teacher now jogging slowly across the shinn-oak prairie in the direction of Pap Beasley's farm, where he boarded.

"Hateful old thing! It gives me the fever-'n'-ague just to look at him," she declared with a toss of her head and an affected shiver. "I de-spise him! He's studyin' this minute how he's goin' to keep me in next session, an' set an' look at me. Ugh! I'll show him!"

For Polly Maria, despite her misdemeanors, her seventeen years, and her belledom, was not yet "shet" of school.

"Law, Miss Polly Maria," cried Mr. Northcutt gallantly, "you can't blame Old Toll for wantin' to keep you in; nor for settin' an' lookin' at you! 'Most any of us would do that if we could!"

Mr. Tolliver heard the shout of laughter which greeted this speech, and glanced back over his shoulder. He saw the pink-clad, big-hatted figure on the horse-block and the ring of men and boys below; and he knew by past experience that his rebellious and unmanageable pupil was ridiculing him.

But something unwonted within his inmost being assuaged the pang which this knowledge would otherwise have given him. A curious look, indeed, shone in his eyes—a look of exaltation, of determination. "Yes," he murmured half aloud, as Pap Beasley's plough-mule trotted lazily across the shinn-oak prairie and entered the scraggy shadows of the post-oak rough beyond. "Yes, there is sufficient time. I will adventure it. I will do it!"

Mr. Tolliver was a short, rotund man with a homely, pleasant face, deep-set, blue eyes, and a courtly though timid bearing. He was barely thirty-three years old. But on Jim-Ned Creek, where marrying and giving in marriage begin early, a bachelor of thirty-three is a sort of aged monstrosity. Why, Sam Leggett, three years his junior, was the father of five blooming young Leggetts; Bob Granger, three years his senior, was a jovial grandfather!

A dozen years before the beginning of this story, Mr. Tolliver, fresh from college, had drifted into West Texas, a sickly lad in search of health. During the greater part of the time since he had—to use his own whimsical phraseology—"instructed the youth (both sexes) of James-Edward Creek." With returning health had come, in earlier days, first a vigorous determination, then a mild purpose, finally a lazily postponed resolve to return to his natal hills.

But any mortal who has breathed the primitive, simple, honest, kindly atmosphere of a frontier neighborhood—one who has heard the whirr of partridge wings and the fitful dropping of pecan-nuts along Jim-Ned in October, or followed the coon-dogs across the creek-bottom on a crisp winter midnight, or smelled the wild-plum blossoms in springtime, or loafed on a summer evening around Bishop's Store swapping stories with "the boys"—such an one will understand why Mr. Tolliver stayed on and on, sometimes dreaming of his modest but comfortable inheritance in old Virginia, but oftener forgetting all about it, and meekly enduring Mrs. Beasley's leaky shed-room, her unspeakable cookery and her shrill tongue, and the perpetual insults of Polly Maria Pinson.

Latterly, indeed, he had acknowledged to his secret soul certain new, half-defined and wholly hopeless reasons for staying on, teaching school at Ebenezer—when the children were not picking cotton; at other times poring over his well-thumbed books and cluttering the shed-room with curious specimens from the animal and vegetable kingdoms.

At this moment, however, all other considerations were overridden by a mighty determination.

"There is time," he repeated, turning in at the Beasley gate. "I will adventure. I will succeed."

The next morning Sammy Beasley, aged ten, bounced weeping and wailing upon the back porch where the family sat at breakfast. "M-m-maw," he blubbered, "Mrs. Hambledon ain't on her nes'. 'N I c-can't find her no-w-wheres."

Mrs. Hamilton was a yellow-legged "dominecker" hen, and Sammy's private property.

"Ye don't say," said his mother sympathetically; "I reckin a skunk must of got her . . . Law, pap, pound Mr. Tolliver on the back! 'Pears like he's chokin' hisse'f to death!"

"Sumpin' shore is the matter with Mr. Tolliver," she confided in the course of the next few days to Mrs. Pinson and other gossips; "he ain't a mite like hisse'f. He acks plum cur'us. An' ever' blessed mornin' he pikes over to Ebenezer Church, same ez ef school was in session. Sammy seen him five mornin's han'-runnin'."

"He's mournin'!" cried Mrs. Pinson. "I knowed it when I seen him git up offe'n his knees las' Sunday after Brother Skaggs' prayer. Sho's you bawn he's mournin'!"

II

ON THE fourth Sunday of the same month, a little past noon, Mr. Tolliver rode up to Bishop's Store, dismounted, hitched his mule and strolled into the squat, unpainted building. He took a thick yellow bottle from his pocket and handed it to Bud Hines, the clerk, across the counter.

"Good-morning, Bud," he said in his soft, drawling tones; "Mrs. Beasley is out of snuff. Will you be kind enough—although it is Sunday—to fill her bottle? Also, will you please put up a plug of Niggerhead for Mr. Beasley? Good-morning, Mr. Northcutt," he added, turning to that young gentleman, who was engaged in buckling to the heels of his riding-boots a pair of gigantic silver spurs, "in which direction are you riding to-day? And where," he glanced around the deserted store, "where are the other boys?"

"Good-day, Mr. Tolliver, I am bound for church," replied Sid, answering the first query. As he spoke he crossed the porch, leaped upon the horse, pawing and champing by the steps, and galloped away.

"To church?" echoed Mr. Tolliver, vaguely disquieted.

"The boys has all gone to Ebenezer Church," said Mr. Hines, ramming the stopper into the mouth of Mrs. Beasley's refilled snuff-bottle.

"Ebenezer Church!" gasped Mr. Tolliver.

"Yes-sir-ree. Parson Dan'el has up-ropiated Ebenezer pul-pit. Ez soon ez that one-gallus Soul Sleeper heered Brother Milford wa'n't goin' to keep his app'intment, he come a-bulgin.' Jack Carter rid aroun' the precink this mornin', spreadin' the news. The other boys went soon. Sid Northcutt, he don't keer, so's he gits there time enough to ride home with Polly Maria Pinson. Sid is plum stuck on Polly Maria. S-a-a-y! Mr. Tolliver! You've fergot Mrs. Beasley's snuff!"

He ran out and called frantically after his customer, shaking the fat bottle above his head. But Mr. Tolliver, urging the astonished mule to a gallop, was already far down the road and did not even turn his head.

He heard the voice of Parson Daniel beating the air with wings of wrath long before he reached the little church set in a motte of live-oaks on the edge of the prairie. He slid in at the open door and dropped, pale and trembling, upon one of the back benches. A look of relief crossed his face as he surveyed preacher and congregation. The former had just begun to denounce the backsliders and to threaten the off-holders, by which token the latter, familiar with these powerful discourses, knew that the sermon proper was approaching its conclusion. Sleeping children were being shaken into shape; fans and handkerchiefs tucked into pockets; shoes slipped off for comfort, slyly pulled on.

"Nothing has happened. Perhaps nothing will happen. I am safe!" groaned the teacher inwardly. He wiped the cold perspiration from his forehead, and leaned back, covering his face with his hand.

"He's shore mournin'!" whispered Mrs. Trimble to Mrs. Pinson in high excitement; "Parson Dan'el kin pull him thro' ef anybody kin. Lord, ef he'll only come forrard!"

But Mr. Tolliver remained in his place when mourners were called; and the portly preacher finally sat down on the pulpit bench and began to line out the closing hymn:

"Where, now, is good old Moses?
Where, now, is good old Moses?
He went up from the top of Nebo,
He went up ——"

He stopped, a queer look dawning into his large face. Those sitting near the pulpit heard a sudden click—a sound like the cocking of a pistol. It seemed to come from under the preacher's feet. He waited a moment, frowningly expectant, then cleared his throat and repeated:

"He went up from the top of——"

An angry squawk interrupted him—a belligerent cackle which brought him standing. He glared about him, irate and mystified. At the same moment a yellow-legged, woe-begone, well-nigh featherless hen hustled from under the pulpit bench and hopped noisily down the pulpit steps.

She was followed topsy-turvy by half a dozen fluffy golden balls which rolled after her and ran about the aisles, cheeping distractedly.

There was an interval of bewildered silence, in the midst of which Sammy Beasley darted from the amen corner, scrambling after the clucking hen and screaming at the top of his lungs: "Whoop-ee! whoop-ee! Mis' Hambledon! Mis' Hambledon!"

"Ye limb o' sin an' Satan!" cried Pap Beasley, puffing down the aisle. "How'd ye dassen to set that dominecker in Ebenezer pul-pit? How'd ye dassen?"

"I never! I never!" screamed Sammy; "I wisht I may die ef I sot her. She's gone an' stole a nes' in that pul-pit!"

But Parson Daniel, reaching under the pulpit bench, had dragged forth a tell-tale candle-box carefully lined with straw. He placed this on the pulpit shelf and surveyed with righteous anger the giggling crowd.

"Where," he roared, "where is the rep'obate? Where is the —— "

"Have the goodness to be silent a moment, Parson Daniel." It was Mr. Tolliver who was speaking. He had mounted the pulpit steps. "Mea culpa—that is to say, I set that hen," he went on, wincing visibly at a mocking peal of laughter from Miss Pinson. "I intended no disrespect to Ebenezer pulpit when I did it. But I ask the pardon of Parson Daniel and of all professing church members here present. If anybody else has anything to say about it," he concluded defiantly, "I am ready to settle it outside of the church."

A profound hush attested to the respect in which at bottom the school-teacher was held by his neighbors. Not a sound disturbed his progress down the aisle except the impotent protests of Mrs. Hamilton, by this time tightly squeezed under her owner's arm. But the Jim-Nedders, who would have shared their last nickel with him, or shed their last drop of blood for him, could not withstand the relish of this exquisite joke on Old Toll. A howl of laughter followed him to the hitching-post; it swept him, in spite of his physical and moral courage, into the saddle; and pursued him in fitful gusts across the shinn-oak prairie.

Parson Daniel dismissed the congregation, and Sid Northcutt finished the story interrupted three Sundays earlier.

"Me an' Jack Carter," he said between spasms of mirth, "painted up some hen eggs—streaked 'em an' spotted 'em with pokeberry juice—an' gave 'em to Old Toll. We told him we'd found 'em over on Rastler's Creek; an' we discribed the wild hen that laid 'em, exactly like a picture the old man had showed us in one of his dern big dictionary-books. He was mighty interested. He said if that was the case, gentlemen, the eggs was a valuable discovery, bein' as the fowl in the dictionary belonged to an extink specie. He was plum tickled; said he'd hatch them eggs if he could get holt of a settin' hen, an' a place where them Beasley children wouldn't torment her. Said he wanted to watch the habits of the fowls that come out of them eggs, gentlemen, an' if they turned out to be that extink specie, he'd write to some dern long-named society at Washington"—Mr. Northcutt imitated to perfection Mr. Tolliver's gentle drawl. "Who in thunder would have thought he'd go to work to set Sammy Beasley's dominecker hen in Ebenezer pulpit!" Mr. Northcutt went on. "He ain't got no more sense than a blind mole. You can fool him easy as lyin'," he concluded, turning for approval and applause to Miss Pinson.

That young person had picked up the chickens and was holding them in her upgathered pink muslin skirts. She had laughed long and loudly while Mr. Tolliver was within hearing. Now she turned savagely upon his persecutors.

"Mr. Tolliver may not have your horse-sense, Mr. Sidney Northcutt," she cried in a clear, ringing voice, "but he is a gentleman and worth a million of you—and of all the balance of you standin' around Ebenezer pulpit makin' fun of him!"

She flashed her angry eyes from one to another, scorching even the indignant preacher with their fire. Then, with blazing cheeks and head erect, she marched down the aisle and through the door; unhitched her horse, jumped into the saddle without her riding skirt, and rode off toward Beasley's with the chickens.

Sid Northcutt followed her to the horse-block mechanically and watched her out of sight, with jaws dropped and eyes fairly starting out of their sockets.

The rest of the congregation stared, one at another, in dumb amazement.

Mr. Tolliver stabled the mule and seated himself on the deserted porch at Beasley's. There was a fine view under his eyes; but Mr. Tolliver saw nothing of the familiar landscape. What he did see was a slight figure in a pink muslin frock; what he heard was a single rippling peal of mocking laughter. And the more he saw in his mind's eye that pink-clad figure, the more he heard in fancy the girlish laughter of his impertinent pupil, the more unbearable grew the mixed emotions which stormed and contended in his soul. He leaped to his feet, clenching his fist; and at that moment Old Toll was no longer old, or meek, or even homely! He was transformed, like the prince in a fairy tale, into a young, middling-handsome and extremely wrathful man. "I shall not stop at keeping her in next term," he roared. "Neither will I expel her as heretofore. I will . . . I will whip her, —— if I don't!"

"Please, Mr. Tolliver," said Polly Maria, in the softest of voices at his elbow, "I've come to fetch you your chickens. They ain't nothin' in this livin' world but yellow-legged domineckers, but I'll raise 'em for you, if you'll let me. And, oh, Mr. Tolliver, I knew my les-les-lessons all the t-time, and I didn't want to be so sa-sa-sassy! I just w-wanted you to no-notice me, and you w-w-wouldn't!"

"Why, Polly Maria!" exclaimed Mr. Tolliver, a wave of doubt, curiosity, ecstasy crossing his face. And then——!

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

"MR. CLARK MADE A GOOD IMPRESSION"

WASHINGTON, March, 1900.

I HAVE certainly been reminded during this last week of the spectator who, perched upon the highest seat under the canvas tent at the "Greatest Show on Earth," was overcome in trying to keep her eyes upon all three rings at once. She feared that if she lingered too long upon the marvelous equestrienne,who was just about to burst through the beautiful white paper hoop in the first ring, the clown in the middle ring would crack his whip and the trick horse would be put through some intricate dance; and, in turn, if she watched the clown and the trick horse, the human fly in the third ring would begin her suicidal walk across the arena, head down.

So it is with me: I have been afraid that if I lingered long amid the wonderful parliamentary performances of the Daughters I'd miss some of the social doings in the middle ring where the smart set is being put through the closing tricks of the season; and in stopping too long in this middle ring I'd lose altogether the walk across the political arena of the Republican party in its effort to pass the Puerto Rican Bill; and I am sighing because the human family is not constructed with steel springs and gutta-percha joints, together with that most desirable thing which the author of My Summer in a Garden speaks of—"a cast-iron back with a hinge in it"—for all these things are indispensable to the woman who has, as I have, the ambition to see every side of life here at the Capital.

Robert says it is ridiculous of me to undertake so much, and he has been finding a good deal of fault with me lately. He says that I am letting my woman's feelings and sympathies run away with my judgment, and that in the matter of these public questions I am swayed, and am trying to sway him, by mere abstract sentimentalities, and that I confound two things, "public good" and "public policy."

The truth is, I am alarmed secretly at the change in Robert's attitude toward many of these vital questions. I can remember a time only some months back when Robert was outspoken upon two topics, "trusts" and "civil service reform." He made a stump speech against the former and denounced those who were trying to break down the latter, and where does he stand now on both questions? He will not admit that his attitude is changed, but he no longer speaks of "trusts"; he calls them "corporations" and "monopolies."

When I was talking to Senator P—— about trusts the other day, he only laughed with Robert and entered upon a long argument in favor of corporations which did not convince me in the least. True, I did not understand very much of it. But they both admitted that almost all legislation now is a matter of policy rather than of politics and will continue to be so until the campaign is over. I said that I could not see any difference between the two words "politics" and "policy." Senator P—— said:

"These words Bulwer defines in this way: 'Politics is the art of being wise for others—policy of being wise for self.'"

"Oh, you mean, Senator P——, that 'self' in this case means the Republican party, but let me tell you that if you mean to go before the country with this present Puerto Rican policy the Republican toga is likely to be torn to shreds, and what you are pleased to call a victory to-day you may have to call by another name at the polls. You may have to exclaim, as Pyrrhus did, 'Such another victory would be worse than a defeat.' It would, perhaps, be wise to remind you legislators, who are thinking so much of your policy, of what old Solon said, 'It is a good government only under which a wrong to the humblest is an affront to us all.'"

"But, Agatha," said Robert in a nettled tone, "you do not understand this measure. It is simply a temporary expedient. I will confess that it is something in the nature of 'skinning the sheep rather than shearing them,' and I am not in sympathy with it; neither is Senator P——. I doubt if even half the majority likes it at heart; but we could not have a split in our ranks. We were obliged to keep a strong party front and nothing better was offered in place of this bill, and we were confronted by certain conditions which the public does not appreciate. How will you deal with it in the Senate, Senator P——?"

"Well, Slocum, I am not in sympathy with this tariff measure. I do not think it is constitutional, and I fully believe that it is a case of bad politics. Of course, when it comes to the Senate it will have to travel the same hard road that all such measures do that come from the House. We may pass it with changes and amendments. You remember that the McKinley Tariff Bill had eight hundred changes in it before it became a law. But I certainly take the same ground on this bill that Littlefield did. What a rarely good speaker Littlefield is! But why did he not retort to Tawney's insinuation the other day that the lumber barons of Maine were at the bottom of his advocacy of free trade with Puerto Rico?"

"Some of us did ask him why he let it pass, and his reply was to repeat that old story of the huge Virginian who had a diminutive wife with whom he quarreled continually, and the wife used to stick pins in him whenever she got mad. Somebody asked him why he did not retaliate, and he said, 'Oh, well, it amuses Lucy and does not hurt me any.'"

The two men laughed at this, and the Senator said:

"He couldn't have made a more pertinent reply, considering the mental height of the two men." Robert asked:

"By the way, Senator P——, you were at that dinner the other night given by the new Secretary of the Senate to the party leaders in this Puerto Rican business, and I understood that Tom Reed came down and was expected to help the party out of the embarrassment which the powerful oratory of Littlefield threw the Ways and Means Committee into. How did the dinner go off?"

"Fairly well. There was rather a stormy time, of course, and it looked once as though there might be an open rupture until Henderson took hold of things. He certainly exerts a marvelous influence when he gives one of his little 'harmony' talks. This new speaker of yours, Slocum, is making a good record, and I hear that the way in which he is withstanding importunities for unworthy legislation is remarkable, and that those who go to his little office at the far end of the lobby to ask for recognition to pass private bills don't come away and shake their fists as they used to do when refused, for this man seems to know how to say 'no' without giving offense. Of course the real test of the man's staying qualities has not come yet; that will come later in the supreme moments of the session."

"Yes," said Robert, "I am told that the relations in the House are more harmonious and more pleasant than they've been in years. By the way, Senator, how is your committee on the Clark case coming along? What is the report likely to be?"

"I don't think we know yet; perhaps we sha'n't ever know. We all agree that it is a bad business, but what we shall do I cannot, of course, presume to say. Mr. Clark made a pretty good impression before the committee when he testified in his own behalf. His personality is so intensely refined, almost effeminate, and his manner, though nervous, was so modest that he made some friends in the committee.

"Oh! this whole Clark case has been an education to our committee. The cool way in which both Clark, Senior, and Clark, Junior, talked of their millions was something to be long remembered by us all. When young Clark admitted that his own income was $250,000 a year and his father's income was between one and two millions, this was too much for Mr. Hoar, and he whispered audibly that it was 'high time there was an income tax.' Mr. Hoar has been very funny all through this investigation. When Marcus Daly was testifying the other day and Mr. Hoar was trying to check the line of inquiry as to the motive one Democrat had in opposing another Democrat, he said, 'I will rule that being a Democrat is no evidence of a disposition to commit a political crime.' Faulkner asked at once for a further ruling as to the offense of a Democrat opposing a Democrat; 'then I will say,' said Hoar, 'that repentance of being a Democrat is not a crime.' You can fancy the uproar at this amendment.

MR. MARCUS DALY, WHO TESTIFIED THE OTHER DAY

"But, Mrs. Slocum, I hope you are not meaning to desert the Senate for the House. You have not been in our gallery for some days," said the Senator turning to me.

"Oh, but you have not been passing the Puerto Rican Bill, and I am like the street gamin—I always follow the show no matter how bad it may be," I replied.

For in truth the House as seen from the galleries during the debate on this bill was a veritable "show." And the final day when the vote was taken was something to remember. To see gray-bearded men gyrating up and down the aisles, or whirling from desk to desk like dancing dervishes, buttonholing, gesticulating, jeering, shouting, nay, even crying, either with delight or indignation, was a highly edifying spectacle, and Robert was among the worst in point of behavior on the floor. From the time that Mr. Cummings, at the very height of the debate, perpetrated his remarkable joke—the beginning of which sent the entire majority into a pandemonium of delight, and the ending sent the minority into paroxysms of cheers and shouts—down to the time that Mr. Sibley got off his poetry and Mr. Otie took off "Uncle Joe" Cannon, and little Mr. Spight appeared with scant clothing under his tightly buttoned-up overcoat, having been suddenly called from his bath in the subbasement the House of Representatives was enough to strike consternation to the heart of the uninitiated. When the excitement was at its highest I glanced around me to note how other people were taking it. The galleries were as excited and almost as uncontrolled as the floor itself. There was but one calm, unperturbed face anywhere to be seen. I called Page's attention to this face, and she explained that it belonged to one of the clerks who pass in and out of the committee-rooms and who are the real connoisseurs of Congressmen. This young fellow was leaning against the gallery doorpost, and he was a type of the withered, experienced, unimpressionable youth which is evolved from those who start as pages and go on in the committee-rooms year after year. He had his hands in his pockets, and on his face was a superior, pitying expression, and when there was an unusual uproar from below he said to the doorkeeper musingly:

"MR. HOAR HAS BEEN VERY FUNNY"

"Aren't they funny?"

I could not help thinking that be was as funny as anything in the whole day's experiences had been to me. I was glad when the House finally got down to the vote. It was the first time that I ever found the roll-call interesting, much less exciting, as on this occasion. When the whole thing was over, Page and I made our way slowly out of the gallery. I was down-hearted over the result and was determined to take it out on Robert when I got home for his vote on the question. It seemed to me that I saw receding the dream of the Senate. Page was unusually silent, and at last I felt a curiosity to know how this young girl regarded the day's proceedings. Page rarely mentioned politics and never seemed to know or care anything about these matters, although I knew her to be a fierce little Democrat. I said:

"Page, what do you think of all that has been done to-day?"

"Well, Mrs. Slocum, Ah think those pore things down in Po'to Rico will jus' have to starve it out. Ah think your party means to do by these pore things about like they did to us after the War, an' Ah think if my party would jus' let go of Mr. Bryan we could beat you at the polls nex' November."

I echoed Page's sentiments and we passed down the marble stairs in silence. We had just crossed the threshold of Statuary Hall when we were overtaken by some one who spoke Page's name. It was Mr. Morelos, Alain de Courcelles' friend. He had been sitting in the diplomatic gallery and had hurried out to speak to us. It was evident that he wished to have some word apart with Page, so I sauntered ahead, ostensibly to look at the different marble figures disposed about the hall. I was looking idly at the spirited statue of Ethan Allen, when I discovered that I was close upon the confines of that pathetic corner where so many women office-seekers await their "influence," and where are daily enacted scenes that would bring tears to all but the hard-hearted. I peered around into the carpeted interior of this corner, then drew back suddenly, for a well-known Senator, attended by his private secretary, was being interviewed by a poor, middle-aged woman whose anxious, harassed look told its own tale of poverty and hope deferred. I heard the Senator say with scant courtesy:

"Well, my good woman; what is it?"

I could not catch the low, dejected reply. I could only hear his loud voice in return:

"How many times must I tell you that I am doing all that I can and that there is every prospect of my getting you a place? I think I see a chance. The quota for your State is already full, still, with pressure brought to bear, I think I can manage something. Now, go home. Don't worry. Leave everything in my hands and it will be all right."

The woman turned away with a glow of confidence that fairly transfigured her face. As soon as she had disappeared over the last "whispering stone" this Senator, whose polished eloquence I had so admired in the Senate chamber, said roughly to his secretary:

"I have to tell 'em that to pacify 'em. Of course I can't do anything really for her, and I wish you'd see to it that I'm not bothered by any more of 'em. I've told those rascally pages not to bring me cards nor tell 'em where I am."

I was glad that the great, sheltering figure of the statue prevented me from having to encounter this suave Senator as he strode away; I was in no mood for a gracious bow after what I had heard, and, besides, politicians and statesmen were below par with me just then. But suddenly a softening memory came to me of the terrible way in which public men are pursued by office-seekers. Robert himself had declared only a few days before that women office-seekers were enough to make misogynists of all Congressmen, and that he never nowadays bears the frou-frou of a silken skirt but he turns pale with dread lest it is some one seeking an office whom it will be as impossible to shake off as the Old Man of the Sea.

"MR. FAULKNER ASKED FOR A FURTHER RULING"

When I looked around finally for Page I saw her coming toward me with Mr. Morelos. They were talking earnestly and there was something unusual in her manner, and there was a glow on her face that had long been absent from it. She held in her hands what looked like a folded newspaper or a bit of a letter. I had not remembered that she had had anything but a silver fox muff in her possession when we came to the Capitol that morning. They joined me and we all three turned our steps to the rotunda. Scarcely had the carriage door been shut and he had bowed himself away, than I asked apprehensively:

"What is it, Page? What has happened?"

"Ah sca'cely know yet, Mrs. Slocum; Mr. Morelos gave me these to read, but Ah'll have to wait till we get home. It is some news about Mr. de Cou'celles. Ah'll tell you all Ah know as soon as we get home."

The "Apple King's" April Fool

By Wilder D. Quint

ONE bright and sunny afternoon a little party of three sat in the cosy reading-room of the American Club in one of the large German cities. Each in his own way was an excellent type of the people of the land across the sea. Doctor Bacon, bland, smiling and rotund, was a very successful dentist who earned large fees in this city of his adoption. George Marsh, a younger man, nervous and energetic, was the resident consul, and an alert promoter of his country's interests. The third was remarkably tall and thin, and his solemn, smooth-shaven face and the spectacles he wore gave him a professional air and an appearance of deep wisdom which he did not in reality possess. His name was Cyrus Barstow, though he was known in his native State of New Hampshire as the "Apple King," on account of the immense orchards he owned and the large foreign export business he successfully carried on. He was in Germany to make the acquaintance of his customers and to advance the doctrine of vegetarianism, as applied to apples, to the best of his ability. Shrewd in business, he was as simple as a child in all social matters, and the ways of the polite world were to him an untrodden path; but of these deficiencies he was not at all aware.

"Now, Barstow," the jolly Doctor Bacon was saying, "you know this is All-Fools' Day, and these Germans set considerable store by its traditions. You'd better keep your weather eye open during the rest of the day. You may have streamers tied to your coat-tails by the street boys, or perhaps your sausage at dinner will be stuffed with chopped-up leather. At any rate, you'll be very lucky if you escape some joke or other. You look like a savant, and savants are always fair game."

"Don't you worry about me," returned the somewhat nettled "Apple King"; "I wasn't born yesterday, Doctor, and I cut my eye teeth a good long time ago. I ain't been fooled for years, and if either of you think——"

But the end of Cyrus' defiance was never heard, for at this moment a solemn lackey entered the room, bearing a yellow envelope on a silver tray. It was addressed, "Herr Barstow," in the script of the Teutons. It was a curious coincidence that Doctor Bacon had touched a button in the wall about ten seconds before the man appeared.

Cyrus tore open the envelope eagerly; it was an answer to some business proposition, he thought. Then the joy on his face faded.

"Written in this confounded Dutch, of course," he ejaculated. "Here, Doctor, read it for me, will you? You're up on that sort of thing."

Doctor Bacon began running over the message silently. First he whistled softly; then he exclaimed, as if to himself, "Well, well!" Finally he burst out with, "Cyrus, this is great—simply great!"

"What is it? What is it?" repeated the impatient "Apple King."

"Just this—it's the greatest honor that can possibly come to a foreigner visiting this city; it's a thing that comes to a man but once in a lifetime, and even then to very few. Translated into prosaic English it is this:

"'Prince Von Z—— commands Mr. Cyrus Barstow, the American "Apple King," to dine at the palace at seven this evening, and sleep there as His Excellency's guest over night.'"

"The Prince Von Z—— be hanged," shouted Cyrus; "I'm a free American citizen, and nobody commands me in Germany or anywhere else. I won't go a step."

"Softly, Barstow, softly," said the Doctor; "this is in reality the politest request imaginable, only Princes can't unbend, you know. You are a marked man. But how in the world did the Prince know you were in town?"

"Easy enough. I paid for notices three inches long in every paper in the city. Wrote 'em myself, and let the editors do the translating. The Prince had seen 'em, of course. I said I was staying at the American Club, and made it strong on the 'Apple King' part. That did the business. I guess I'll go, after all."

Accordingly, early that evening Mr. Cyrus Barstow, uncomfortable in a brand new claw-hammer suit for which he had been roundly charged in a German clothing shop, set forth for the palace in the most magnificent public equipage that could be obtained. In a small black hand-bag were the articles needed for his stay overnight. In cheerful mood he bowled along the fine streets, suspecting no guile. He did not know that not far behind him was a cab containing Doctor Bacon and Consul Marsh, and that he was the subject of their conversation.

The carriage ahead finally stopped at the splendid iron gateway of the Prince's palace, and the plotters saw the tall form of their victim emerge and approach the small side gate at which stood the guard. In another instant the "Apple King" had disappeared within its portals. The two gazed at each other in the greatest astonishment. Was it an optical illusion? No, they were both keen of sight, and they were wide awake. Barstow must soon reappear, and they would wait for him. But the minutes lengthened into an hour, and still there were no signs of their fellow-countryman. Then they were driven back to the American Club, where they could discuss the mystery at their leisure.

When the American's carriage had driven up to the gate of the Prince Von Z——'s residence, that potentate's much-bedecked guard had been duly impressed by the elegance of the conveyance; when he caught sight of the small black bag in Cyrus' hand an expression of satisfaction passed over his stolid face. He opened the postern and stood at stiff salute.

"Der Mediziner?" he inquired anxiously.

"Yar, the American; yar, yar, of course," returned the unsuspecting Cyrus, delighted with the opportunity of airing one-half the German of which he was possessed.

The guard pulled a knob near at hand, and in a few moments a couple of flunkeys gorgeously attired in scarlet and blue were bowing and scraping before the "Apple King," who was much impressed at this sign of condescension on the part of princely retainers. He followed them without a word up an immense marble stairway and into the great reception hall of the palace. The polished floor, the richly decorated walls, the fine paintings and other works of art, the columns of rare and costly stone, and over all the glittering splendor of hundreds of candles fairly overpowered the Yankee, whose previous ideal of magnificence had been the tinsel and stucco of a city theatre. He began to regret his temerity in accepting an invitation that involved so much spectacular formality. But he had no time to retreat, if he would. At the end of the hall a new delegation of lackeys took him in charge and escorted him up a broad flight of onyx steps of such delicacy and beauty that Cyrus felt many compunctions in treading upon them at all. Then they threaded a maze of noble corridors, turning and twisting, till at last they stood before a double door of rosewood on which were armorial bearings of encrusted gold. Two soldiers were at their post here, and they eyed the newcomer suspiciously.

"Der Mediziner," said one of Cyrus' escort, whereupon the guards presented arms, the doors opened softly, and Cyrus nerved himself to meet the scene of dazzling splendor he felt certain awaited him.

Splendor there undoubtedly was in the room which the American entered, but it was not dazzling. In fact, one small candle placed near a canopied bed was the only light in the large apartment. The astonished and bewildered "Apple King" could scarcely see where to step, and he certainly did not know how to proceed.

At this juncture a small man dressed in ministerial black approached Cyrus and addressed him with a remark of considerable length in German. Only the last words were intelligible; they sounded like "the Prince."

"Yes, the Prince; what about the Prince; where is he?" asked the puzzled American.

The other pointed solemnly to the bed.

"You don't say so!" ejaculated Cyrus. He had resolved to be surprised at nothing that might befall him in the palace, but this was certainly remarkable. Then he remembered something he had heard about foreigners taking their meals in bed. He did not recall any information to the effect that guests were received in this way, but this nobleman was probably eccentric. At any rate, he would make the best of the situation. Hat in hand, he approached the couch with all the dignity he could muster.

"I am glad to see you, Prince," he began; "you needn't apologize, I——"

A very vigorous groan cut him short, and the occupant of the bed writhed unmistakably, as if in great pain. When the spasm had passed he sat up and looked at Cyrus in a surprised way.

"An English doctor, eh?" he said, speaking the American's own tongue with perfect fluency. "Well, they're sometimes good, very good. I only ask that you cure me, and care not for your race."

Again a violent contortion of the bedclothes as the princely sufferer groaned: "Oh, Doctor, this colic, these terrible—what you call them—knots. The pain is too great. Give me of your assistance or I shall go mad."

Now the word "colic" is not usually a delight to the ear. It conjures up visions of some of the most unpleasant moments given to man. But to Cyrus it was the most welcome sound he had heard in Germany. He became suddenly exultant; he knew that his great opportunity had arrived.

"I ain't a doctor in the regular way, Prince," he began, "and I ain't English, I'm the American you——"

"Not a doctor?" roared the Prince; "then how do you come in here, and what for? By Himmel, out you shall go most rapidly," and he shouted an order to the guards, who rushed in, seized Cyrus, and began to propel him unceremoniously toward the door.

"But I can cure your colic," he cried on the way out. "I'll take my oath to it."

A new wave of pain more poignant than any of its predecessors swept through the frame of the potentate. It was a convincing argument. At a word of command, the guards brought Cyrus back to their master's bed. There he opened his black hand-bag, took out a small bottle containing a dark-brown liquid, shook it vigorously, and poured some into a glass standing on the table.

"This," he said, "is a cordial made from a receipt of my grandmother's. It never failed to fix a colic yet, and it ain't going to now. I always take a bottle along wherever I go. Now, Prince, we'll have you all right in a jiffy."

"Drink some yourself," said the Prince grimly.

"I don't need any," returned the innocent Cyrus, "but anything to please." And he took a generous gulp of the mixture. Then the Prince drank the contents of the glass.

In fifteen minutes the Prince was resting quietly; in an hour he was sleeping peacefully. Then the ministerial-looking individual led Cyrus away to a magnificently appointed chamber, where he was soon following the example of his noble patron.

Shortly after noon of the next day the two plotters, Doctor Bacon and Consul Marsh, were in their accustomed places in the reading-room of the American Club. The mysterious disappearance of their friend Barstow was their only topic of conversation. After discussing many hypotheses, they were inclined to believe that he had been ejected from the palace by some exit other than the one they had watched, and had stolen off to a hotel that they might not discover how he had been duped.

"Anyway, we'll get it out of him," observed the Doctor, "and he'll have to acknowledge the corn."

At this moment a diversion of considerable note took place among the members of the club. An elaborate equipage drawn by four horses and preceded by two outriders dashed up to the entrance and stopped there.

"The Prince's carriage, as sure as I'm a living man!" exclaimed the Consul.

"And there's Barstow!" shouted the Doctor, as the lank form of Cyrus emerged from the chariot.

Another instant and their fellow-countryman was in the reading-room, his face wreathed in smiles.

"I tell you what, gentlemen," he declared, "my idea of Princes has changed entirely. Von Z—— is one of the best fellows I ever met. Why, this morning at breakfast he said—— Hello, what's the matter, Marsh?"

The Consul had picked up a newspaper which he was reading with assumed nonchalance, when an involuntary exclamation escaped him. This is what he saw:

"The palace secretary informs us that the Prince Von Z—— was last night cured of a very severe and dangerous attack of colic by a great American specialist, Herr Cyrus Barstow. Herr Barstow is not a practicing physician, but he is the proprietor of a valuable and efficacious remedy for colic, discovered by one of his ancestors and kept as a family secret. Herr Barstow remained at the palace over night, and this morning breakfasted with the Prince, after which he was decorated with the Order of the Iron Trapezoid for his highly esteemed services."

As the best means of covering their own amazement and confusion the two shook the wearer of the Iron Trapezoid warmly by the hand. He bore his honors modestly.

"I don't mind telling you," said he, "that the Prince knew nothing at all about that message.

"I wonder who could have sent it?"

"Well," observed Doctor Bacon meditatively, "whoever did it wasn't such a wonderful joker as he thought he was. But he did you a good turn after all, Cyrus, and perhaps you'd better forgive him."

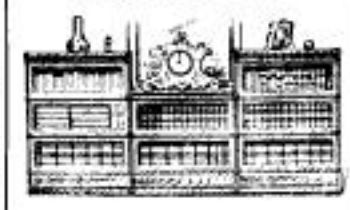
The "Good Fellow"

By Herbert Bashford

AN ATTORNEY holding a responsible Federal position recently said to a friend: "I spent the years of my young manhood in trying to be a 'good fellow.' I was so foolish as to think that the only way to achieve success in life was to be popular with the boys—spend money like a lord and win the name among my companions of being a 'good fellow.' I found that so long as my money held out I was indeed a favorite among them; but when I came to the end of my rope I awoke to the sudden realization that my notoriety as a 'good fellow' proved of no avail when the question of bread and butter presented itself. Those who had partaken of my hospitality, encouraged me in my folly and flocked around me, now seemed very much disinterested in my affairs. My advice to young men is not to attempt winning the distinction which invariably proves detrimental to themselves—that of being a 'good fellow.'"

No doubt this has been the experience of many. The youth who starts out in life with the idea that he must first establish himself in the estimation of his companions as a "jolly good fellow" if he would become successful in his undertakings, usually laments in after years the time thus squandered and the reckless expenditure of money which brought only the flattery of those who were deriving pleasure from his extravagance.

He discovers that he really imperiled his future welfare by allowing vanity to supersede good judgment that he might be regarded among his associates as the prime favorite.



To become the characteristic "good fellow" is by no means conducive to success in one's chosen avocation, granting that pecuniary reward be the object in view, which, of course, does not hold true in every case. Though it is most commendable in a young man to make himself well and favorably known in the community where he has established himself in business or has entered upon a professional career, it is the height of folly for him to imagine that his interests will be materially advanced by devoting undue attention to the club and to becoming the central figure at social functions. Yet to attain popularity as a "good fellow," under the common delusion that this alone proves the means whereby a person may quickly mount the ladder of Success, is the ambition of many. Nothing can be more false, for it is not the one whose reputation rests solely upon the uncertain ground of good fellowship whom the public holds in highest esteem and in whom it imposes the greatest trust.

Such social distinction, instead of proving beneficial, always gives cause in the minds of the many honestly to doubt one's stability and sound judgment.

The young man who enters upon life's duties earnestly, who, though spending a reasonable part of his time in the society of his friends, devotes himself unremittingly to bringing out the best that is in him and who relies strictly upon thrift and integrity, is the one in whom the world places abiding faith. The "good fellow" as a general rule, because of his proneness toward frivolity, is seldom held in serious consideration by the majority of thoughtful citizens; consequently he possesses slight influence when questions of vital importance are to be determined. Moreover, he very frequently finds himself the victim of excesses induced by attempting to maintain his reputation as the "prince of good fellows" which often results in physical and mental decay. It is the steadfast, reliable man upon whom people soon learn to depend, and who, in gaining their high regard, has laid the foundation for future success.

How WE make Presidents

The Cleveland Campaigns

By Colonel A. K. McCLURE

Drawings by Carl Kleinschmidt

THE Presidential campaign of 1884 was opened on June 5 by the Republican National Convention at Chicago which nominated Blaine after the Arthur Administration had made a feeble struggle against him. Strange as it may seem, Blaine took much less interest in his nomination at that time than he had in his contests of 1876 and 1880. He was painfully impressed by the conviction that he was fated not to be President, and he feared his defeat. A recent article by ex-Governor Boutwell, of Massachusetts, who was then in Congress with Blaine, stated that a short time before the meeting of the convention, when Blaine knew that the nomination was within his own hands, he told Boutwell that he was glad to have some votes in the convention but that he did not wish the nomination. He desired to defeat President Arthur, and urged Boutwell to organize for the nomination of General Sherman for President and Robert Lincoln for Vice-President.

I saw Blaine frequently during the months preceding the nomination, and he never exhibited any special gratification at the fact that he could then, for the first time, surely attain the leadership in his party for which he had so long struggled; but he had not the courage to decline it. The nomination came to him, and though he did not heartily welcome it, he was justly proud of it. General Logan, of Illinois, was placed on the ticket for Vice-President, as Blaine was the first civilian nominated for President by the Republicans since Lincoln.

HOW CLEVELAND GOT THE TAMMANY VOTE

The Democratic National Convention met in Chicago on July 10 and nominated Cleveland for President and Hendricks for Vice-President. Cleveland's nomination was accomplished solely by the earnest and skillful management of his cause by Daniel Manning, who was Secretary of the Treasury during half of Cleveland's first Administration. Cleveland was a reluctant candidate, for he was not confident that he could be nominated, and doubted if he could be elected if nominated; but Manning gathered about him a very powerful organization, and under the unit rule carried the New York delegation solid for Cleveland, though Tammany stoutly opposed him.

Randall had been named as the candidate for President by Pennsylvania and had a delegation strongly committed to his support. I was present at the conferences of Randall's friends, and it became evident at an early stage of the battle that Randall's nomination was not within the range of possibility. His pronounced Protection views made him ineligible. Ex-Attorney-General William U. Hensel was there and was actively enlisted in the Randall cause. When the defeat of Randall became clearly inevitable Hensel and I had a conference with Manning, and after a careful review of the situation it became apparent that Cleveland could be nominated with the aid of Randall's friends. We made no suggestions to Manning as to conditions, but told him that we would telegraph for Randall and have him there the next morning early, so that he and Randall could confer alone. Hensel and I telegraphed Randall urgently requesting him to take the first train for Chicago. He arrived the next morning, was brought directly by Mr. Hensel to my room, where Mr. Manning was in waiting, and Hensel and I went to breakfast.

No one but Mr. Hensel and myself knew of Randall's arrival, but within half an hour after he and Manning had met word was passed from Randall himself for his friends to support Cleveland. That settled the contest in Cleveland's favor. Tammany protested, but the Tammany vote was cast for Cleveland all the same under the unit rule that the New York Democrats have always maintained.

The contest of 1884 is well remembered. Blaine did much to promote his election by stumping the country from the Penobscot to the Mississippi, but he did more to defeat himself in his management of the battle. As I fully explained in a former article, he went to New York after he had stumped the country, with his battle won, and stayed there just long enough to lose it by political follies that he never would have permitted in any Presidential candidate if he had been managing the contest for another. Cleveland received a popular majority over Blaine of 23,005, and he had 219 electoral votes to 182. The New York electoral vote decided the contest on a popular majority of 1100.

HOW THE CLEVELAND-DANA FEUD BEGAN

Charles A. Dana, then editor of the New York Sun, became estranged from Mr. Cleveland the year before the Presidential election of 1884. He had earnestly supported Cleveland for Governor in 1882, but when a movement was made by Mr. Manning to organize the State for Cleveland in 1884 Dana was implacable in his opposition. I met him several times before Cleveland was nominated, and he always discussed the question with an unusual degree of acrimony. He believed that Cleveland was not available; that he was unworthy of the position; and that if nominated he would be overwhelmingly defeated. He gave me no reason for his changed relations with Cleveland, and I did not learn the true cause until after Cleveland had been elected President.

Soon after Cleveland's nomination I was spending a few days at Saratoga, and was watching Dana's paper with much interest, for he was very much disgruntled. He did not at first declare himself aggressively against Cleveland's election, but one morning at Saratoga in taking up The Sun I found one of Dana's terrible deliverances against Cleveland that left no possible chance for a reconciliation. I telegraphed to Mr. Dana and asked him to meet me at his office at three o'clock that afternoon, and called there on my way home. Mr. Dana had gone too far to recede, but I tried to temper his bitterness, as I thought it would do great harm, not only to Cleveland but to his own newspaper as well, then one of the most prosperous in the country.

Mr. Dana was petulant and violent in his expressions against Cleveland, and said that he had decided to support General Butler, who was the candidate of the Labor-Socialistic element, and who, he said, would receive not less than 25,000 votes in New York City. I told him that Butler might receive 2500, and if there were 25,000 disgruntled Democrats who wanted to defeat Cleveland they would certainly vote for Blaine.

The result was about as I had predicted. Butler received only a few thousand votes, and Dana and his following, though ostensibly supporting Butler, voted squarely for Blaine.

Charles A. Dana was the ablest editor ever developed by American journalism. Horace Greeley was more pungent and telling in his political articles, and Henry Watterson is more brilliant, but Charles A. Dana was the strongest editorial writer this country has ever produced. He was versatile, powerful and elegant, but an unfortunate personal estrangement made him the bitterest of Cleveland's enemies, and paved the way for The Sun to be transformed from an out-and-out Tammany organ to the most aggressive of Republican journals.

It was not until I met Cleveland at Albany, soon after his election, that I learned the cause of the estrangement between Cleveland and Dana, and the statement given by Mr. Cleveland was subsequently confirmed by Mr. Dana. Dana had very earnestly supported Cleveland's nomination and election for Governor in 1882, and after the election he wrote a personal letter to Cleveland asking the appointment of a friend to the position of Adjutant-General. Cleveland received that letter as he received thousands of other letters recommending appointments, instead of recognizing the claim Mr. Dana had upon him for the courtesy of an answer. Beecher had a candidate for the same position, and Cleveland gave it to Beecher's man without any explanation whatever to Dana, who felt that he had been discourteously treated by Cleveland.

A DINNER THAT WAS NEVER GIVEN

Mr. Dana gave no open sign of his disappointment, but some time after Cleveland's inauguration, when it became known that Dana felt grieved at the Governor, some mutual friends intervened and proposed to Cleveland that he should invite Dana to join with some acquaintances to dine at the Executive Mansion. To this Cleveland readily assented. Dana was informed that Cleveland would tender such an invitation if it would be accepted, and he promptly assented. Cleveland then became involved in the pressing duties of the Legislature, and allowed the session to close without extending the promised and expected invitation to Dana. Mr. Cleveland told me that he was entirely to blame for neglect in both instances, as Dana would doubtless have been satisfied if he had courteously informed him of his convictions which required him to appoint another for Adjutant-General; and he had no excuse to offer but that of neglect for not inviting Dana to dinner.

Dana naturally assumed that Cleveland had given him deliberate affront, and Cleveland could make no satisfactory explanation. As Governor and as President he was first of all devoted to his official duties, which he discharged with rare fidelity; and he gave little time even to the common courtesies which most Governors and Presidents would recognize as justly belonging to their friends. Efforts were made to conciliate Dana, but he never would discuss the question. When Cleveland's election was announced, and the Republicans were disposed to dispute the vote of New York, Dana came out boldly and declared that Cleveland was elected and that no violent measure should be tolerated to deprive him of the honor conferred upon him.

THE PEACEFUL CONVENTIONS OF 1888

The Democratic National Convention for 1888 met at St. Louis on June 7, and it was the most perfunctory affair of the kind I ever witnessed. I never saw a national political body so entirely devoid of enthusiasm; yet it was entirely fixed in its purpose to renominate President Cleveland. He appealed strongly to the convictions and judgment of the party, but not to its affection or enthusiasm. He was nominated by a practically unanimous vote, and it had been settled long before the convention met that the sturdy old Roman of Ohio, ex-Senator Thurman, should be the candidate for the second place, as Vice-President Hendricks had died in office.

The Republican National Convention met in Chicago on June 21, and there was a free-for-all race for several days between Harrison, Sherman, Depew and Alger, who had a large support from Southern delegates, with Blaine on a coaching trip in England, but in a position to command the nomination if he desired it. Blaine exhibited his usual hesitation, and it required three days for his friends to get his final answer by cable that he would not permit his name to be presented. Sherman was the ablest and perhaps the most respected of all the candidates from which the choice was to be made. The Pennsylvania delegation was instructed for him under the lead of Senator Quay, and Governor Hastings, then Adjutant-General, very ably presented Sherman's name to the convention. Alger was under the shadow of having a commercial following, Depew was offensive to the then strong and steadily growing Granger element of the West, and Harrison became the logical candidate and was nominated without a serious contest. Governor Morton, of New York, was taken for Vice-President, not only because he occupied a very strong position in the politics of the country, but because he was able to finance the campaign.

—earnestly urged him to modify his message

The contest of 1888 differed from the Cleveland contest of 1884 in its entire freedom from vituperation and bitterness. It was earnestly conducted on both sides, but Cleveland lost New York by 14,373, while Hill, the Democratic candidate for Governor at the same election, was successful by a majority of 19,171. Cleveland was obviously betrayed by the Tammany people, and although he had a majority of about 96,000 of the popular vote of the country, he received but 168 electoral votes to 233 for Harrison.

WHY CLEVELAND LOST HIS ELECTION

Cleveland lost his election in 1888 by his message to Congress, delivered a year before, making the tariff and revenue question the sole issue before the country. His message referred to no other question as of importance compared with the issue of reduced revenues and taxes. I saw him on Saturday night before the meeting of Congress, and with Speaker Carlisle, who was to be reëlected to the Speakership on the following Monday, earnestly urged him to modify his message. Carlisle was quite as positive as I was in assuring him that it would result in disaster to himself and his Administration. His answer was that possibly we were right, but that it was a duty that should be performed, and though he might fail, he believed the country would vindicate him at an early day. He was a man who gave very serious thought to his official duties; performed them with great fidelity, and when convinced as to his duty none could dissuade him from his purpose. But for that message he would certainly have been reëlected President in 1888.

The Republican National Convention of 1892 met at Minneapolis on June 7, and President McKinley presided. There would have been no serious contest for Harrison's renomination but for the fact that Blaine, who was Secretary of State, had had an open quarrel with the President just before the convention met, and, utterly broken in health and without reasonable expectation that he could live through a campaign, had permitted the use of his name in the convention against his chief.

The Blaine revolt made the friends of McKinley hope that they might succeed, but Harrison was nominated on the first ballot by a vote of 535 1-6 to 182 1-6 for Blaine and 182 for McKinley, with five scattering. Vice-President Morton was deposed to make place for Whitelaw Reid for Vice-President, and as the New York delegation united in presenting Reid, the nomination was made unanimous.

The Democratic National Convention met at Chicago on June 21, and Cleveland was nominated for a third time after the most desperate and acrimonious strife I have ever witnessed in a national convention. It was on that occasion that Bourke Cockran made a speech against Cleveland that gave him national fame, and it was one of extraordinary ability and power. The convention was really adverse to Cleveland's nomination. Had a majority of the delegates followed their own personal inclinations he would have been defeated, and he was nominated solely by the matchless leadership of William C. Whitney. But for him and his wonderful skill and energy the convention would have run away from Cleveland at the outset. Never in the history of American politics was there such an achievement as the nomination of Cleveland over the solid and aggressively hostile vote of his own State of New York that was regarded as the pivotal State of the battle. Tammany had always opposed Cleveland in national conventions, but never before had they had control of the delegation against him, and a protest was published to the convention signed by every delegate from the State, demanding his defeat.

CLEVELAND'S VICTORY

Cleveland was strong with the people but weak with the political leaders. The platform had been written by the enemies of Cleveland; the nomination for Vice-President was made over his friends, and the hostility to him was so pronounced that the opposing leaders were confident of his defeat at the polls. The convention sat at night and far on in the morning hours, when Cleveland received 617 votes, just ten more than were necessary to nominate him. Had he not been nominated on that ballot his defeat would have been certain.

The battle between Cleveland and Harrison was very earnestly contested, and it will be remembered as the only instance in which the party of power was defeated when the country was prosperous. The McKinley tariff bill had largely increased protection to our manufactures, but without materially increasing wages. The result was an unusual number of labor strikes, the most notable of which was that of Homestead at the Carnegie works, and the Republicans suffered very generally throughout the country by the loss of industrial votes. Cleveland was elected by a popular majority over Harrison of 366,211, and received 276 electoral votes to 145 for Harrison.

Cleveland and Jackson are the only Presidential candidates in the history of the Republic who made three consecutive contests for the place, carried a popular plurality or majority each time, and increased it at each contest, and both were defeated in one battle, although receiving a larger popular vote than the successful competitor.

THE McKINLEY CAMPAIGN

The Presidential contest of 1896 was opened by the Republicans, who assembled in national convention in St. Louis on June 16, where McKinley was nominated on the first ballot by a vote of 661½ to 84½ for Reed, with a number of scattering votes. The late Garret A. Hobart was also nominated on the first ballot for Vice-President by 535½ to 237½ for Henry Clay Evans, now Commissioner of Pensions, with scattering votes. McKinley's nomination was managed and accomplished much as Samuel J. Tilden managed and accomplished his own nomination in 1876. Mark A. Hanna, present Senator from Ohio, a most aggressive and able politician, devoted most of his time during the year before the convention met to organizing the States to secure McKinley delegations. McKinley was strong with the party and was personally popular.

The campaign of 1896 is yet fresh in the memories of the people. Bryan made the most remarkable canvass of our political history, and swept the solid South and the silver West into the cheap-money column, but he was overwhelmingly beaten, as McKinley received a popular majority over him of 613,752, and in the electoral college McKinley had 271 votes to 176 for Bryan. Thus we have the completed story of How We Make Presidents.

Fourteenth Chapter

"O'NEILL," began the Englishman, "would that I could take your place!"

"But you cannot, Major Coventry," replied the other gratefully. "You honor me in the thought, but if you could I should refuse to allow it. You are the better man; all my life I have been a gay, reckless soldier of fortune, with never a serious purpose. You are the worthy one, and you must live to watch over, to care for her whom we both love. Perhaps—surely—in days to come she will forget; time, chance, you know—she will reward your devotion—she must—you will be happy——" His voice broke and he turned his face and looked out of the port. Coventry shook his head.

"You know her not, sir. She is not for me, nor would I take her, loving you; my love is too deep for that—nor would she come. She will never forget you." O'Neill's heart leaped at this assurance.

The ship's bell on the deck above them struck four times—it was six o'clock. There was a little silence within the screen.

"The hour approaches," said O'Neill softly at last. "I would be alone for a few moments before—you understand?"

"Yes," said the other, rising and pressing his hand; "have you nothing to say, no message to send to ——" he asked magnanimously.

"Nothing—nothing—'tis best so. You will come for me at the time?"

"Yes, and I will stand by you to the end."

"You do me great honor," replied the other thankfully. Coventry looked at him a moment, shook his head and turned away.

In the prayers of the young Irishman the face of the girl he loved would obtrude itself. It seemed but a moment before he heard the tramp of armed men coming along the deck. They stopped before the screen. It was opened, and Coventry, pale as death, presented himself at the opening; the screen was promptly folded back. There were marines fully armed before it, and the chaplain, too, in the white robes of his office.

"I am ready, gentlemen," said O'Neill calmly; "may I not go to my death unbound?" he asked.

At a nod from Coventry, the master-at-arms unlocked the fetters about his feet and hands. The prisoner took his place in the midst of the little squad of men and ascended to the spar-deck. The ship's company of marines was drawn up aft on the quarter-deck. Most of the seamen of the crew were arranged in orderly ranks in the starboard gangway. Forward, a grating had been rigged on the bulwarks under the port fore-yardarm. A new rope led from the grating up through the block in the yardarm, came inboard to another block under the top, and thence through a block fixed to the deck. Sixty or seventy men, chosen by lot from the ship's company, had hold of the rope, which was led aft along the port gangway. In front of the marines stood Captain Pearson and his officers in full uniform. The prisoner was halted before him.

"Captain Pearson," said Coventry in great agitation, "can nothing be done to delay this execution a few hours? There are considerations, sir, in my possession which I feel sure would incline His Majesty, could he be communicated with, to extend clemency to this gentleman. Circumstance——"

"Are these circumstances within the knowledge of Lord Westbrooke, Major Coventry?" answered the Captain, surprised at the unusual nature of the interruption.

"They are, sir."

"And they have evidently not influenced him, you see. Therefore, I fail to see how I can permit them to weigh with me. Mr. Pascoe, take the prisoner forward."

"It is useless, Coventry. Why prolong this agony? You have done what you could. I thank you and bless you," said O'Neill as they walked the deck to the grating.

"Will you please to step up here, sir?" said Pascoe, the First Lieutenant of the Serapis, who had the matter in charge, pointing to the grating on the rail as they came abreast of it.

"It is a fair and easy place from which to step to Heaven, sir," replied the Irishman, smiling as he stepped on the rail. "I pray you to tell your men to start me on my way with a quick pull and a swift run." Pascoe nodded in comprehension.

A boatswain's mate now stepped up beside the prisoner and

"THE ADMIRAL CHOOSES A STRANGE MESSENGER"

Concerning New York City

On January 1, 1900, the population of New York was 3,595,936—second only to London—and the assessed valuation of its real property amounted to $3,476,352,029, or in round numbers, upwards of three and a half billions of dollars—more than any other spot of the same area in the world.

This immense population is increasing at the average rate of 100,000 per annum—all of whom must be accommodated with dwellings, either within the city limits or within less than an hour's transportation from the business centres—and many of whom must be accommodated with offices or stores in which to transact their business as well.

Investments in New York Realty, particularly some of those portions which are yet unimproved, are absolutely safe, because they represent a tangible security which is not influenced in any way by commercial fluctuations. All titles are guaranteed by Trust Companies as solid as the Bank of England financially.

For these and other reasons, it must be clear to any thinking person that an investment in New York Real Estate is safer and more likely to yield a larger profit than any other proposition before the public to-day—safer by far than any stock, which may become worthless from the effect of one day's panic upon the stock exchange—safer than mining property, which takes years to develop and in the majority of cases never realizes the value of surface indications—safer than "Miller" or other "Syndicates," which offer big premiums for a few weeks and end in bankruptcy for all concerned.

I control parcels of property within the city limits—30 minutes from Herald Square, the centre of New York—which will increase in value with every step in metropolitan development. Parties who have unemployed capital may secure—for sums ranging from $500 upwards—desirable parcels, the titles of which are guaranteed by the Title Guarantee & Trust Company of New York. This opportunity is one that does not often occur, and is being considered by conservative investors.

To those interested in the subject of such investment, I will gladly send maps, illustrations, statistics and descriptive matter, which may be easily verified, either through their own legal adviser or banker, in any portion of the country, or by personal examination of the property itself. Dainty Cookery

Little French Dinners

The use of this little book will enable any "plain cook" to prepare easily recherché little French dinners for six or eight. The recipes have been repeatedly used, and are practical, inexpensive and as free from trouble as is compatible with the ordinary demands of good cooking.

Dainty Dishes for Slender Incomes

Compiled with great care, and revised by one of the leading chefs of the day. The recipes are extremely varied, and a great point is made of serving and garnishing prettily, which is too little thought of by the ordinary cook.

bound his feet and hands with a lashing. A hangman's knot had been made by expert fingers in the rope leading from the yard-arm, and the running noose was quickly cast about O'Neill's neck.

"The collar of an ancient order, this," observed O'Neill, still smiling. "And now, one last request, sir," he added, turning to the Lieutenant.

"And that is?"

"Throw away that black cap, sir. Let me go with my eyes open." The Lieutenant hesitated a moment. The whole ship's company was filled with admiration for the intrepid and gallant Irishman.

"Do it, Pascoe!" whispered Coventry, springing up alongside O'Neill and the sailor, who, to avoid him, stepped back and stood on the rail by the foreshrouds.

"What are you doing there, Major Coventry?" asked Pascoe.

"Nothing. I promised to stand by him to the last," replied Coventry. The officer hesitated a moment, and then threw the cap into the water.

"I thank you," said O'Neil huskily; "how much time is there?"

"About two minutes, I think," said the Lieutenant nervously.

"You will run away with the fall at the first or last stroke of the bell?"

"The last, sir."

"No more," said O'Neill to Coventry, turning his face in the direction of the shore. The deep voice of the white-robed priest alone broke the silence:

"Thou knowest, Lord, the secrets of our hearts; shut not Thy merciful ears to our prayer; but spare us, Lord most holy, O God most mighty, O holy and merciful Saviour, Thou most worthy judge eternal, suffer us not, at our last hour, for any pains of death, to fall from Thee."

Out on the water a white-sailed little boat was speeding swiftly toward them. There was a woman in it. The eyes of love even in the presence of death are keen—perhaps even keener then than ever. It was Elizabeth Howard. O'Neill recognized her at once. Good Heavens! Why had she come here? She would arrive in time to see him swinging lifeless from the yardarm, a heart-breaking sight for any woman. He could not take his eyes from her.

"See!" he whispered to Coventry, "that boat yonder—she is there!"

"Forward, there!" cried the Captain, watch in hand. "Strike the bell five!"

The mellow tones of the first couplet of the ship's bell rang out in obedience to the command. The hour was come. It was his death-signal, but O'Neill never turned his head from the approaching boat. The old Quartermaster struck the bell deliberately, lingering over it reluctantly; a little shiver ran through the men.

"Stand by!" shouted the Lieutenant in a voice he strove in vain to make firm. "Make a quick jerk and a lively run, lads!"

The men grasped the rope more firmly and sprang into position for the jump. The next couplet was struck on the bell. The boat was nearer now. Coventry saw that the woman waved something that looked like a paper in her hand. The last stroke of the bell rang out on the breathless, silent ship.

"Set taut!" cried the Lieutenant hoarsely. The men leaped forward instantly to the shrill piping of the boatswain and his mate. "Sway away!" he cried.

The tightened rope caught the Irishman by the throat. A lightning flash seemed to cleave the skies; he saw, as in a vision, a great hall hung with arms, a picture frame, a woman radiant, beautiful, her eyes shining; an upraised hand; a voice murmured, "I love him, I love him!" Then a gigantic hand caught him by the throat; he strove to cry out; it clutched him tighter and tighter, blackness like a pall fell before him, shutting out the smiling face.

The quick eye of Major Coventry had detected at last what the girl was waving.

"That paper!" he cried frantically as the last bell struck, "it must be a reprieve—the Admiral has relented."

Was it too late? Quick as thought he snatched the sheath-knife from the belt of the sailor near him. It was too late to stop the men on the rope, even had he possessed the power, but as O'Neill rose in the air he caught him around the waist, and with one rapid blow severed the straining rope above his head. Assisted at once by the sailor alongside of him, they lowered the bound, unconscious man upon the deck beneath them. It was all done in the twinkling of an eye. The men on the ship broke out in ringing cheers. Pearson, white with rage at the interruption, leaped forward.

"What is the meaning of this?" he shouted. "Who has dared to interfere in this manner?"

"I, sir," replied Coventry fearlessly, looking up from his place by the unconscious man.

"And by what right, sir?" cried the enraged Captain.

"Boat ahoy!" cried a seaman stationed at the port gangway.

"Sir," said Coventry, quietly meeting the eye of the Captain, "if I mistake not, you will find my excuse in that boat."

"Well for you, sir, if it be there. Never in my twenty years of service have I been so braved, and on my own ship, too! See what boat it is," said the Captain, turning to one of his midshipmen, "and find out what is wanted." The lad came running back presently and saluted.

"'Tis a lady, sir; the Governor's ward, Lady Elizabeth Howard. She wishes to come on board," he said.

"Show her on board," said the Captain shortly to the midshipman. Then he looked down on the still unconscious form of O'Neill. "Send a surgeon here at once, sir," he continued, and as the latter presented himself: "Is the man dead?" he asked.

"No, sir," said the surgeon, examining him hastily and making ready to apply some necessary restoratives, for which he dispatched an assistant to the sick bay.

"Get him in shape, then, and quickly, for another attempt, for hang he shall, if he has to be held up for it," ordered the Captain sternly.

At this moment the midshipman, followed by Lady Elizabeth, pale, hatless, her hair disheveled, her hand clutching a paper, made way through the little group.

"Captain Pearson, where is he?" she cried nervously. Then as her eyes fell on the prostrate form of O'Neill, she dropped the paper to the deck, covered her face with her hands and rocked to and fro in agony. "Too late—too late!" she wailed, faltering.

"Not so, madam," said the Captain, turning toward her; "the man still lives, the surgeon assures me. He has but fainted. Have you a warrant to stop the execution? If not, it must go on, and it shall go hard with Major Coventry as well."

"The prisoner is reprieved, sir; here is the paper," cried Elizabeth, "sealed and signed by the Admiral himself. Oh, I had it a moment since; where has it gone?"

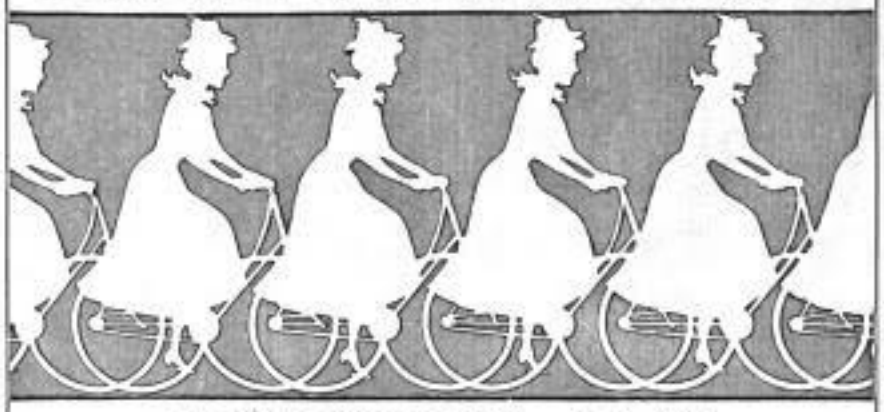
"Here it is, Your Ladyship," said one of the officers, lifting it from the deck and handing it to her.

"There," she said, presenting it to the Captain. He opened it deliberately and glanced over the brief contents. She watched him with a nervousness she vainly attempted to conceal. Meanwhile the doctor had succeeded in arousing O'Neill. The first glance of his eye fell on Elizabeth, and nothing else he saw.

"Heaven and the angels!" he murmured faintly, not yet comprehending the position.

"It seems to be made out properly and duly signed and sealed," said the Captain slowly. "A reprieve for the prisoner until further notice, and permission for the bearer to see him alone," he added suspiciously. There was a little pause. He turned the paper over in his hand and looked sharply at the girl.

"The Admiral chooses a strange messenger," he added. "I cannot say if this be regular or no. His handwriting is unfamiliar to me, so I do not recognize this. You say you had it from him, madam?"



Elizabeth would not trust herself to speak, she only bowed. There was evidently something very suspicious to the Captain in the whole proceeding. The signature did not seem just right.

"Ah, I have it! Major Coventry!" he cried suddenly. "Here is a reprieve from the Admiral; it seems to be correct, and yet—will you look over it and give me your opinion?—you are familiar with his writing, at any rate. My Lady, forgive the questioning, but the matter is most serious, and I must be absolutely assured."

"Here is the paper, Edward," said Elizabeth desperately, taking it from the Captain's outstretched hand. "Is not that the writing of the Admiral?" she added entreatingly, and then clasping her hands she looked at him and waited, full of apprehension.

A word, and he hanged her lover, killed her—a word, and he set them free. What the consequences to himself of his decision might be, with the sublime egotism of love for another, she neither knew nor questioned. Coventry gave a brief glance at the document; he saw what was expected of him; true to his creed he did not hesitate a moment. In that glance of a single second he realized the truth, which he had more than suspected before.

"It is," he replied briefly and indifferently, handing the paper back to the Captain.

The keen Captain was not yet satisfied, however.

"You wished to release him yourself, I remember," he said uncertainly. "I am by no means persuaded that—but it is impossible for me to proceed now till I have seen the Admiral. Take the prisoner below and allow Lady Elizabeth to see him alone," he said to the guard. "Mr. Pascoe, tell the boatswain to pipe down, and call the watch."

ACCOMPANIED by the marine guard, and leaning upon the arm of the surgeon and Coventry, O'Neill, followed by Elizabeth, was taken below. The girl's heart was exulting madly. So far she had triumphed. What next? When they reached the little screened enclosure in which O'Neill had been confined, the guard saluted and released the prisoner. He had not been ironed again, and by some oversight, in the confusion following the reprieve, no one called attention to it. As he stepped within the screen and Elizabeth prepared to follow him, Coventry interrupted her by holding out his hand.

"God bless you for what you did," she whispered.

"What you do, do quickly," he replied. "I will replace the sentry; you will be safe; God grant you may succeed. Good-by."

"Good-by—we shall not forget you," she said. And this was the only reward he received for his sacrifice. By his direction, the sentry on guard withdrew to the opposite side of the deck, and he himself mounted guard in front of the canvas.

As soon as she entered the enclosure Elizabeth threw herself into the arms of the bewildered O'Neill.

"Oh," she whispered, "you are saved—saved—and through me!"

"No, dearest, not yet," replied he, straining her to his heart, and kissing her fondly. "I scarcely yet understand it all, but if I heard aright 'tis but a reprieve until to-morrow. Build no hope upon it."

"We will not wait for the morrow, my dearest," she answered softly, "for the boat swings under the counter yonder. When night falls, and it is quite dark, we will slip out of the port and go away together—in a few moments it will be time."

The Irishman caught eagerly at the suggested idea. Unheeded, the night came stealing over the harbor; lights in the town twinkled here and there; the boatswain's whistle rang out between decks on the frigate. There was a call—a hoarse cry or two—a hurrying of feet, a little confusion.

"Now is the time!" said Elizabeth, releasing herself from his unwilling arms, and looking out through the port. "The man is watching—I met him on the strand as I was asking for a boat to bring me out to you. He says he knows you—has served under you."

"Knows me!" said O'Neill, surprised, thrusting his head through the open port. There, right beneath him, a little skiff was being brought up deftly and without noise from where it had lain unnoticed under the counter in the confusion since the girl's arrival. The side of the ship was in deep shadow, and the broad main chains extending over their heads above the ports further concealed them from notice.

Gathering her skirts about her, Elizabeth slipped first through the port. O'Neill held her firmly until the man below lifted her gently into the stern of the boat. Noiselessly and as quickly as possible O'Neill followed her. By Elizabeth's direction he lay down in the bottom of the boat, and she covered him entirely with her boat cloak. The man in the bows, whom O'Neill had not yet recognized in the shadow, and who had said nothing, slowly worked the boat back under the counter again, then with a strong thrust shoved her clear of the ship. The flooding tide carried them slowly away. In a few moments he cautiously got out his oars, and by very gentle pulling added a little to the way of the boat.

The ear of the watchful Coventry had at once apprised him of their departure. He could scarcely resist the temptation to call them back that he might see her once again. But he had duty to do. As soon as he was persuaded that they had left the ship, he called the sentry from the opposite side of the deck and told him to mount guard again, and on no account to disturb the prisoner. Then he ran rapidly up to the quarter-deck and made his way aft to the marine on guard there. The man was looking out into the darkness

Dr. Gaillard says:

"In the study of Cereal Foods it is only necessary to remember that the gluten of such foods is their nitrogenized element, the element on which depends their life-sustaining value, and that this element is, in the foolishly fashionable white flour, almost entirely removed, while the starch, the inferior element, is left behind. at a dark blur on the water—a boat, two figures could be distinguished in it, one of them a woman. Coventry saw them at once, and as he looked they disappeared—the last sight of her, he thought bitterly. The marine had just opened his mouth to give the alarm when the clear voice of the officer rang in his ear.

"Sentry!" said Coventry. The man instinctively sprang to attention at once, and for the moment forgot the boat.

"Have you seen any signals from the castle?"

"No, sir, but I seen a little boat off there that looked suspicious like."

"Whereabouts did you see it?"

"There, sir; right off there."

"No," said Coventry, straining his eyes through the darkness, "there is no boat there; you have been mistaken, I think," he added indifferently, his gaze still fixed on the place where they had drifted away and disappeared. He knew what was coming. Since they had gone, he must pay for it, so he leaned on the rail and waited. A few moments later a large barge, fully manned, darted out of the darkness and came toward the ship. Coventry knew what it was, of course.

"Boat ahoy!" shouted the watchful sentry at the gangway.

"Flag!" was the answer as the Admiral dashed alongside. Almost before the officer of the watch could reach the gangway the old man clambered to the deck.

"Good-evening, sir," he said in response to the former's salutation; "Captain Pearson?"

"I have sent for him, My Lord," replied the officer, and the next moment the Captain himself came bustling out of the darkness to do honor to the old Admiral.

"Ah! Captain Pearson, good-evening."

"Good-evening to Your Lordship."

"The prisoner I sent off—he has been duly executed, I presume?"

"Why, no, sir!" said the Captain, alarmed at this confirmation of his suspicions; "we were about ready to carry out the sentence, the command to sway aloft had been given, in fact, when we received your reprieve."

"My reprieve!" said the Admiral in great surprise; "what mean you? I sent no reprieve."

"Sir, sir!" cried the astonished Captain, "it was brought here by your ward, Lady Elizabeth Howard."

"Elizabeth!" cried the old man, starting; "her maid said she was ill—she must have—did you inspect it carefully, sir?" he asked, checking himself.

"'Twas passed upon by your son and aide, Major Coventry, My Lord," replied the Captain shortly.

"How! Edward! Where is he?"

"Here, My Lord," said the young man, stepping forward and saluting.

"Did you examine this paper, sir?"

"I did, sir."

"You knew it was a forgery."

"Yes, sir."

"And yet you declared it to be correct?"

"I did, sir."

"For what purpose?"

"Will you direct these others to retire out of hearing, Captain Pearson?" said Coventry, indicating the officer of the watch, the midshipman, and all of the others, and when his request had been complied with he added: "'Twas to save the honor of your ward, My Lord, to insure happiness to the woman I love more than life, to effect the escape of the man upon whom that happiness depended."

"The prisoner!" cried the Admiral impetuously. "Have him brought on deck at once, Captain Pearson."

"But your ward, My Lord, she is with him," replied the Captain.

"Bring her too, then," the old man answered passionately.

"But the crew—the men—not before them all," said Coventry, striving to gain time.

"Before Heaven itself the offense was given," cried the Admiral, losing all control over himself in his fury, "and the punishment shall have equal publicity." The midshipman who had hastened below now came running on deck in terror.

"There's no one there, My Lord; they've gone—escaped, sir!"

"Escaped!" repeated the Admiral, turning to the Captain. "Had you no sentry to watch them, sir?"

"Yes, My Lord, certainly."

"Let him be tried forthwith, then, for gross neglect of duty in permitting——"

"My Lord, the sentry is innocent," said Coventry; "I replaced him; I alone am guilty."

"Worse and worse! You knew they escaped, sir?" asked the Admiral.

"I did—'twas to prevent discovery that I took his place," replied his son, bowing. Captain Pearson opened his mouth to speak, but his superior silenced him with a wave of his hand.

A bitter fight raged in the old man's bosom, but he saw his duty and knew it must be done. There was a long and dreadful pause. When the Admiral spoke again it was with an altered tone; he had regained his self-control.

"Captain Pearson," he said, slowly and deliberately, in a strained and unnatural voice, "let the court martial which passed judgment upon the prisoner be reconvened at once to try Major Edward Coventry for disobedience of orders in time of war, and for aiding and abetting the escape of an enemy, and for knowingly declaring a forged order, purporting to have my signature, to be correct. In short, for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman."

"Surely not that last, My Lord," said Coventry, impulsively raising his hand in deprecation.

The Admiral hesitated, looked long and earnestly at his handsome son. "You may leave off the part about conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, Pearson," he answered.

"My Lord!" cried Pearson, "the punishment is death—I pray you——"

"Silence, sir!" he cried sternly; "you have your order."

There was a sudden bustle upon the deck forward.

"Sail ho! Light ho! Light ho!" rang out from a dozen rough throats.

"Where away?" said the officer of the watch.

"Off the starboard quarter," was the reply; "they're coming up from Flamborough."

"They will be the Bon Homme Richard and the rest of that scoundrelly pirate squadron, Captain Pearson," said the Admiral.

"We will go out and meet them at once, with your permission, My Lord," cried the Captain. "All hands up anchor! Mr. Pascoe, show the signal for the Scarborough to get under way. Lively!"

"Sir—My Lord—my father!" said Coventry, who had stood unnoticed in the excitement of the moment. "I would ask a favor of you, sir—as—as—as my father."

"Ask no favors of a father, sir; you have none."

"Let me beg of the man, then," said Coventry resolutely. "We are about to engage the enemy. For the sake of my mother, sir, do not condemn me to inaction now! Let me serve as the humblest volunteer. You shall not regret it."

The old man hesitated. He was a father in spite of what he had said, and he could not forget it. His heart was breaking beneath his iron exterior and appearance of outward composure.

"Go!" he replied at last; "you are free of any charges until to-morrow. When next I see you I shall have to prefer them; therefore let me not look upon your face again, sir. Do you understand?"

"Yes, yes; good-by, sir," said the young man brokenly. "I thank you and bless you for this. To-morrow I shall plead my cause in a higher court. Think of me kindly, sir."

The two men looked at each other in silence. The Admiral relented a little—it was for the last time—and drew the boy to him. He lifted his head in silent prayer.

"All hands make sail!" hoarsely cried the boatswain and his mates with shrill piping.

The Admiral turned away and Coventry walked over to Captain Pearson.

"Father gives me a chance to die," he said; "please assign me to some duty."

"I am glad to hear it," said the Captain, his face lighting up; "we are short a Lieutenant; I confide to you the forward division of the main-deck battery; do your best with it."

"I hope to serve it well," said the young officer, saluting proudly and springing toward his station.

PRACTICAL MUNICIPAL POLITICS for YOUNG MEN

By NATHANIEL C. SEARS

1. THE LEADER IN PARTY ORGANIZATION

IT IS safe to say that every young man of our country feels at some time an inclination to take an active part in politics. It must be so with the young man of sound and healthy moral nature, whether from motive of using a gift which belongs to him, or from motive of doing a duty which rests upon him. The fact that large numbers of men of affairs in our great cities are seemingly careless of both right and duty is doubtless due, to an extent, to failure of success in the line of political usefulness. It is not unlikely that, if the young men who try to enter political life could meet with a larger success—not in securing advantage of office merely, but in making their efforts tell in results—the extent of political indifference would be greatly lessened. The fact that so many young men do fail in an attempt to make themselves felt in political affairs must, to a considerable extent, be charged to a lack of practical knowledge of the methods which obtain in municipal politics. Here, as elsewhere, effort misapplied is of no avail, however good the motive.

The young man, upon entering into political work, or attempting to do so, finds a few men in each political party seemingly guiding, if not controlling, its movements, and he finds it difficult to learn the secret of their success and power. It is often accepted as belief by the general public that these few men have entire control of the movements of the party organization, and that they alone and with autocratic power dictate party nominations and party measures. From this belief there has grown up a considerable degree of popular disfavor. The party leaders are termed "bosses" and the party organization which they are supposed to thus control is called "the machine." By looking into the methods of these party leaders it may be seen in just what their power consists and its extent. The secret of their success does not lie in any personal hold which they have upon the following which makes up the party. It is neither through power of oratory nor through personal good fellowship that the end is accomplished.

HARD WORK THE BED-ROCK OF SUCCESS

The success of the party leader is founded upon hard, continuous and systematic work in maintaining thorough precinct organization—that is to say, organization of the party workers and following in the smallest of the political subdivisions of the territory of the city. As in money matters, the adage, "Take care of the pence and the pounds will take care of themselves" holds, so in political matters the same truth may be paraphrased into "Take care of the precincts and the city will take care of itself."

Party organization has for its ends the nomination of candidates for public office and the success at the polls of the ticket made up of such candidates. For nominating purposes the smallest division of territory, wherein is the beginning of political action, is the primary district. The beginning of party organization is the precinct club; the next larger body is the ward club; and the final organized body is the central city committee. The precinct club is made up of all party adherents who choose to join it within this smallest subdivision of territory, viz., the precinct. Here the effective work of the party must be accomplished, whether it be in choosing delegates to represent the ward in the city nominating convention, or in the later work of polling the full party vote at the election.

The ability to hold together, in the precinct club, in continuous party service, a number of party workers sufficient to control the selection of delegates to nominating conventions, is the chief element in the political leadership of to-day in our large cities. The strength of party leadership is built upon this power of choosing delegates.

It follows then, to inquire how these men are able to gain and retain this power. It is frequently charged that the common method of accomplishing this end in large cities is by "ballot-box stuffing"—that is to say, fraudulent voting at the primaries. Doubtless there has been much of truth in the charge as applied to some periods and some cities. It is not, however, generally true to-day. In cities where the primary election, viz., the voting for delegates to nominating conventions, has been put into the control of State officers, and where the proceedings of such primaries have been thus hedged about with all the caution attending a Federal election, the leadership of the same party leaders has continued unchanged. Apparently the delegates whom they desire are selected just as they were when the primaries were conducted under looser methods and without State supervision.

HOW THE LEADERS HOLD THE REINS

In attempting to analyze the basis of this power it is necessary to consider the classes of party adherents who vote at the primaries. A large proportion of the business men of the city are indifferent to the primary election, and rarely take part even to the extent of voting. The total number voting at the ordinary primary election is very small in comparison to the number of party adherents who vote at the election, and compared to the number of such who might vote at the election it is even more insignificant.

It is safe to divide those who do take part in these primaries into two classes: first, those who work through motive of public spirit, and, secondly, those who work through motive of office seeking. The first class includes the citizen who, with manly appreciation of his right and duty, avails himself of his citizenship. It also includes many who, without much sentiment of duty, find a pleasure in partisanship and loyalty to the doctrines of their particular party. This class of voters is held together in party work without any particular effort on the part of the organization leaders. The hold of the party leaders upon them is always slight, and their support is gained, if at all, because they believe that the leadership is efficient in perfecting and maintaining a strong party.

The second class comprises those who hold offices, elective or appointive, and wish to retain them, and those who are ambitious to secure such offices. It also includes the many who through kinship or friendship are interested in the success of such office holders or seekers. It is in keeping this class active in support of the party organization and in directing their action that the task of the party leader is found. Wherever the merit system of appointment to the minor offices, known as the civil service system, is not adopted, and wherever it is adopted and nullified, the distribution of appointive offices among party workers is a controlling factor in party organization and party leadership. This method of reward, known as the "spoils system," is inevitable wherever the civil service system is not in force.

Where the distribution of offices as a reward for party service obtains, the party leaders are commonly supposed to exercise an absolute power in determining the manner of distribution. To an extent this is true, and to a very large extent it is untrue. It is true that the party leaders have much to do in determining the method of distribution, but that they arbitrarily decide who shall receive nominations and appointive offices is not true. It could not be so for any length of time without operating to undo the leadership. The number of disappointed usually exceeds the number of satisfied among office seekers. If the disappointments could be charged to the party leader alone, the end of his leadership would be quick to follow.

HOW THE SPOILS SYSTEM WORKS

The only plan of party organization which has proved of any permanent efficiency in the political history of large cities, is one by which the choice of candidates for elective offices and recipients of appointive offices is fairly left to the body of the party workers.

A ward club indorses by resolution some one from among its number, and agrees to work for his nomination for a specified office. In this manner candidates for nomination are indorsed by ward clubs in various parts of the city and for the various offices to be filled at the election. At the primaries delegates are chosen to support these various candidacies. After the delegates are elected a caucus is held, usually several, before the meeting of the nominating convention. The delegates chosen in a ward select some one of their number to go into a caucus composed of representatives of other ward delegations, and together representing the wards of a certain district or part of the city. These representatives of several wards confer and agree upon a candidate for nomination to be supported by them. If there are several candidates from the wards represented, and but one can be given a place upon the ticket, the conflicting interests must be reconciled. Some must yield. All must finally agree upon the support of one. Then a representative from this caucus is chosen to go to another caucus, made up of similar representatives of other districts or parts of the city. In this final caucus perhaps a half dozen or a dozen men, each representing the club selects as entitled thereto by reason of party service, provided the ones thus recommended are deemed fit by the appointing official in capacity and in character.

The strength of the system lies in the fact that the disappointed seekers for office can charge their failure to no one save their fellow-workers, and they are encouraged to remain in active party service because their success in the future depends not upon the will of any one or any number of leaders in the party, but upon the will of their own fellows. In the strength of this system lies the secret of party leadership in large cities.

Upon this system, it is safe to assert, has been grounded all successful and permanent leadership. The plan is certainly not to be commended by thoughtful men in comparison with an honestly conducted civil service. But it does commend itself to the average party worker as being more democratic in principle and preferable to any plan of distribution based upon the mere caprice of party leaders. In any event, in the absence of an efficient civil service system, the public good is wholly dependent upon the firmness of the elective official in refusing to appoint any member of his party, however great his party service, whose fitness and character are not clear.

NATHANIEL C. SEARS

candidate of a district, and each in reality representing the body of party workers in such district, try to reach an agreement for their constituents by which a satisfactory ticket is made up, one which will receive the support of all these various constituencies in the convention. Here again some must yield, but in the final selection of the entire ticket the claims of each locality or district are usually given fair recognition. In this manner a few men, meeting together and seemingly acting with arbitrary power, but really representing constituencies who are anxiously awaiting the results of their respective efforts and advocacies, shape the selection of a ticket. The men thus chosen to take this final action are chosen again and again as long as the body of the party workers are satisfied with their representation, and they thus become leaders in party organization.

THE WARD CLUB CIVIL SERVICE

In the distribution of appointive offices the party workers in the city have a more direct voice. The elected officials, where there is no civil service system, usually distribute the minor appointive offices throughout the city, according to territory and party representation. This distribution is not usually made on the basis of personal friendship. Neither is it made at the dictation of the party leaders. It is made, as a rule, upon the recommendation and indorsement of the ward clubs. If, upon the basis of territory and party representation, a certain number of appointments are to be given to a certain ward, the appointees are those members of the party, in that ward, whom the ward

THE ROOTS OF POLITICAL STRENGTH

The young man entering into political work to-day in any large city is confronted with these or similar conditions. That these conditions might be vastly improved by adopting a system of choosing candidates by direct vote, rather than by delegates, is beyond question. But they exist as the conditions of to-day and must be recognized and understood by one seeking to do effective political work. How, then, can the young man entering political action make his influence and labors of account? Certainly not by mere platform oratory. Field work cannot be done on the rostrum. The young man who seeks to make himself felt in municipal politics must begin at the beginning, viz., in the ward precinct and at the primary elections. Here are the roots of political strength, and here he must make the foundation of his work. Where comparatively so few work, the force of one is largely felt. A few young men of good purpose, working together, not seeking office but the public good, can accomplish wonders in any primary district of any city. A few in each district, working faithfully and persistently, can do much toward making the results of good delegates, good candidates, honest and efficient officials, and the ultimate adoption and enforcement of a pure civil service assured facts.

The "Lion" Preacher to Visit Us

OF MANY odd customs none is quainter than the "lion sermon," which is preached once a year in the Church of St. Katharine Cree, England, to comply with the will of Sir John Gayer, who sought to commemorate many years ago his miraculous preservation from lions while lost in an African desert. The real cause of fear was the predatory baboon. Nevertheless, under the terms of the ancient will, the "lion sermon" has to be given, with full allusion to the king of all the beasts.

The last sermon, by a strange coincidence, was delivered by the Rev. E. H. Gayer, of Smithfield, England, in whose veins flows the same blood as that of the dead testator.

Doctor Gayer has been invited to lecture at one of the religious Chautauquas in this country this summer, and his learning and eloquence are certain to make his visit notable.

WHAT to READ

A Glint of the Mirror*

SNAPPY is the one word by which to characterize William Archer's "America To-Day." This is a notable book in many respects, but principally because it sets a new pace for the British writer giving his impressions of America. Previous performances in this line have too generally been characterized by a weighty obtuseness, a ponderous incapacity to understand the spirit of America and her institutions, a perverse inability to get a true perspective of things American, a lack of subtle discrimination in striking a balance between the important and the trivial in analyzing the national life of the United States. Mr. Archer's clever and unpretending study of America is in striking contrast to these precedents. The reader is inclined to put down this book with the exclamation: "Thank Heaven for one Britisher who understands the spirit of America!" Still better, he might add, "and appreciates American humor as keenly as the most whimsical Yankee."

This ability to grasp the subtleties of our humor without diagram or explanation is enough to endear the celebrated British journalist to the heart of this people for all time. More than this, Mr. Archer gives striking testimony to the fact that he has himself been infected with the spirit of American humor, for his pages scintillate with flashes of wit which bear as little resemblance to the ponderous humor of Punch as does the chain lightning to a premeditated display of phosphorescent illumination.

It is not to be inferred, however, that the book is deficient in serious value. On the contrary, it is doubtful if a more discerning analysis of the relations between the North and South and between England and America has been put forth in the last decade. His treatment of the former phase of our national life is so fresh and discriminating that it is difficult to avoid the conviction that Mr. Archer's conclusions could scarcely have been arrived at from any other view-point than his own—that of a keen, sympathetic and democratic foreigner. The author's attitude on this subject is tersely suggested by this paragraph:

> "The cause of the South was the cause of small against large political aggregations; and the world regards the defeat of the South as righteous and inevitable because instinct tells us that the welfare of humanity is to be sought in large political aggregations, and not in small. Providence, in a word, is on the side of the big (social) battalions."

His utterances upon the "burning topic of the misgovernment of American cities" are refreshingly novel and candid. What other British writer has had the generosity to admit that "altogether, Tammany or no Tammany, New York cannot possibly be described as an ill-governed city. Its government may be wasteful, or worse; inefficient it is not. Even the policemen seem to be maligned. I never found them rude or needlessly dictatorial." Every city visited by Mr. Archer is picturesquely characterized—New York as "a peerless emerald on the finger of Manhattan"; Chicago as "the young giant among the cities of the earth, . . . embracing in its unimaginable amplitude every extreme of splendor, . . . on a cloudy afternoon a fuliginous city of Dis, piled up by superhuman and sinister powers; a city which suggests that antique conception of the under world which placed Elysium and Tartarus not only on the same plane, but, so to speak, around the corner from each other."

—Forrest Crissey.

The Confederacy's Great Cavalryman†

WHILE Grant was cutting and selling cordwood, and Sherman was teaching school, there was a man in Memphis who was having no preparation whatever for war, and yet who was destined to make no end of trouble for those able soldiers. This was General N. B. Forrest, whose life by Dr. J. A. Wyeth has recently been issued. Forrest was an uneducated man and belonged to that proscribed class in the South known as "poor whites." Moreover, he was still further handicapped in any effort to stand on an equality with men of position by having been a slave-trader. But by native force and by a genius for action this unlettered man became the most successful cavalry leader in the South.

He enlisted as a private, but before he really went into action had been made a Lieutenant-Colonel. In this capacity he proved that he could move men through the country with a celerity most remarkable. He knew nothing whatever about the principles of war, and probably never read a book on the subject in his life. It is unlikely, indeed, that he ever read many books of any kind. He was essentially a man of action, and for more than three and a half years he kept the Federal commanders guessing as to where he was and what he was going to do next.

Toward the close of the war Forrest's wonderful capacity was appreciated in Richmond, and he was made a Lieutenant-General and put in command of all the cavalry west of the Mississippi. It was too late, however, for him to do much. Hood's army had been all but destroyed before Nashville, Sherman was marching through Georgia, and General James H. Wilson was after Forrest with the strongest cavalry command ever placed in the saddle. He defeated Forrest at Selma—the first time, by the way, Forrest had ever been completely beaten—and shortly afterward the war ended.

WHAT is the use of our teaching our children not to use slang when Mr. George Ade's Fables in Slang is in its nineteenth thousand? It is inevitable that the book will fall into the hands of many children, and although the major part of it will be Greek to them, they will pick up one or two phrases that they had not already learned.

To tell the truth, the chief claim of the book for recognition is not in its picturesque choice of slang—there is an anonymous writer on a New York paper who could give Mr. Ade half his assortment of the wildest and most metaphorical slang and not become impoverished. The fables have charm because they are really fables and because they have a robust American humor. They are brimful of philosophy and they go right to the bottom of things. There's a whole volume of wisdom in the moral to the fable of The Good Fairy: "In uplifting, get underneath." Too many moral reformers use grappling irons.

There was never a great humorist from Artemus Ward down to Mark Twain whose claim to the title was not scoffed at by many persons who would indignantly deny that they were lacking in the humorous sense themselves. In fact, no humorist was ever a humorist to every one; but Mr. George Ade will disrupt nine families out of ten through connubial quarrels, for he is preëminently a man's humorist.

The fond mother who has labored with little Claude for a twelvemonth to wean him from the use of slang is not going to laugh over the fables unless her sense of humor is keener than her sense of duty. But her husband, who has rubbed around in the world with his lids apart, and who has had more or less familiar dealings with drummers, variety actors, fakes and Bohemians, will be apt to laugh out loud when he reads these keen, cutting, but thoroughly good-humored stabs at current foibles.

If your sense of humor is in good working order read the fables; but if you wish to wean Claude or Clement from the inordinate use of slang, lend the book to a childless neighbor as soon as you have finished it.

The Last of the Irish Pharaohs

IN THE British House of Commons is an Irish member who is known as the "Last of the Irish Pharaohs." This extraordinary title arose in this way: On account of the discoveries made by Professor Flinders Petrie, the Oriental scholar, a clever compiler made a list of all the personages not found in standard works of reference, beginning with Osiris and running down to the Kings of Nubia. The title of the work was somewhat misleading, and this, in turn, was made more vague when it was reprinted in a trade circular as a "List of Kings and Important Historical Personages Not Heretofore Published." The last phrase caught the eye of the Irish M. P. and he said to a friend: "There's a book I must get. I have long wanted to find out which one of my ancestors was a King of Leinster before the time of Christ, and here's the book that will tell me."

Doctor Petrie and the compiler were much amused when they heard the story, but they lost the sale of a book.

Forced to Fame by Palmistry

THAT many clever authors have a touch of the superstitious is shown in the case of Robert Smythe Hichens, whose father is the Rev. F. H. Hichens, Rector of St. Stephen's, near Canterbury, England. Mr. Hichens believes in palmistry. He was made famous in America by The Green Carnation. Mr. Hichens, in discussing his favorite superstition, lately said:

"I know a palmist who has told me as much about myself as I know myself, and more than I care to have anybody else know. Yes, I must say I have a leaning toward the science of palmistry. The man I speak of told me the exact condition of my health, all about my ambition and my trouble in choosing a career. He told me when and how I should lose money, when I should marry, and when I should be successful, and, from what he told me of my past life, it can only follow that I shall do the thing he said I would do when the time comes."

Mr. Palmer Cox Plays a Star Part

PALMER COX, the famous originator of the Brownies, was a juror in a case before the Supreme Court in New York recently. The daily press made more of the silent part Mr. Cox played in the affair than they did of any of the other participants. The result was that after two days of pictorial reports upon the case, the court-room and its surroundings were so thronged with admiring children, anxious to see the creator of the Brownies, that the officers had difficulty in assigning seats to the lawyers and witnesses.

A Japanese View of Our Pioneer Women

LOCAL conditions often make two-thirds of the interest of a plot or story. The chief feature of The Choir Invisible, by James Lane Allen, is the heroic nature of the American woman pioneer. She tilled the field and often built the blockhouse. She fought the wolf and the Indian. To Americans, no explanation is necessary in respect to these wonderful historical characters. Such, however, is not the case with foreigners. Recently The Choir Invisible was translated into Japanese. Among the first to read the book was a distinguished historian of Osaka, who said in conversation with an American diplomat:

"It is a rather good picture of farm life."

The diplomat replied: "I think it is more than that. It takes great courage for a woman to be a pioneer and lead that kind of a life."

The Japanese scholar nodded benignly as he answered: "That may be so with some of your women, but it is not so with ours. They always work in the fields and do it as a matter of instinct."

Masterpieces of America's Greatest Artists in the Finest Photogravure Process

These photogravures represent paintings that have been sold for thousands of dollars, and others that are fresh from the artists' brush. They would sell rapidly at any art store at $5.00 each, but they cannot be purchased except directly from us, as we absolutely control the copyrights.

The Masterpieces of twenty-five of our Greatest Native Artists now for the first time available in a single collection.

Beautify Your Home

Here are enough pictures, varied in style and color-tone, to superbly adorn any home. They are the finest results that can be produced. They are 18 x 24 inches in size, and are placed in a beautiful portfolio and so arranged that they can be conveniently removed for framing.

AN ART EDUCATOR

This magnificent collection will at once stimulate and cultivate a desire for the artistic. Accompanying each picture is given a description of the painting, also a portrait and biographical sketch of the artist, an interesting account of his early studies, how he was led to take up art as a profession, in what schools and under what masters he received his instruction. It describes his trips and sojourns abroad, where and when his paintings were first exhibited and the honors they received both in Europe and America. The titles of the artist's most notable paintings are also given, and where they now are. All of this information is not only interesting, but exceedingly instructive.

THE TROUBLES OF MARTIN COY

could I be with such a child as this to give away to the first young lover that asks for her?"

Now, you will say that this is taking you away from Martin Coy and his troubles. On the contrary, it is carrying us straight to the project which Captain McCarthy had devised. For the wedding of Nora and young Flournoy was made the occasion of a device to draw Martin Coy out of his shell and to convince him that some things are true as well as others, as Mr. Nicklin would say.

It was decided by the young people that the wedding should take place within two months at least, the particular day to conform, of course, to Nora's arrangements. Now, when a girl decides to get married there's a great question of gowns, robes and what-nots—a question of interminable and unending details; for the discussions started then may rest a while, but you may be sure they will be carried safely over to the next generation, when the girl who was in such a flurry over her own outfit will be every bit as nervous over that of her daughter.

Meantime Captain McCarthy carried on his correspondence with such vigor that he soon made a discovery of great importance, and this was why, the day before the wedding, he drove to the railroad station a few miles away and returned with a stranger. This done, the Captain sought out Martin Coy and insisted on seeing him face to face.

"I like you well enough," said Martin, "but I don't want to see you."

"I want to see you and talk to you for your own sake," the Captain insisted.

"My sake ain't so much of a sake as to worry you, I hope," remarked Martin Coy.

"We'll never get to Heaven if our neighbors' troubles don't worry us," suggested the Captain. "I want to see you for Nora's sake."

Now, Nora had taken a very great interest in the troubles of Martin Coy. She had gone over and talked to him through his closed door, and, only a day or two previous to the Captain's visit, had sung and played on the harp for Martin. Being in a romantic mood herself, owing to circumstances, the songs she had chosen were Irish ballads, and the quality of her voice, which was rich and sweet, and the heart-breaking character of the melodies were sufficient to bring tears to Martin Coy's eyes for the first time in many years. She heard him sobbing when her songs were ended, and she slipped away without saying a word. So when Captain McCarthy said "for Nora's sake," he put a new face on the matter.

"She's a mighty fine girl, I reckon," remarked Martin Coy. "She came over and sung for me the other day, and who else in all the world would 'a' done that?"

"It's Nora's way," said the Captain gently. He had a marvelous touch of sympathy in his voice when he chose to employ it. "It's the child's way. When she came home she was crying."

Martin Coy made no reply to this, but after a while the key turned in the lock and the door opened. "Come in and I'll strike a match," he said. This done, a candle was soon lighted, and Martin Coy turned inquiring eyes on the face of the man who had insisted on seeing him. He was surprised to find that the look which Captain McCarthy fixed on him was not one of curiosity.

"I was not especially anxious to see your face," explained the Captain. "I wanted you to see mine, so that you could judge for yourself whether I am likely to make an idle or a foolish request of a man who for so many years has had sorrow for a bedfellow."

The features of Captain McCarthy could be stern enough when the necessity arose, but they were softened now and illuminated by a friendly light in his eyes. The most ignorant human being in the world would have had no difficulty in trusting that face, to which fixed principles and an invincible desire to follow the right on all occasions, and at all hazards, had given a certain air of nobility.

"The request I want to make is that you will come to Nora's wedding."

Martin Coy frowned, and threw up both hands with a querulous exclamation: "Now, Cap, you know I can't do that. Oh, why do you pester me that-a-way?"

"The ceremony will take place at night," remarked McCarthy; "to-morrow night."

"But everything'll be all lit up; folks could see me a mile in that light. No, Cap, I wish the child mighty well; that's enough; I don't want to bring no judgment down on her head. They say she's purty as a pink; I'd give her bad luck the balance of her days. Look at me! Oh, Lord! look at me!"

"You will sit in a dark room, and you will be seen only by those you desire to see." Martin Coy rubbed his hands together as though washing them. "And Nora has set her heart on it. She says she won't be as happy as she wants to be if you fail to come."

"Did she say that?" Martin Coy's voice broke and grew husky.

"She said a great deal more than that," replied Captain McCarthy. "She said she couldn't bear to be happy, knowing that you were sitting here lonely and unhappy."

"Lord, Lord!" cried Martin Coy, covering his face with both hands. "Has she always been like that?" he asked after a while.

"Ever since she was a little slip of a girl," said Captain McCarthy.

Martin Coy walked up and down the room for some time. Then he paused. "Will you come after me?" he asked.

"Certainly," said the other; "with the greatest pleasure in the world. And I'll do this"—Captain McCarthy's eyes were sparkling now—"when you return home from Nora's wedding, you'll never walk in the darkness any more; you'll never hide from the light of the sun any more."

"You reckon not?" asked Coy eagerly.

"You'll see, my friend."

When Captain McCarthy went downstairs Mrs. Coy was waiting for him. What had happened, and how did he manage to get into the room? To her mind, the explanation didn't explain, and when she learned that her husband had promised to attend Nora's wedding, she vowed that wonders would never cease, though this was the greatest wonder of all.

Martin Coy went to the wedding. The library had no light in it, and the door looking out into the parlor had a strip of white ribbon tied across it, and this kept all intruders out. The house was filled with a goodly company of men and women, lads and girls, and there was a great murmur of music and laughter, rustling dresses, fluttering fans, and the incessant chatter proper to a festal occasion. Martin Coy feasted his eyes and ears on it all. He felt elated without knowing why. He paid no attention when the door leading upon the veranda opened and some one came in and took a seat not far from him. He heard nothing until Captain McCarthy came in by the same door and closed it with something like a bang.

Then Martin Coy turned and saw that some one sitting near him. His eyes by long use had become habituated to the darkness. He arose and shrank away with a smothered groan. He stumbled and would have fallen but for the strong arm of Captain McCarthy.

"I know'd! I know'd it! It's a judgment! Do you see anything in that cheer there?"

"Why, certainly," replied the Captain. "I see Captain Harvey Coy, of Missouri."

"Why, Harvey Coy's as dead as a door-nail; I killed him myself," said Martin, shaking all over.

"Just feel of me, Martin, and see if I'm dead," exclaimed Harvey.

"Oh, why didn't you come before, or write?" Martin asked petulantly.

"After I got well, I hated everybody in the South," replied Harvey, "and after I got over my spell of hating, I didn't know how you people would treat a man who had fought on the other side."

Captain McCarthy slipped out and left them, and when he came back an hour after to warn them that the ceremony was about to begin, he found Martin laughing and telling his brother some incident of his childhood.

After the wedding was over, and the congratulations had been said, and Nora and her husband had been whirled away in a carriage to catch the midnight train, Captain McCarthy slapped Martin Coy on the shoulder and said in a bantering tone:

"Well, what do you think of Nora?"

"Don't ask me to talk about her. Can I git a ketch in the throat every time I think about her. Ef Frank Flournoy don't treat her right they'll be murder done in this neighborhood, as certain as the world."

This topic was new to Captain McCarthy. He half closed his eyes, pursed his lips, rocked backward and forward on his feet, and then said sharply, "We'll shake hands on that, Martin."

But, really, the suggestion was the last remnant of Martin Coy's disordered fancy and melted away. Nora Flournoy had, and still has, as much happiness as ever fell to the lot of woman in this world, and she earned it by making others happy. And Martin Coy was happy, too, to the day of his death. To the last he insisted that folks never could know what real happiness is until, to employ his own phrase, "they had had a whole passel of trouble."

Memories of Moody By His Son
William Revell Moody
I. As Boy and Business Man

Drawings by Carl Kleinschmidt

SEVEN generations of Puritan ancestors make no bad foundation for a character. Dwight Lyman Moody could have pointed to these if he had chosen; but he was of a democratic spirit, and as he never felt any responsibility for his ancestors' failings, did not pride himself on their achievements. But we do not know that failings were many. They were simple men all; some of them were professional men, but most of them were home-keepers, and the farm was their boundary as well as their home.

They made good pioneers, and the powers which stood them in such good stead Mr. Moody inherited and utilized in the unsparing, continuous labor that characterized his entire life. The old New England virtues—love of liberty, strength of conviction, courage, spiritual and physical, and that crystallized good sense that invariably marks the native New Englander—were his in large proportion.

The hungry were never turned away from Mrs. Moody's door

There is no reasonable doubt that the necessary hardships, the simple, sane, outdoor life, the wholesome country food and the discipline of steady work, which he shared with every country boy, gave him the basis of physical health without which his great spirit and ceaselessly working brain would have long since worn out their fleshly tenement.

The Holtons, the family of Mr. Moody's mother, had even a stronger claim to the Puritan virtues than his father's stock, for they landed in America in 1630, three years before the Moodys.

The marriage of Edwin Moody and Betsy Holton had been arranged for New Year's Day, 1828, but the tide justified its ancient reputation of waiting for no man, and a sudden thaw sent the Connecticut River far above its banks. There were but two miles between the young people, but it was long before the day of iron bridges, and a journey of many miles was necessary to make the ceremony possible, even on January third. The young people left the family home of the Holtons to make one for themselves in Northfield, the town that a future generation was to connect proudly with their name through a Moody then unknown to them.

WHY MR. MOODY DROPPED ONE OF HIS NAMES

Dwight Lyman Moody was born on Sunday, February 5, 1837. The old family record adds another name—Ryther—but it was not an age of long names for men of his social station, and it slipped out of use. An amusing reason is given for this omission by old neighbors of the family. It appears to have been a charmingly pastoral custom of those days for those whose names had been given to a child to present the baby with a sheep in recognition of the honor conferred by the family of the namesake. It would seem that in the case of young Dwight this honor had been forgotten, and the Rythers' failure to go through with the pretty little presentation ceremony was punished by an omission that the descendants of the family may well regret today. For twelve years and a half the young couple lived happily together, contented with each other, though possessed of few material blessings; for Edwin Moody was a thoughtless, open-handed young man, thinking little of the future and making no provision for the home he had so lightly and cheerfully established. It is hardly to be wondered at that he had made no provision for an event so improbable as an early death must seem to a man of his temperament. When he died, without a moment's warning, his widow was left with hardly a home, and except for her dower rights she would literally have had no shelter, as the very roof over her head was mortgaged.

A young wife with seven children, whose lover-husband has been taken from her at forty-one, utterly at the mercy of relentless creditors, is a sad picture indeed; but the strength and courage of her pioneer ancestors buoyed up a naturally brave heart, and the faith in God which she gave in such wonderful measure to her children was not lacking to the mother in this crisis. In the summer after her husband's death the birth of twins added greatly to her cares and difficulties, and had it not been for the kindly aid offered by her brothers and the Rev. Mr. Everett, the old minister of the Unitarian Church, her struggles would have been too hard to bear.

And as she had received, so she gave. The hungry were never turned away from Mrs. Moody's door, and the children were early taught the privilege of charity. Once when the provision for the evening meal was very scanty, the little ones were allowed to vote as to whether they would give some of their already meagre store to a poor beggar.

To charity toward others they were taught to add strictness toward one's self. No word of complaint was ever heard from that little family. They suffered much neglect, but the independence that a fine poverty can sometimes nurture so well became a prominent characteristic of the Moody children.

In line with this independence toward the outside world was the absolute insistence upon the uprightness and exact truthfulness that should accompany it. The inviolate character of a promise was early impressed upon them, and so well was the lesson learned that in after life Mr. Moody exhibited plainly his dislike of committing himself to a promise or pledge. As a child he had been accustomed to being asked not "Can you?" but "Did you say you would?" If the answer were affirmative, the word had to be kept, the obligation could not be avoided. The Spartan interpretation of this law is shown by the following incident:

Dwight, who had promised to work for a neighbor in payment for his board during a winter while he was attending school, tried to be released from his engagement on the ground that for nineteen consecutive meals his food had been cornmeal and milk. When his mother found out that although the quality of the food had been questionable, he had had enough to eat, such as it was, she sent him back to keep his agreement.

Such a strict disciplinarian, with nine mischievous children under thirteen years of age, resorted naturally to the old-fashioned whipping as the best means of punishment. Mr. Moody often referred to these whippings, of which he seems to have received a great number, in commendatory terms, attributing to them, as one so often attributes to past sufferings, much of his success in after life; but it is noticeable that in his own home such penalties found no place, an inconsistency no less delightful than common.

"Mother would send me out for a stick, and often I tried to fool her by bringing back a dead one. But I always had to go and get another. Once, in a fit of bravado, I told her that the whipping did not hurt at all, but I never had to tell her so again, for she remedied the deficiency promptly."

A NEW ENGLAND BOY'S RELIGIOUS TRAINING

In those times there was no question as to whether one should go to church or not; one went as a matter of course. The older boys who had been working during the week came home Saturday nights to go to church with the rest. The little boys would go barefoot, saving their shoes and stockings for the service itself, putting them on as soon as the church was in sight. The service was an all-day affair, with two sermons, between which they ate the luncheon they had brought. Sunday-school was added to this program, which seems lengthy enough to our modern eyes, and makes us appreciate the romping which the Sunday sunset made possible, for in those days the Sabbath began Saturday evening and lasted only until sunset Sunday. This one day of united family life must have been a great source of comfort to them, and they were never so poor as to lack each other one day in the week, at least.

In after years the strict attendance at church, which he, like any other normal boy, would certainly not have chosen for himself, was regarded by Mr. Moody as one of the most valuable habits of his life. The custom of going regularly to God's house had been cheaply purchased, he felt, even at the price of many tedious hours and many long sermons.

"I used to blame my mother for sending me to church on the Sabbath," he used to say. "I thought it was pretty hard to have to go to church and be preached at when I had been working in the field all week. I used to go to sleep; once the preacher had to send some one into the gallery to wake me up. I used to think that when I got away from home I wouldn't go to church any more; but I had got so in the habit of going that I couldn't stay away. Although I might miss one or two Sabbaths, I found myself back in the house of God the next week. There I first found Christ, and many a time since I have said, 'I thank you, mother, for making me go to church when I didn't want to.'"

It is doubtful, however, if maternal instruction could have been responsible for the quick wit and adaptability to circumstances that characterized young Dwight even as a very small boy. For instance, when scarcely five years of age, wishing to go and see his Grandmother Holton and having only five cents, which was only half of his stage fare, he was informed that the journey would be impossible. The distance was five miles, which to legs as short as his might as well have been twenty-five. But his mind was made up, and he stopped the driver and besought him to take him for five cents. The kind-hearted man agreed to take him as baggage, and although the stage was already full, he put him on top where the luggage was placed. The little boy received a true grandmother's welcome, spent the day, and was sent home afoot, as they had no idea that the stage driver could be induced to carry him for nothing. Dwight had made up his mind that it was far pleasanter to ride than to walk, and planned accordingly. He went out into the fields and picked a large bunch of wild flowers, which he offered to the driver as a return fare, with such success that his admiring family saw him returning to them in triumph on the box seat.

YOUNG DWIGHT'S FAITH IN PROVIDENCE

When Dwight was only eight, he and his elder brother, a boy of twelve, were already busily at work in one or another of the neighbors' fields. One fall evening they started on a journey to the farm of a distant friend where they were going to earn a little money cutting broom-corn. It was late at night when they reached the old ferry across the Connecticut. For a long time their calls to the ferryman brought no answer, but finally a hoarse voice far below them said that one boatman would come and take them across while another would direct their course by a lantern on the other side. The current was so strong that they waited some time without hearing a sound, but finally the welcome boat appeared. As soon as they had gotten into the boat the older boy, who was himself only twelve, perceived that the boatman was half-intoxicated, and in no condition to take them across the river. The younger boy clung to his brother's hand while they both, seeing only too plainly that the boat was being carried far below the landing-place, begged to be allowed to help at the oars. This the man stubbornly refused to let them do, and the two frightened children could only comfort each other as best they might and hope that help would come. The older boy, less imaginative than Dwight, relied upon screams to the opposite bank and arguments with the boatman, but the little Dwight, too young, perhaps, to appreciate thoroughly the danger, perhaps even then moved by the extraordinary power of faith that always characterized his later life, actually encouraged his elder brother, assuring him that God would never desert them, and that they would surely be safe even on the waters, while in the care of their Heavenly Father. And finally, as in every circumstance of his later life, his trust was rewarded, and they were saved from what might have been a dreadful death.

—"and there, in the back part of that store in Boston, he gave himself and his life to God"

Others of his adventures displayed quite a different spirit. Like most boys of strong vitality and keen imagination, his quick wit and ready inventiveness made him a leader among his mates. Many a wild escapade, many a daring trick played upon the farmers in the vicinity made him admirable to his friends for far other qualities than those calculated to win the approval of the more strictly virtuous. One of the neighbors in particular, a certain 'Squire Alexander, was frequently victimized by Dwight's special crowd of boys, because of his nearness to the old red district schoolhouse. More than one winter night Dwight and his companions made free to borrow the 'Squire's old "pung," and coasted down the very hill below his house. The very danger of the enterprise added to the fascination of the sport.

THE FUTURE PREACHER AS A PRACTICAL JOKER

Once when he was working in the hay field of a neighbor the farmer called out to him to bring him a jug of cider to drink from. He was sitting at the time on the unsteady seat of a farm wagon, in which he had driven out to the field to carry home the men. As he lifted the jug to his lips the mischievous boy threw a lump of earth at one of the horses; the horse reared high in the air and the shock sent the farmer reeling back on the wagon floor. He could not take the jug away from his mouth without losing the cider, to say nothing of drenching himself and the wagon, and the sight of his large, clumsy figure, unable for some moments to move, delighted the practical joker beyond measure.

MR. MOODY AT 17 YEARS OF AGE

His tricks were not always of so crude a nature. This one, for instance, shows a much keener sense of humor. One of the country winters had seemed longer and duller than usual, and young Dwight decided that it was about time for something to happen. He therefore wrote out an elaborate notice of a temperance lecture to be delivered by a well-known speaker on a certain evening in the schoolhouse, which served alike as academy and lyceum in those early days. On the evening announced a large crowd assembled in the building, which had been heated and lighted for the purpose, but no lecturer appeared. The excitement was great; discussions as to the possible accidents or other reasons for the non-appearance of the great man ran high, and Dwight Moody's voice arose loudest among the critics, and his explanations were among the most ingenious and plausible offered.

The same district school furnished the scene for yet another of his exploits—an academic one on this occasion. He was very like other boys of his age and temperament in his keen desire for the kind of notoriety that the successful practical joker always gains, and he found a great opportunity to gratify his passion for excitement of this kind in the closing exercises of the district school, an event socially as well as intellectually important in those days. On one of these occasions Dwight was to give a recitation—Mark Antony's oration over Cæsar—and he got permission from the teacher to make use of a large box, supposed to contain the ashes of the dead General. This bier was placed upon the teacher's desk, and as the young orator's eloquence arose to its highest pitch, he struck the box dramatically and knocked off the cover, when, to the amazement of the audience, there jumped out a frightened old tom-cat.

These pranks were by no means overlooked without punishment. Not only did the teacher administer the customary flogging, but Dwight's mother, who, as has been said before, was a firm believer in the maxim, "Spare the rod and spoil the child," never omitted the home discipline, evidently believing that a boy who had been so bad as to need a whipping at school could be none the worse for one at home. And certain it is that the jokes were dear enough to the boy's heart to make him quite willing to endure their consequences.

DWIGHT'S EXPERIENCE WITH THE NEW SCHOOLMARM

It was at about this time that the little school witnessed a revolution, none the less effective because peaceful. A new teacher appeared on the scene, and to the students her innovations seemed nothing short of extraordinary. To begin with, she opened the exercises with prayer, a custom which, strangely enough, had not as yet occurred to that early and surely pious community. To the surprise occasioned by this she added a yet more startling sensation by the announcement that henceforth the discipline of the school would dispense with whippings. This was an absolutely unheard-of condition of things, and the pupils, Dwight included, could hardly believe that she spoke seriously. Shortly after the new régime had begun he broke some trifling rule, and, having been commanded to stay after school, settled himself in his seat with the firm conviction that the regulation flogging was about to take place. But the teacher was as good as her word, and when they were alone together she began to talk kindly to the culprit, and among other things told him with a sincerity that did not fail to impress him deeply how sorry she was to have a disobedient pupil. Dwight had a susceptible nature, and this treatment was really far more painful to him than the accustomed whipping. Among other things she said to him:

"I have decided that if I cannot rule this school by love, I will not rule it at all. But I am perfectly decided to use no rattans so long as I teach. If you love me at all I am sure you will show it by helping me in the school, and this you can do in no better way than by keeping the rules of the school." This was altogether too much for Dwight, and what the rattan would never have done the sincere request accomplished easily.

"You won't ever have any more trouble with me," he said decidedly, "and if any boy does make trouble, I'll whack the first one." And he did whack him, a proceeding which surprised the teacher as much as it did the victim of the punishment.

VIEW OF THE CONNECTICUT RIVER VALLEY FROM THE MOODY HOUSE, EAST NORTHFIELD, MASS.

HIS BUSINESS INSTINCT SHOWS ITSELF

Among his other Yankee inheritances young Moody had the true love for a good trade. At a very early age he began to "swap," and that sentiment went for little with him at that early age is proved by the fact that he bought with a broken slate pencil his claim to the affection of a small girl of his acquaintance, winning her away thus cheaply from one of his youthful friends, a previous suitor, although a presumably satisfied seller.

He soon outgrew this childish stage of commerce, however, and started in at horse-trading. It was his highest ambition at one period to be considered peculiarly shrewd at this business, and at the early age of eight he justified his claim to that reputation. Once when his older brother, George, who took the place of a father to the children, was away from home, a band of gypsies came along with the usual number of horses in tow. Dwight became possessed of the inspiration that one could not possibly own an older, more decrepit horse than the animal at that time in the family, and so he proposed to trade to the gypsies. Before any one knew it he had struck the bargain and actually secured a better horse. His success inflated him with pride and he insisted upon his right to be the first to drive the new acquisition, a lanky, raw-boned, bobtailed beast. Harnessing him to a wagon and taking an empty barrel for a seat, he started gayly off to the mill to bring home the family supply of meal. But pride, in this case as in so many others, went before a fall; the new horse dashed down the hill, galloped around a corner and overturned the wagon and driver.

OFF TO BOSTON TO SEEK HIS FORTUNE

Like most of the country boys of his day, young Moody became dissatisfied with the farm life and longed to seek his fortune in some neighboring town. Having gotten employment in a printing establishment in Clinton, Massachusetts, he was given the simple task of addressing the wrappers of one of the local papers. The mailing-list, with its series of whole and half numbers, meant little to the country boy who had had little experience of crowded streets, and to whom a tenement was an unknown thing. He reasoned that the half numbers must have been an error, and sent all the papers thus addressed to the nearest whole number on the list, which mistake, having been traced to him, was the cause of his dismissal.

He went back to the country and set to work again as a farm hand. But the ambition thus aroused was not to be quieted, and he was, indeed, at an age when the awakening possibilities of his unusually rich nature began to demand eagerly their right to a wider field of action than that afforded by the little village. One day, while cutting and hauling logs on the mountain side with his brother, Edwin, he remarked: "I'm tired of this. I'm not going to stay here one day longer. I'm going to the city, and I'm going to stay there."

This was in the early spring of 1857. The family were greatly distressed at his sudden determination, for there is nothing to show that their prophet was in any greater honor with them than is customarily the case with prophets, and they could not believe there were any better chances in the city than in the country, which had been good enough for themselves. They assured him that the city was full of likely young men anxious for positions, and that he had absolutely no reason to suppose that he could get one. Moreover, at Northfield he would be reasonably sure of continuous employment on some one of the neighboring farms. But Moody was on tiptoe for a career, and he said good-by to his family and started off for Boston, determined, if necessary, to walk the hundred miles that lay between him and that city. On the way to the station he met his older brother, George, and told him he was on his way to Boston, and that he was going to make a living there at whatever occupation he could find. His brother saw that his mind was made up and gave him five dollars, just the price of his ticket. His condition was that of many young men of his day and since: he had come to a strange city with no money to live on while he was looking for work.

MR. MOODY'S MOTHER

GETTING A FOOTHOLD IN THE CITY

In the one direction which he could have had what our modern phrase so expressively translates a "pull," he injured himself by an exhibition of that stubborn pride that so often characterizes the country boy who does not understand how necessary it is to oil the wheels of business with civility and assiduity, nor how much the whole commercial organism depends upon mutual obligations. He had two uncles in the boot and shoe business in the city, and he read into their surprise at his appearance and the simple question as to how he expected to get a living there a greater coldness than was probably intended, so that what seemed to them a false pride and a stubborn spirit influenced them, doubtless, in the course they followed at this point, which was one of indifference, so far as any aid of their own was concerned.

On one occasion in Boston, long afterward, he described with great feeling that trying period.

"I remember how I walked up and down the street trying to get a situation, and I shall never forget how when they answered me roughly their treatment would chill my soul. But when some one would say, 'I feel for you; I would like to help you, but I can't; but never mind, you'll be all right soon!' I would go away happy and light-hearted. The sympathy of a man like that was balm to my soul; it did me good. It seemed then that there was a place for every one else in the world, but not for me. For about two days I had that awful feeling that nobody wanted me. I have never had it since and I never want it again.

"I knew that there was only one mail a day from Northfield, but I went two or three times a day to the post-office to see if there was a letter for me. I knew there couldn't be, but I went just the same. I was sick for home, and I had no employment, and so I went back and forth, thinking perhaps when the mail did come in that my letter had been mislaid. Finally I got one. I opened it happily, hoping for good news from home. It was from my youngest sister—the first letter that she had ever written to me in her life. The burden of her whole letter was that she had heard that there were pickpockets in Boston and warned me to look out for them. I thought when I had some money it would be time for me to look out for them."

Digitized by Google

GETTING A START IN THE SHOE BUSINESS

A week of this completely broke his spirit. He decided he would go to New York, since there seemed nothing for him to do in Boston. One of his uncles heard of his determination and suggested that he had better ask help from them. The boy was still stubborn. "If Uncle Samuel Holton wants me in his store," said he, "he can ask me. He knows how I want work." His other uncle suggested to him that a certain amount of humility was always accepted from the young, and that he must bend his head in this world if he expected favors. He added that if he would show a little less independence of spirit and a little more willingness to be guided by those who were older and wiser than himself, not only his Uncle Samuel, but everybody else would be more likely to help him. Dwight was not an unduly obstinate boy, and his good sense told him that there was much truth in his uncle's remarks. Accordingly he asked his Uncle Samuel for a position in his shop.

"Well, Dwight, I'm afraid you'll want to run this store yourself if you come into it," said Mr. Holton. "Now, that won't do at all—men who work for me have to do just as I say: not as they like. If you are willing to do the best you can, and do it just as I say, and if you will ask about things when you don't understand them, and if you will promise to go to church and Sunday-school, and if you won't do anything or go anywhere that you wouldn't want your mother to know about, we'll see. I'll give you till Monday to think it over."

"I don't want till Monday," Dwight answered promptly; "I'll promise now."

From this time on he became a regularly installed clerk in his uncle's store. He was fresh from the country, and naturally knew nothing of city ways and customs, but his native wit and quickness of thought were as welcome in Boston as they had been in Northfield, and he soon became known as one of the best salesmen in the shop. The originality and craving for excitement, so conspicuous in the little country urchin, were not lacking in the city clerk, and, not satisfied with the old methods of trade, he started out to improve upon them, actually going out on the streets to find customers when business was dull. At his own request his uncle sent him out on the road, and he is said to have been the pioneer traveling salesman in Boston. This is a very significant fact, for there can be no doubt that this early practice in addressing strangers and winning over to his own ideas men whom he had never seen in his life formed the very best practice for his later career as an evangelist. The amount of tact required in both these occupations differs more in degree than in kind, and the successful salesman's delight in persuading a man to purchase when he had not had the slightest intention of buying anything was only a forerunner of the joy of the great preacher whose fiery eloquence afterward moved untold numbers to take a step hitherto undreamed of—their voluntary and avowed promise to lead a Christian life.

AN ADVENTURE WITH THE TALL COBBLER

His increasing maturity did not lessen his love for a joke, and if his opportunities were fewer, we may be sure he did not let one slip. There was in his uncle's shop one tall cobbler who appealed especially to his fun-loving instincts, and whom he made a butt for his practical jokes. One day he made a great slit in the leather seat of the cobbler's box, and placed a basin of water underneath it. The weight of the cobbler bent down the seat so that the water arose over the leather. Three times he jumped up and three times sat down again without discovering what the matter was; the third time he tipped over the box, saw the water, guessed who had played the trick upon him, and, seizing a dangerous-looking knife, dashed out into the front of the store where young Moody was waiting upon some customers, whom he deserted rapidly, fleeing into the street to escape the enraged cobbler.

It will be remembered that Dwight had agreed when he entered his uncle's employment to attend church and Sunday-school, and so he began to attend regularly Mt. Vernon Church, of which Dr. Edward N. Kirk was then pastor. At the same time he joined the Sunday-school, and became a member of a young men's Bible-class under the direction of Mr. Edward Kimball. This class was a revelation to him, for, strange as it may seem, the Bible was far from being a familiar book to him, though he had always been brought up in the strictest Christian training; for the great family Bible was far too heavy and expensive for childish hands. His ignorance of it was shown when some reference was made in class to the Gospel of St. John. The boy began aimlessly searching in the Old Testament, and but for the tact and kindness of the teacher a disagreeable embarrassment might have spoiled his introduction to the class.

Editor's Note—This is the first of four papers dealing with the more important periods of Mr. Moody's life.

THE YOUNG BUSINESS MAN'S BIBLE STUDY

Ignorance on young Moody's part did not mean lack of interest or inability to learn, and, though realizing the disadvantage in his lack of familiarity with the Bible, he kept himself carefully from comment in the class at first, and set himself to learn all that he did not know. But his natural brightness and clear perception of the beautiful and striking in the sacred text led him occasionally to some original remark or some quick appreciation, which did not escape his teacher, and interested him rapidly in the young man. On one occasion Mr. Kimball was analyzing the character of Moses, dwelling upon his great executive ability, his self-control and statesmanship. To the Yankee boy, inclined by nature to summarize, quick at seeing character, it seemed only natural and fair to apply the concise and telling vocabulary he knew the best to any situation, and he burst out with the characteristic remark: "Say, Mr. Kimball, that man Moses must have been 'smart!'" For the New England lad there could be no higher praise.

His close attention in Bible study soon grew into a deep and loving interest in the Book of books, which increased steadily during his life. On the title page of a beautiful copy of the Bible, given fifty years later as a special token of affection to his oldest grandchild, he wrote this dedication:

> "The Bible for the last forty years has been the dearest thing on earth to me, and now I give a copy as my first gift to my first grandchild, Irene Moody, with a prayer that it may be a companion through life and guide her to those mansions that Christ has gone to prepare for those who love and serve Him on earth.
> "Dwight L. Moody."

With his early training Mr. Moody could hardly have failed to be religious, but he had never experienced the regenerating influence of God's Spirit by a definite acceptance of salvation. His faults he was conscious of: he had, for instance, a high temper, like so many men of strong will and great spirit, and he knew that it was his duty to restrain this, but he had not within him the power, not of himself, by which he could do this. Like so many others in his condition he did not need an ethical appreciation so much as a spiritual force to enable him to withstand those forces of evil which the intellect alone will hardly enable the man of strong passions to overcome. In the Mt. Vernon Sunday-school he grew to a fuller knowledge of salvation, and it needed only a closer bringing home of the point of view he was so rapidly learning, a definite presentation of God's claim on him, and the necessity for him to decide whether or not he would accept God's revealed means for overcoming sin, to bring him to a final decision. This interview Mr. Kimball has described in his own words:

MR. AND MRS. MOODY AND GRANDCHILDREN

MR. KIMBALL'S TALK WITH YOUNG MOODY

"I determined to speak to young Moody and started down to Holton's shoe store. When I was nearly there I began to wonder whether I ought to go in just then during business hours. I thought that possibly my mission might embarrass the boy, and that when I went away the other clerks might ask who I was and taunt him with my efforts in trying to make him a good boy. In the meantime I had passed the store, and on discovering this I determined to make a dash for it and have it over at once. I found Moody in the back part of the store wrapping up shoes, and I went up to him at once, and putting my hands on his shoulders, I made what I afterward felt was a very weak plea for Christ. I don't know just what words, nor could Mr. Moody tell. I simply told him of Christ's love for him, and of the love Christ wanted in return. That was all there was of it. It seemed that the young man was just ready for the light that broke upon him, and there, in the back part of that store in Boston, he gave himself and his life to God."

Moody's experience from then on was that of most Christians who have undergone what has just been described. With the definite acceptance of Christ his whole life changed. Joyful service under grace took the place of the mere acceptation of the law by intellect, and, among other things, the strict attendance at church, always more or less of a duty, became now one of his greatest pleasures. He describes it in his own felicitous way:

"Before my conversion I worked toward the Cross, but since then I have worked from the Cross; then I worked to be saved, now I work because I am saved."

MIXING RELIGION WITH BUSINESS

Immediately after Moody's conversion he had been confronted with the question that must come to many a business man: Would his new principles interfere with his financial success? The customers who, finding that they could trust his word with absolute reliance, preferred to deal with him rather than with any other clerk, convinced him that Christianity was rather a help than a hindrance to his business. His old originality and zest continued to effect the usual result: when he stood in the door of the shop and personally invited the passers-by to purchase, or at least to come in and look at his goods, his diligence seldom went unrewarded; and when the other clerks spent their holidays in pleasure excursions, his request to open the store and sell goods won him alike the respect of the firm and a good financial profit.

But his position did not seem likely to lead to any great advancement, for his uncle's ideas were conservative, and it is doubtful any way if he would have been long contented there. He had worked only two years in Boston, and already he had begun to feel the call to the wider opportunities that ever summon the man of power to come up higher. The young men of the Eastern States were flocking to Chicago, then the new city of the West, and Mr. Moody, interested, vital, eager for change and excitement, was not the last to respond to the fascinating call of the new life.

Mr. Sankey's Denial of His Death

SEVERAL years ago two gentlemen entered a train leaving Chicago, one with a ticket for New York and the other for a town in Ohio. The car being full, these two travelers shared the same seat. Soon they fell into conversation. The Ohio man spoke of the great work of Moody and Sankey.

"I regret," he said, "that I never had the opportunity of hearing Sankey sing before he died."

"Yes?" responded the other; "but how do you know that Sankey is dead?"

"I saw it in the papers."

"Then I suppose it must be true."

"Did you ever hear him sing?"

"Yes; a number of times."

"Then you must have heard Moody."

"Yes, I have heard Moody, too."

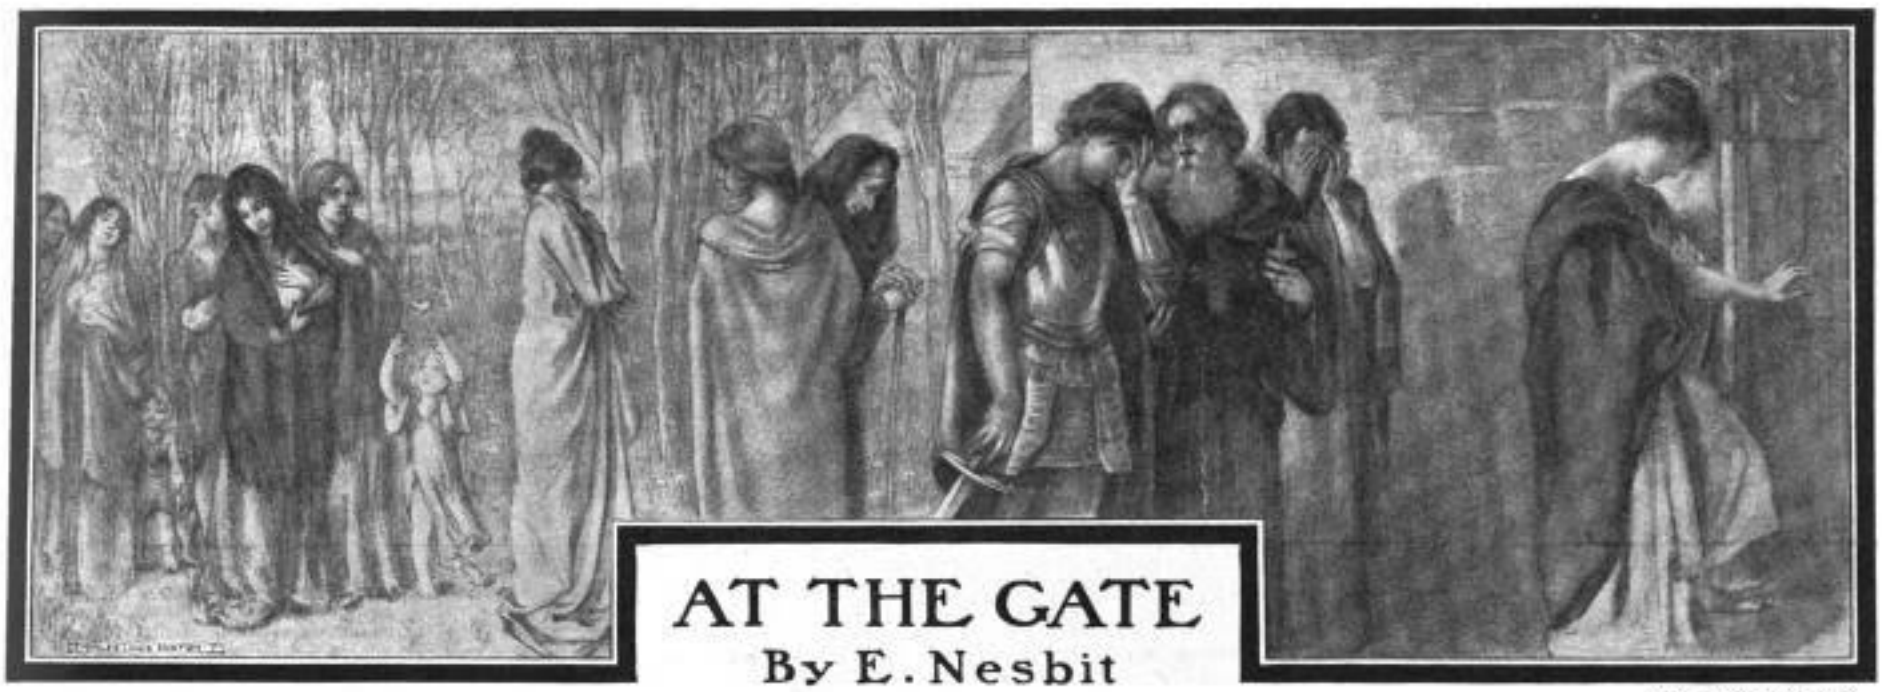
"Tell me—what sort of people are they, anyhow?"

"Well, sir, in my opinion, they are just common people like you and me, and nothing more."

"Do you really think so? Well, some day I may see Moody yet; but I shall never hear Sankey."

Just then the engine whistle blew, and the Ohio man began to get his baggage together.

"I think it would be hardly right," said the passenger bound for New York, "for me to let you go without first saying that I am one of the gentlemen whom we have been discussing. My name is Sankey."



Astonishment gave way in a moment to a merry twinkle of the eye. An index finger was forcefully leveled against the New Yorker's nose: "Now look here, young man, you can't come that kind of a game on me! Sankey is dead! Good-by!"

Some years ago Mr. Bliss, Mr. Sankey's intimate friend and collaborator of the Gospel Hymns, lost his life in a Western railroad wreck. In certain quarters the two names became confused in connection with the accident, and hence the rumor of Mr. Sankey's death.

Nearly all the world is familiar with the name of Ira D. Sankey as the colaborer of the late Dwight L. Moody, and in religious circles he is considered the singer of the nineteenth century. For nearly a dozen years he has been devoting his spare hours to writing up the interesting stories connected with many of his most popular hymns.

This book is not intended to be in any sense a life of Mr. Moody. On the day after the latter's death, Mr. Sankey was offered $10,000 to write what he knew of the great evangelist's career; but it was the wish of Mr. Moody that his biography be written by his eldest son. Accordingly Mr. Sankey will not consent to take any part in such a work, other than to render what aid he can to the younger Moody in the task left him as the chief legacy of his father.

AT THE GATE

By E. Nesbit

DRAWN BY CHARLES LOUIS HINTON

THE monastery towers, as pure and fair
As virgin vows, reached up white hands to Heaven;
The walls to guard the hidden heart of prayer
Were strong as sin, and white as sin forgiven.
And there came holy men, by world's woe driven;
And, all about, the gold-green meadows lay
Flower-decked, like children dear that keep May-holiday.

"Here," said the Abbot, "let us spend our days,
Days sweetened by the lilies of pure prayer,
Hung with white garlands of the rose of praise:
And — lest the world should enter with her snare,
Should enter and laugh and take us unaware
With her red rose, her purple and her gold —
Choose we a stranger's hand the porter's keys to hold."

They chose a beggar from the world outside
To keep their world-ward door for them, and he,
Filled with a humble and adoring pride,
Built up a wall of proud humility
Between the monastery's sanctity
And the poor, foolish, helpless folk who came
To ask for love and care — in the dear Saviour's name.

For when the poor crept to the guarded gate
To ask for succor; when the tired asked rest;
When weary souls, bereft and desolate,
Craved comfort; when the murmur of the oppressed
Surged round the grove where Prayer had made her nest,
The porter bade such take their griefs away
And at some other door their bane and burden lay.

"For this," he said, "is the white house of prayer
Where, day and night, the holy voices rise
Through the chill trouble of our earthly air
And enter at the gate of Paradise.
Trample no more our flower-fields in such wise,
Nor crave the alms of our deep-laden bough;
The prayers of holy men are alms enough, I trow."

So, seeing that no sick or sorrowing folk
Came ever to be healed or comforted,
The Abbot to his Brothers gladly spoke:
"God has accepted our poor prayers," he said:
"Over our land His answering smile is spread:
He has put forth His strong and loving hand,
And sorrow and sin and pain have ceased in all the land.

"So make we yet more rich our hymns of praise;
Warm we our prayers against our happy heart;
Since God hath taken the gift of all our days
To wake a spell that bids all wrong depart,
Has turned our praise to balm for the world's smart,
Unfilled of prayer and praise be every hour
Nor God transfigures praise and transmutes prayer to power."

So went the years: the flowers blossomed now
Untrampled by the dusty, weary feet;
Unbroken hung the green and golden bough,
For none came now to ask for fruit or meat —
For ghostly food, or common bread to eat;
And dreaming, praying, the monks were satisfied
Till, God remembering him, the beggar-porter died.

Then they had covered up the foolish head
And on the blind and loving heart heaped clay,
"Which of us, Brothers, now," the Abbot said,
"Will face the world — to keep the world away?"
But all their hearts were hard with prayer, and "Nay,"
They cried, "Ah, bid us not our prayers to leave,
Us — Father! not to-day — for this is Easter eve!"

And while they murmured, to their midst there came
A beggar, saying, "Brothers, peace be still!
I am your Brother, by Our Father's name,
And I will be your porter, if ye will,
Guarding your gate with what I have of skill."
So all they welcomed him and closed the door,
And gat them gladly back unto their prayers once more.

But lo! no sooner did the prayer arise,
A golden flame athwart the chapel dim,
Than came the porter, crying, "Haste, arise,
A sick old man waits you to tend on him;
And many wait — a knight whose wound gapes grim,
A red-stained man, with red sins to confess,
A white-faced mother who brings her child for you to bless."

The Brothers hastened to the gate, and there
With unaccustomed hand and voice they tried
To ease the body's pain, the spirit's care;
But, ere the task was done, the porter cried,
"Behold, the Lord sets your gate open wide,
For here be starving folk who must be fed,
And little ones that cry for love and daily bread!"

And with each slow-foot hour came ever a throng
Of piteous wanderers, sinful folk and sad;
And still the Brothers ministered, but long
The day seemed, with no prayer to make them glad.
No holy meditative joys they had,
No moment's brooding-place could poor prayer find
'Mid all those hearts to heal and all those wounds to bind.

And when the crowded sunlit day at last
Left the field lonely with its trampled flowers,
Into the chapel's peace the Brothers passed
To quell the memory of those hurrying hours.
"Our holy time," they said, "once more is ours!
Come, let us pay our debt of prayer and praise,
Forgetting in God's light the darkness of man's ways!"

But ere their voices reached the first psalm's end
They heard a new, strange rustling round their house.
Then came the porter: "Here comes many a friend
Pushing aside your budding orchard boughs.
Come, Brothers, justify your holy vows;
Here be God's patient, poor four-footed things;
Seek healing at God's well, whence lovingkindness springs."

Then cried the Abbot in a vexed amaze:
"Our brethren we must aid, if 'tis God's will,
But the wild creatures of the forest ways
Himself God heals with His Almighty skill.
And charity is good, and love — but still
God shall not look in vain for the white prayers
We send on silvery feet to climb the starry stairs."

"For, of all worthy things, prayer has most worth,
It rises like sweet incense up to Heaven,
And from God's hand falls back upon the earth,
Being of Heavenly bread the accepted leaven.
Through prayer is virtue saved and sin forgiven,
In prayer the impulse and the force are found
That bring, in purple and gold, the fruitful seasons round.

"For prayer comes down from Heaven in the sun
That giveth life and joy to all things made;
Prayer falls in rain to make broad rivers run,
And wake the seeds in earth's brown bosom laid;
By prayer the red-hung branch is earthward weighed;
By prayer the barn grows full, and full the fold,
For by man's prayer God works His wonders manifold!"

The porter bowed his head to the reproof,
But when the echo of the night's last prayer
Died in the mystery of the vaulted roof,
A whispered memory in the hallowed air,
The Abbot turned to find, still standing there,
The porter, and his face was still bowed down
As when it humbly bent before the Abbot's frown.

"Brother," the porter spoke, "I crave thy leave
To leave thee — for to-night I journey far —
But I have kept your gate this Easter eve,
And now your house to Heaven shines like a star
To show the Angels where God's children are;
And in this day your house has served God more
Than in the praise and prayer of all its days before.

"Yet I must leave you — though I fain would stay —
For there are other gates I go to keep
Of houses round whose walls, long day by day,
Shut out of hope and love, poor sinners weep;
Barred folds that keep out God's poor wandering sheep;
I must teach these that gates where God comes in Cannot be shut at all to pain or want or sin.

"The voice of Prayer is very soft and weak,
And Sorrow and Sin have voices very strong;
Prayer is not heard in Heaven when those twain speak;
The voice of Prayer faints in the voice of Wrong
By the just man endured — oh, Lord, how long! —
If ye would have your prayers in Heaven be heard
Look that Wrong clamor not with too intense a word!

"But when true love is shed on want and sin
Their cry is changed, and grows to such a voice
As clamors sweetly at Heaven to be let in —
Such sound as makes the saints in Heaven rejoice —
Pure gold of prayer, purged of the vain alloys
Of idleness — that is the sound most dear
Of all the earthly sounds God leans from Heaven to hear.

"Oh, Brother, I must leave thee, and for Me
The work is heavy and the burden great.
Thine be this charge I lay upon thee: See
That never again stands barred thy abbey gate:
Look that God's poor be not left desolate.
Ah, me! that chidden My shepherds needs must be
When My poor wandering sheep have so great need of Me!

"Brother, forgive thy Brother if He chide.
Thy Brother loves thee — and has loved. For see,
The nails are in My hands, and in My side
The spear-wound; and the thorns weigh heavily
Upon My brow. Brother, I died for thee —
For thee and for My sheep that are astray,
And rose to live for thee, and them, on Easter Day!"

"My Master and my Lord!" the Abbot cried.
But, where that Face had been, shone the new day.
Only, on the marble by the Abbot's side,
Where those dear Feet had stood, a lily lay —
A lily white for the white Easter Day.
He sought the gate — no sorrow clamored there,
And, not till then, he dared to sink his soul in prayer.

And from that day himself he kept the gate
Wide open; and the poor from far and wide,
The weary and wicked, and disconsolate,
Came there for succor and were not denied;
The sick were healed, the repentant sanctified.
And from their hearts go up more prayer and praise
Than ever the abbey knew in all its prayer-filled days.

And there the Heavenly vision comes no more,
Only, each Eastern morn, a lily sweet
Lies white and dewy on the chancel floor
Where once stood the belovèd wounded Feet;
And the old Abbot feels the nearing beat
Of wings that bring him leave at last to go
And meet his Master, where the immortal lilies grow.

Under Royal Patronage

By F. FranKfort Moore

ZE QUEEN shall be mate to know of it," cried Madame Schwellenberg in her shrillest tones. Her "rating" tones alternated between the extremes of shrillness and hoarseness. When she set about upbraiding Miss Fanny Burney, which she usually did twice before dinner and several times between teatime and the hour when Miss Burney was rung for to put the good Queen to bed, Madame Schwellenberg forgot all that she had ever learned regarding the delicacies of pronouncing the English language, and as Miss Burney faithfully recorded in those pages of her diary which have given immortality to the virago, interchanged her b's and p's, her d's and her t's, and compromised with every "th" on a simple "z." "Ze Queen shall be mate to know of your conduck, my fine latey, Mees Purney! Goot Himmel! One of Her Majesty's suite a goquette—a wicked goquette! Such a things have not been ever known since I gome hither! Have ze finker of scorn once ever been point to me as a goquette? Tell to me zat, matam!"

Miss Burney looked at the blazing face of the small, stout and stolid German, and laughed quite pleasantly. Little Miss Burney had a few years ago been accustomed to hear herself alluded to as a genius; but being a woman in spite of being a genius, she felt more flattered in being called a coquette than she had ever been when suffering under the other accusation.

"Madame Schwellenberg," said she, with the footprints of her laugh still on her face, "I do not think that your worst enemies, if you have any, would ever dare to say that you were a coquette. I beg of you not to suggest that I have been guilty of conduct unbefitting one of Her Majesty's ladies."

"Put I will suggest it, matam," shrieked the German. "I will suggest it at the top of my voice, so zat all ze world hears of it. I will zay zat ze young woman who entertains alone in a room in ze Balace an aide-de-camp is a wicket and heartiless goquette, and ze Queen shall be mate to know of it. 'Ole you tongue, matam; to not panty words mit me, matam."

"I will not bandy words with you, Madame Schwellenberg," said Fanny. "I will content myself by assuring you that if you say to the Queen that I was guilty of any coquettishness in regard to Colonel Willoughby you will say what is grossly untrue. But why should I take the trouble to tell you what you are well aware of yourself?"

"'Tis droo—droo, matam!" cried Madame Schwellenberg, craning her head forward until her face almost touched Fanny's. "I tell you again and again zat 'tis droo; and more zan zat——"

But what more the virago Schwellenberg meant to tell Miss Burney was never revealed to the latter, for the Queen's bell rang and Miss Burney ran to the looking-glass and straightened her hair, with provoking composure, before hurrying off to make Her Majesty's toilet for the night. The duty demanded the exercise of a certain delicacy of touch as well as some patience, but it did not call for a display of many of those gifts of imagination or description by which Miss Burney had been able to produce the most celebrated novel of her generation.

It was about this same novel, Evelina, that Colonel Willoughby had been talking to her when he had met her alone in the equerries' room at Windsor Palace a few hours before the Schwellenberg had begun rating her, and it was this that the Schwellenberg had made the excuse for her vehemence.

But in spite of the vulgar vehemence of the German dragon, Miss Burney, all the time she was confiding the Queen's curls to the guardianship of the Royal nightcap, was thinking with pleasure of the half-hour which Colonel Willoughby had passed with her in that room, before the equerries had assembled to drink tea and to eat cake. She had found him pleasanter than any of the equerries—nay, she had found him so pleasant that the thought of him prevented her, when she went to her own apartment, from having a single thought of the unpleasantness of the Schwellenberg.

She had met him at Oxford a short time before, and he had been very kind to her during a day of shocking neglect when she had been starved and wearied with the other ladies of the Royal entourage. At that time he had promised to call upon her, if she would allow him, at the Palace. She had given him the permission that he craved, and he had written to tell her that he would do himself the honor to visit her at a certain hour. She had no chance of letting him know that she preferred his calling when the equerries would be drinking tea—the time that he named was half an hour before tea-drinking—but as a matter of fact she preferred having him all to herself.

So he had come, with rigid punctuality, and now the first interval to herself that she had was filled up with the reflection that the half-hour which she had spent with him was the pleasantest time she had passed under the roof of Windsor Castle. She forgot all about the Schwellenberg's rage—all about the Schwellenberg's insolence—all about the Schwellenberg's threats; as Moses' rod swallowed up the rods of the wizards at Pharaoh's Court, so her thought of Colonel Willoughby's half-hour with her swallowed up remembrance of the rage of the witch who was in the habit of bullying her daily.

He had talked to her of her books—he had read them carefully—and his appreciation of them was quite as just as Doctor Johnson's, though he expressed it in phrases which were scarcely so well balanced, but which seemed to her to be quite as spontaneous as those which had been conceived in Fleet Street and matured on the way to Mrs. Thrale's at Streatham. No one at the Palace seemed to remember that she had written Evelina—no one except the Schwellenberg, and she remembered the fact only to reproach her with it. The feeling that generally prevailed at the Castle was, however, a kindly one to the effect that, although Miss Burney had written a book or two, she would, by leading an exemplary life as one of the Queen's dressers, eventually succeed in living down the reproach. But Colonel Willoughby had spoken with enthusiasm of her writing, and expressed the belief that the Queen herself must be very proud of having some one near her who was not only beautiful, but the most highly gifted of writers as well.

Oh, yes; he had not omitted to refer to her beauty, but Miss Burney, the writer of novels in which the emotions of young women were analyzed, believed that it was his reference to her talents that caused her to feel that the half-hour spent with him was the pleasantest she had known for a year.

"HAVE ZE FINKER OF SCORN ONCE EVER BEEN POINT TO ME AS A GOQUETTE? TELL TO ME ZAT, MATAM!"

She was unable to sleep for some hours, and when at last she fell into a doze she did not cease to dream of the sweet possibilities that had been suggested to her when lying awake. When she awoke in the morning she was conscious of a certain exhilaration that came with the thought that he would come to her again before the end of the week.

It was when she was in attendance upon the Queen before lunch that she was made aware of the fact that the Schwellenberg had carried out her threat. Her Majesty was grave and kindly. She told Fanny that she was very sorry to hear that she had so forgotten the etiquette of the Court as to receive a male visitor without permission.

"Your Majesty has surely been misinformed as to the facts of this matter," said Fanny boldly. "Colonel Willoughby only sat with me for half an hour in a room that is far from being a private apartment. As a matter of fact, General Gwyn came into the room twice while Colonel Willoughby was there with me; yes, and I do not doubt that Madame Schwellenberg had alternately her eye and her ear to the keyhole during the few minutes that the door was shut."

The Queen frowned and shook her head. The frowning of Her Majesty was regarded by the courtiers with something akin to horror, and her shaking of her head with real dismay.

Twenty-four hours earlier Miss Burney would have so regarded Her Majesty's expressions of displeasure, but then she had not heard the voice of Colonel Willoughby telling her that she was beautiful as well as a genius.

"I humbly ask Your Majesty's pardon if I have offended Your Majesty," she now said, folding her hands and casting down her eyes. "I was presumptuous enough to think that Your Majesty might care to know the truth. I promise you not to err again, madam."

"Madame Schwellenberg is an old and valued servant of mine, Miss Burney," said the Queen very gravely. "She is not new to her duties, and I expect that any suggestion made by her will be received with respect by the other ladies of the Court. You owe Madame Schwellenberg an apology for what you have just said about her."

"Does Your Majesty command me to make an apology to Madame Schwellenberg?" asked Fanny in as grave a voice as that of the Queen.

"I have already said that you owe her an apology," said the Queen. "I am not accustomed to be asked by one of my maids to be more explicit, Miss Burney."

"I implore Your Majesty's pardon," said Miss Burney, "and I promise Your Majesty to offer my humble apologies to the lady who slandered me to the Queen. I venture to ask Your Majesty for leave to withdraw."

The Queen gave her a nod of majestic coldness, and Miss Burney, after sinking in a curtsy, went backward to the door.

She hastened to her own room, but she was not able to hold back her tears until she had flung herself down on her bed. She fled along the corridor with her handkerchief to her eyes, and was soon sobbing on her pillow. She had never been so humiliated in all her life. She recalled the compliments which she had received from Johnson, from Edmund Burke, from Sir Joshua Reynolds, from every member of the literary circle at Streatham—she recalled the deference that had been paid to her by the innumerable distinguished persons who were accustomed to assemble at her father's house in St. Martin's Street, and, finally, she recalled the enthusiastic words that were spoken to her only the day before by Colonel Willoughby, and she wondered, weeping, if ever a woman of beauty and genius—those were his words—had been so badly treated, even by a Queen.

She felt that if she had been one of the most ordinary of Her Majesty's subjects she should be entitled to justice at least, but being one of the Queen's maids it seemed that she had no right even to protest against the Queen's assuming that what that insolent and vulgar wretch Madame Schwellenberg had said to her discredit was true.

But the Queen had not merely done this; she had in addition commanded her, Fanny Burney, to apologize to the woman who had slandered her. The reflection caused a fresh outburst of tears, but gradually her heart began to harden. She rose from her bed and dried her eyes and smoothed her hair. She would go to the Schwellenberg with scrupulous neatness; she would not give the horrid old woman the satisfaction of perceiving that she was ruffled by what the Queen had said.

"Madame Schwellenberg," she said on entering the room, "I am commanded by Her Majesty to offer you an apology for having endeavored to clear myself from the disgraceful slanders which you spoke against me."

"Goot," grunted the Schwellenberg. "You was a fool; put you are young and I forgif you, if you promise not to do it ever again once more."

"Her Majesty did not command me to make any promises," said Fanny. "But she told me that you would be able to keep me right on all points of Court etiquette, and that is why I now beg of you to have the goodness to let me know into whose hands I shall place the resignation of the post which I hold in Her Majesty's household. Shall I send it to the Queen direct or through the Comptroller of the Household?"

The Schwellenberg gazed at the girl who stood demurely before her. Her jaw fell. She was unable to speak for some moments, and when at last she made the attempt to do so the result was an undignified splutter.

"Your resignation—your—— Ach! You are a fool—an ungradeful young fool!" she managed to gasp after several false starts.

"I have been a fool too long, madam," said Fanny. "I have submitted too long to your whims and your tempers and your vulgarity, but I shall be a fool no longer. This Palace has been a prison to me, but I have yet to learn that in taking service with the Queen I forfeited my rights to that liberty which is enjoyed by all Her Gracious Majesty's subjects."

The Schwellenberg stared at her. The idea that any human being could look for anything higher than to be in the service of the Queen was new to her. If Miss Burney had declared herself to be a revolutionary agent, and had just announced her intention of murdering the whole Royal family, she would not have astonished the Schwellenberg more. But the Schwellenberg was not so astonished as to be unable to perceive that she herself would be blamed by the Queen as the primary cause of the disloyalty of Her Majesty's favorite maid. She knew that the Queen was sincerely attached to Miss Burney, and would regard her disappearance from the Court with the greatest regret.

The reflection was not pleasing to her.

Fanny made a curtsy and went to the door.

"To not go, Mees Purney," faltered Madame Schwellenberg. "Surely you will not go away for so schmall a zing. You will be sorry while you lif—dot is droo, pelieve me. Ach, no, you will zink petter of ze matter. You will stay?"

"I have already made up my mind, madam," said Fanny. "I love the Queen greatly; but I love liberty better, I love justice better, and I decline to submit to a tyranny such as a Muscovite would rail against. I shall hand in my resignation to-morrow."

She made another curtsy and left the room with dignity.

She felt elated at the discomfiture of her enemy; and when Colonel Willoughby came with his friend, General Gwyn, to drink tea that same night she greeted him in the presence of Madame Schwellenberg with the utmost cordiality. She had a sense of freedom such as she had never before experienced under the eye of the Schwellenberg dragon.

She found Colonel Willoughby more than responsive. He talked to her once again about the charm of her books, and asked General Gwyn if anything finer or fuller of ennobling sentiments than Evelina had ever been written in England. But General Gwyn, who had been a friend of Oliver Goldsmith, and who had recently married the beautiful Miss Horneck, only smiled and said that Evelina was indeed a work of genius.

Before he left the Palace Colonel Willoughby contrived to say a few words in Miss Burney's ear alone, and that was why Miss Burney's eyes were a good deal brighter than usual when she went to the Queen's room later in the night.

Before she slept she had written out her resignation of the office which she held as the Queen's dresser, and had sent it to the room of the Comptroller of the Household. She had frequently intended leaving the Palace, but a few words of kindness from the Queen had invariably prevented her from carrying out her intentions. Now, however, that the hour of her release was drawing nigh, she felt that she would be a poor creature indeed if, after being a prisoner for so long, she were to consent to remain in bondage simply because her jailer had become attached to her. In a month—she took it for granted that she had to give a month's notice—she would be free—free to receive the visits of Colonel Willoughby in her father's house in St. Martin's Street, off Leicester Fields. (That was really the sum of her aspirations after liberty.)

The next day she found Madame Schwellenberg in an amazingly good temper. She smiled with a vigor and a breadth that would have startled a stronger person than Miss Burney, and that would certainly have shocked any one who had not become acclimatized, so to speak, to the temperament of the Schwellenberg. She even went so far, in the exuberance of her good nature, as to offer Miss Burney a peppermint lozenge from her sweetmeat box. But Miss Burney declined the delicacy with dignity. She was not going to barter her principles for bonbons.

"You are never coing to leaf us, my tear," said Madame Schwellenberg, when Fanny was going out of the room.

"I decline to discuss my intentions with any of the household," replied Fanny with increased dignity.

The attitude of Madame Schwellenberg, when she had left the room, was quite free from any charge of dignity that might be brought against her. As a matter of fact, she both kicked the furniture and swore strongly in her native tongue at Miss Burney for an "impudent chit." And Miss Burney, having an elementary knowledge of human nature, came to the conclusion, on hearing the German compound oaths, their rough edges worn off through the distance of the corridor, that Madame Schwellenberg was somewhat annoyed, and that her annoyance was due to her failure to carry out the Royal decree that Miss Burney was to be conciliated. Fanny was convinced that such a decree had been issued to Madame Schwellenberg by the Queen, but she had no idea of submitting to be conciliated through the adventitious medium of a lozenge, however highly pepperminted.

In the evening she received a letter from Colonel Willoughby. On its being put into her hands she felt her heart sink; he was not coming that evening, so she would not see him. The reflection saddened her; but reading his letter caused her face to brighten once more, for its phrases fell little short of the direct avowal of a lover. They told her that the writer had passed a miserable day thinking that it was impossible for him to see her until the next evening, and assuring her that his only consolation consisted in counting the hours until he should be with her, though only for a few moments—"those few precious moments," said his letter, "are to my life what a few grains of sugar are to a dish of tea: they pervade it until every drop tastes of their sweetness."

Miss Burney, the writer of novels, felt that all her heroes were wooden things compared to a real lover. She had never created a lover capable of uttering so beautiful a sentiment. She read the letter once more before going to attend upon the Queen that night. She felt that she would need all the moral support of that letter to enable her to hold out against the Queen's pleading to her to withdraw her resignation.

BEFORE HE LEFT THE PALACE COLONEL WILLOUGHBY CONTRIVED TO SAY A FEW WORDS IN MISS BURNEY'S EAR ALONE

And she was right. Her Majesty condescended to tell her that she was very foolish to entertain so unworthy an aspiration as to hope for freedom, and to assure her that if she continued to serve Her Majesty her loyalty would have its reward. She commanded Miss Burney to believe that she was sincerely attached to her, and would even go so far as to grant her a week's holiday every second year so long as she remained a member of the Royal household.

Miss Burney knelt while she kissed the hand of her gracious mistress; but she did not withdraw her resignation. She only assured Her Majesty that she was deeply moved by Her Majesty's condescension.

In her own room she read (for a third time) Colonel Willoughby's beautiful letter, and the result of reading it was only to strengthen her resolution. She felt that though she might, on her own account, be inclined to withdraw her resignation, she owed it to her lover—she had already come to think of him as her lover—to gain her freedom before accepting his attentions. She had been assured by Madame Schwellenberg that it was contrary to every precedent of the etiquette of the Court for one of the Queen's entourage to accept the attentions even of an aide-de-camp, and she gave a hint of this in the letter which she wrote to Colonel Willoughby by the light of her candles before going to bed. It was rather a stiffer letter than she would have allowed one of her heroines to write in similar circumstances, but she could not omit stating in it that she had derived great pleasure from Colonel Willoughby's visits, and that, like him, she was counting the moments that must elapse until they should meet again.

She had the next day a good deal of the strange gladness of the maiden who has confessed her love, and this sensation caused her to bear up against the coldness in the Queen's attitude toward her and the more disagreeable cordiality of Madame Schwellenberg. It was plain that the Schwellenberg had hopes of inducing her by elaborate but quite artificial acts and words of cordiality to promise to withdraw her resignation. Fanny responded to her advances only with the most chilling politeness, and hastened to dress herself for her daily walk on the Slopes, carrying with her her letter—the first love letter; after all, it was not quite a love letter—which she had ever received.

She felt her cheeks becoming warmer as she read once again the sweet protestations which it contained, but they became much warmer when she raised her head and perceived that she was being watched by a young woman who was also walking on the Slopes. She hastily put away the letter, and the moment she did so the young woman approached her as if she wished to speak to her. She was a very good-looking girl, and she had the gait and the dress of a gentlewoman.

"Miss Burney, may I take the liberty of speaking a word or two to you?" she said with great nervousness.

"I have not the honor of your acquaintance, madam," said Miss Burney. "Still, what can you possibly have to say to me? I will listen to you."

"My name is Dorothy Leigh," said the girl. "I ventured to come hither because I fear—that is—I—I am afraid that—oh, Miss Burney, you will pardon my presumption, I know, when I tell you that I have promised to marry Colonel Willoughby."

Fanny did not give a start. Curiously enough, the only thought that she had at that moment was that it was marvelous how she could have been so foolish as to make one of the young women in a story which she had written fall to the ground in a swoon the moment she learned that the man who, she fancied, was her lover, was already married.

Fanny became very pale. She looked coldly at the young lady and, after a pause, asked in a chilling voice:

"Why have you come to tell me this, madam? Pray, how does your information, interesting though it be, concern me?"

"Ah, I thought—I feared," the girl began; she broke down, however, and burst out crying. Fanny, with dry eyes and a dry heart, watched her, but did not speak a word. After an interval of sobbing the girl was able to resume.

"Pray forgive me, madam," she said piteously. "I know that I have no right, only—ah, Miss Burney, you are clever; you know what an ambitious man is—you know that a man will stop at nothing in order to gratify his ambition; while we think only of love, men are absorbed by ambition. He heard from General Gwyn that you have the ear of the Queen—he has set his heart on becoming one of Her Majesty's equerries—he hoped to win you to plead for him, and I feared that perhaps you might think—that is, oh, it must have been a foolish thought of mine, only—oh, I cannot say anything more. I love him; he loves me—but, you will forgive me, Miss Burney?"

"There is nothing to forgive, my child," said Miss Burney. "When I see Colonel Willoughby—if I do see him again—I will congratulate him on having obtained the affections of so charming a young lady, and so I wish you good-day, Miss—Miss Dorothy Leigh."

"Dear Miss Burney," said the Queen that night, "you look very pale, and I dare swear that you have been weeping. Ah, let me hope that these signs, which I clearly perceive, mean that you are no longer obdurate. You will not forsake me. I like you better than you know. I would grant you anything you ask—a week's holiday—nay, I will make it ten days—and a new frock—a stiff taffeta—pink—you look well in pink."

She held out her hand, and Fanny fell on her knees as she kissed it.

"Madam, I do not want a holiday—I do not want a frock; but one favor I would beg of your Majesty," she cried. "I hope 'tis not too great a thing I ask."

"I am certain that it is not," said the Queen. "Pray tell me what it is."

"Colonel Willoughby—it is for him, madam," said Fanny, and the Queen frowned. "'Tis for him and—and another I plead to Your Gracious Majesty. He is in love with a sweet girl—her name is Miss Dorothy Leigh, and they will be happily married if only he finds sufficient favor with Your Majesty to give him the post of extra-equerry."

The Queen looked narrowly at the girl who stood before her with clasped hands. There was a long pause before she gave a laugh, saying:

"Heavens! What a fuss! I fancied you were going to tell me that—that—pshaw! I will give him the post to-morrow. Dear Miss Burney, I would make your respectable father, who is, I hear, a doctor of music, an equerry to-morrow, if only you would promise to stay with me."

Once again Miss Burney was on her knees, kissing the Queen's hand.

In another instant she was sobbing, with her own hands hiding her face.

THE MAKING OF A RAILROAD MAN

THE VIEWS OF THE PASSENGER CONDUCTOR

By J. H. Wicks, Assistant Superintendent Hudson River Division, N. Y. C. & H. R. R. R.

THERE has been a marked change in the character of railroad employees since I entered the service of the Hudson River Railroad—now the Hudson River Division of the New York Central Railroad—on February 23, 1867. This change has been for the better, decidedly. The class of men now seeking employment is more advanced in education and higher in intelligence, and the service is drawing to itself every year more men who seek in it careers with the same remuneration and chances for advancement that they might find in other walks of life. As an illustration, I put to work as a freight brakeman not long ago a young man who is the son of a clergyman and has a college education. He is not a black sheep, and he has not led a wild life. He goes into the operating branch of the railroad because he sees chances for advancement commensurate with his abilities. He has taken up railroading as a profession.

THE UPHILL HAUL TO PROMOTION

When I began my railroad work freight brakemen were, as a rule, hired by freight conductors. Whenever a conductor found himself short a man he was at liberty to pick up one wherever he pleased and to set him at work. The conductor was responsible for the train and could hire whom he pleased in his department. After he had picked out his man he sent his name to the Superintendent, and if his work suited, after a term of probation as an extra man, the newcomer was put on the pay-roll at forty dollars a month as a regular. He was subject to discharge, however, by or on the recommendation of the conductor.

His promotion also depended almost wholly on the voice of the conductor. But as I was only a boy, and had had no experience whatever, my uncle, who was a freight conductor, first obtained the sanction of the Superintendent before setting me at work. But, in spite of this unusual form of appointment, I was, like my fellows, entirely under the direction of the conductor, who held my future in his hands.

This rule of employment passed out of existence more than twenty years ago, and since that time the Superintendent or his assistants have had the sole appointing power of brakemen on this line, but the young brakeman must still do his work to the satisfaction of his conductor or he will find his time of service short.

It is easier now for a man to find work on a railroad than then, in every department, because there are more railroads and more work; but, in spite of this fact, the number of vacancies never catches up with the number of applications. I suppose I have five applications every day of the year for work. Of this number I do not hire more than one per cent. But so carefully are these selections made, not only by myself but by the other officers of the road, that out of one hundred men who go into the railroad service in the operating branch (I speak chiefly of the brakemen and conductors) ninety per cent. remain in the service, and most of them are promoted.

When I began my work, the path to advancement was undeviating, and the steps were arduous. It took years to reach a point now attained in as many months, but I am not sure that the old-time, all-round experience did not have a value that the present method of specialization may lack. The rule was to begin as a freight brakeman and then to go into the passenger service in a like capacity. After that the novice went back to the freight as a conductor, and finally was given a passenger train, beginning generally with a mixed freight and passenger, or the old-style immigrant train.

THE DANGERS AND HARDSHIPS OF THE OLD SCHOOL

This routine presented hardships that the railroad man of the present time knows nothing of save by hearsay; but it certainly broadened a man's experience, hardened his nerves and muscles, strengthened his resolution, and gave him a certain firmness and decision which only prolonged hard work, coupled with responsibility, can give.

For three months I was a freight brakeman, and learned to know what hard work was from the very start. In those days all the freight cars were provided with platforms through which the brake staff ran. On these platforms the brakeman stood, and all he could do was to handle two brakes. There were no air-brakes in those days. They were the old-fashioned hand-twisters, and it took strength to turn them. The brakeman rode outdoors on these platforms, no matter what the weather might be. In winter it was the worst. The brakeman was so heavily clothed, to keep from freezing, that he could hardly climb over the cars. Of course, for work of this kind only men who were physically strong could be employed, and therefore brakemen were of a hardier class than they are to-day. Then it was more a matter of muscle than of mind. It is different to-day. As a natural result, the beginners of that time did not have the ambition that the young railroad man has to-day. Few of them thought beyond the end of the month, and the most that the majority looked forward to was a freight conductor's berth.

To-day all this is changed, and for the better. Now a man makes an application through the Superintendent or his assistant for a place as brakeman in either the freight or the passenger service. As there are more vacancies in the former than in the latter, most applications are for the freight. The applicant must be twenty-one years old, according to law, and if he is over thirty he does not stand much show of getting work, unless he is an experienced hand. He fills out a blank, which is a rather comprehensive affair, and contains an examination of the essentials in train work. There are two hundred rules of the road, for instance, which the applicant must study, and he must pass an examination on them in his application paper. In addition, he must furnish references extending back at least five years. So it is plain to be seen that the Superintendent has something to base his judgment on when he gives a young man a chance. Preference in appointments is given to the sons of conductors and engineers of the road, everything else being equal, and young men are chosen from the towns along the line of the road where it is possible. This is done to secure men who will not leave the service of the road at the first opportunity and go elsewhere. Most well-regulated roads want to retain the men whom they have trained, and every precaution possible is taken to exclude men who have a roving disposition. Home ties are among the strongest to hold a man, and therefore we take men who are joined to us by neighborhood bonds whenever we can.

HINTS FOR THE YOUNG MAN WHO WOULD RISE

An applicant must be physically strong and healthy, and his habits must be of the best. He must not drink intoxicating liquor while either on or off duty. I discharged a man the other day who had been with the road for a number of years because he came into my office under the influence of liquor. He was not on duty at the time, but I figured that if he would drink at one time he might at another time, and we have no room for drinking men.

The applicant must write a fair hand and be a good speller. These two characteristics will give an excellent idea of his education, and these, together with his appearance and his references, decide his chances. After he has been accepted he is placed at work on the extra list. Let us say that he enters the freight service. He is first sent over the road with a certain conductor. He is not put regularly to work until this conductor reports that he is qualified.

The young brakeman who wants to rise in his business must start out with two things firmly fixed in his mind. These things are, first of all, a willingness to work and, secondly, a determination to do more than he is paid to do. Untiring industry and strict loyalty to a road always bring advancement when joined with intelligence, no matter how slim the chances may be at the commencement of a railroader's career. The brakeman, when on the extra list, is not obliged to report at the yards except when he is called, but he must keep the office constantly informed of his whereabouts. If he leaves his home he must leave his address, so that if he is sent for he can respond at once.

When he comes down to the yard he must attend to business from the start, and it is a business that bears close watching. No brakeman can expect advancement who does not qualify himself in every particular to merit it. The brakeman who is in the line of promotion is a man who takes nothing for granted; who sees that everything is attended to himself, no matter whether the other brakeman or the conductor has done so before him or not. And there are many things to be attended to.

First, the brakes must be in good working order; the car seals must be in proper shape; the car doors secured; the car numbers and seal records noted, and the equipment for the trip, which is kept in the caboose, and consists of lanterns, frogs, chains, waste, oil, torpedoes and tools and so on, must be complete. In addition, the coupling between the cars must be made, and car trucks and wheels carefully inspected for breaks. Before the train starts the conductor walks down one side of the track along the forty-five or more cars that make up the outfit, and takes note of the seals and numbers on his side. On the other side of the track a brakeman walks, calling out the numbers on his side, so that when the tour is ended a complete record of the cars and their condition is made. The remaining brakeman has plenty to do looking after the equipment, brakes, coupling and running gear. It is a good half hour's work, and upon the care with which it is done depends the safety of the train. This has been proven time and again in practical railroad work.

The conscientious brakeman sees after these details himself. He not only does the work that he is ordered to do by his conductor, but all the other work that falls to his hand. When the train stops for water or fuel the alert brakeman is out on the track examining the cars to see whether they have been tampered with or not.

KEEPING A LOOKOUT FOR THIEVES AND TRAMPS

In describing the routine of the work of the brakeman I am including that of the conductor, because they should act as one man. Upon the activity and alertness of the brakeman the success of the conductor largely depends. One of the chief dangers which confront a freight train is robbery, and that exists even in the East, where every mile of track is guarded by watch towers and policed by officers.

Sometimes it is tramps who break into cars while the train stops and loot the contents for food and clothing, and sometimes it is organized bands of robbers who seek entrance in the same manner, but solely for purposes of theft. It requires constant vigilance to prevent these depredations, and it is seldom that a train is safe without a watch.

These robberies seldom result in fights between the train hands and the marauders, because, where the forces are equal, the latter usually run away at the former's approach, and where the trainmen are outnumbered the best course is to telegraph to the next station for police assistance. But once in a while a fracas occurs, and then the brakeman who is not a coward has a chance to distinguish himself. As a rule, however, it is an unnecessary risk, for men who are prepared to rob a train are usually prepared to commit murder. The chief use for physical force is in putting tramps off trains. A determined stand on the part of trainmen generally serves to clear the train, but when this fails a few well-directed blows carry the point.

WATCHFULNESS IN ROUTINE AND RESOURCE IN EMERGENCY

After a short probation as an extra man, a deserving tyro is generally promoted to a regular place, and the next step is to the charge of the train. If the ambitious brakeman seeks to relieve his conductor of care and to look after all the details of the work for himself, he finds himself well equipped for the conductorship when that promotion comes. But here he must follow the lines already pursued. However capable his brakemen may be, he must use his own eyes and follow his own judgment in doing his work. In other words, he must never rely upon his assistant for anything that he should know or do himself.

In cutting off cars, for instance, at certain stations or sidings, he should see for himself that this is done. Some conductors allow their brakemen to look after this important detail for them, while they are busy elsewhere, but it is a bad rule. Some day a car will go to the wrong destination, and the result will be a call over the carpet before the Superintendent. This never happens when the conductor relies wholly upon himself.

Of course, in cases of accident, the conductor's nerve and ingenuity, his decision and courage, come into instant play. He should have his men out on the track or tracks flagging the approaching trains, or, in foggy weather, setting torpedoes or swinging the warning lanterns. He must look after his cars and see that their contents are not spoiled by fire or water, or stolen. In case of a breakdown he should be ready with his chains and tools to make quick repairs, or in case he cannot do so in time to clear the track for the next train, he must send word to the nearest telegraph office. These contingencies require quick decision and instantaneous action.

Freight brakemen on our road get $2.10 a day, whether they are extra men or regulars, and passenger brakemen get from forty-five to fifty-five dollars a month.

THE EVOLUTION OF A NEW TYPE: THE TRAINMAN

Having traced the work of the beginner from freight brakeman to freight conductor, I shall now take him into the passenger service. When I began, it was necessary for a man to go through all the branches of the service before getting a passenger train, but nowadays men often begin as passenger brakemen, become passenger conductors, and go even higher, without ever having had experience in the freight service. In the early days the passenger brakeman had very different work laid out for him than has the tidy, trimly uniformed young man of to-day. He was not only a brakeman in that he set the brakes at every station with his own hands, but he called out the names of the stations for the passengers, helped passengers to alight and to board trains, lighted the lamps, built the fires in the cars, swept out the cars and even cleaned the windows, and at certain intervals carried around the drinking water in a tin kettle. In those days he was brakeman, porter, cleaner, train boy, and everything else that the conductor didn't have time to be. Besides these manifold duties he had to preserve a smiling and courteous manner with the passengers.

With the modern improvements in train equipment many changes have taken place. The hand-brakes are never used now except when the air-brakes fail to work. The cars are lighted by gas, cleaned by porters and heated by steam. The brakeman is no longer a "brakeman," but bears the official title of "trainman." He has more time than ever to learn the business of the man directly ahead of him, which is the only sure way of promotion known.

THE REQUIREMENTS OF THE NEW SERVICE

His first duty, of course, is to see that the train is in proper shape, and to protect it from the rear in case of accident or stoppage. Under these circumstances his work is similar to that of the freight brakeman with his flags, lanterns and torpedoes. The passenger trainman, though, finds his scope in other directions very much larger than did his comrade. He now begins to deal directly with the public that pay his wages. In his present line of work he should cultivate a knowledge of human nature. His activity must be tempered by patience, and he must acquire good manners. The comfort of the passengers depends in a large measure upon their treatment by the conductor and his trainmen, and it is for passengers that passenger trains are run. This is one of the points that a go-ahead trainman never forgets.

Whereas once he was only responsible to his conductor, he now finds himself divided between his chief and the passengers he carries. He can serve both loyally and at the same time. Indeed, a trainman who does not serve both is either unfitted for his work or is unfortunate in his conductor. As a passenger trainman, the beginner lays the foundation for the experience which counts most in his promotion. That foundation is the experience of dealing with all kinds of people, and of dealing with them firmly, but gently, politely and fairly. There is no room on any first-class railroad for a grumpy, ill-mannered, bad-tempered trainman. The passengers do not like him and the management will not keep him. No pull is strong enough to save such a man from discharge.

THE ADVANCE FROM TRAINMAN TO CONDUCTOR

In course of time a trainman is advanced to the post of passenger conductor as a vacancy occurs and his fitness is demonstrated. Then he finds that every experience in his past life becomes valuable. Every bit of information gets in. He must now remember that he directly represents the railroad corporation to the public that patronizes it. His actions are official. When he puts a man off the train the New York Central Railroad Company is back of him, and when civil damages for that action are sought, it is against the railroad company and not himself that the suit is brought. In a like measure, when he serves his passengers well, does them favors within his power, preserves the peace between them, adjusts their differences, answers their questions and conserves their comfort, the praise belongs as much to him as to the company that hires him. The conductor is the chief of the train. He starts it, and it stops at his command. His orders are the only ones that are recognized by the crew, and all the responsibility, save that of the engineer in his cab, rests solely on his shoulders. He must run his train safely. He must get away from stations as quickly as possible. That is the only place the conductor can make time. The engineer makes it between stations. These cares, however, are minimized on all well-regulated roads where road tracks are sound and accidents are rare; but the care of looking after the passengers differs with every train that leaves a station as one man differs from another.

QUARRELSOME PASSENGERS AND TEETHING BABIES

There may be sickness on board the train and the conductor is called in consultation. He first canvasses his train for a doctor. Failing to find one, he telegraphs to the next station and stops his train for him. There may be a dispute between two or more passengers. The conductor then acts as peacemaker. This is a tactful task. The conductor must never lose control of his train or of his temper, and the lot of the peacemaker is seldom an easy one.

A man leaves a coat over a seat and goes into the smoker. When he returns he finds the seat taken. Then comes trouble. This should be adjusted with as little bad feeling as possible, and nothing must happen to disturb the peace of the other passengers.

Sometimes a man refuses to pay his fare. There is generally a reason for this. Possibly the man is mistaken as to his rights, or he may be under the influence of liquor. Of course, on the other hand, he may be a dead beat. Here the conductor should use judgment tempered by diplomacy. It is often better to carry a man through to his destination, even when he is wrong, than to use force and put him off the train.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE CHIVALROUS CONVICT

A conductor can have a fight on his train every day in the week just as he can on the street, but a good conductor seldom or never has trouble. There are times, however, when it cannot be avoided. I was once bringing down from Albany the night express. At Peekskill I took on a number of brickmakers, who got seats in the smoker. On the same car I had half a dozen convicts going from Auburn to Sing Sing, handcuffed together and to their keepers for safety. When I asked for tickets the first of the brickmakers refused to give one or pay fare either. His example was followed by the others. As I left the car I turned and told the men that when I came back after going through the train I should collect their fare or they would have to leave the train. Before I closed the door one of the brickmakers made for me with a knife. A convict saw him first, and, after calling a warning to me, he rose up and struck the fellow with his hands bound as they were by handcuffs.

The prison-keepers thereupon drew their revolvers and quieted the disturbance, while I continued my tour of the train. When I got back I found the brickmakers very peaceable, and they paid their fares without further trouble.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE FLIGHT OF THE LINEN DUSTER

On another occasion, while running the morning express out of New York, I took up all tickets after leaving Poughkeepsie. A big passenger, whose ticket I had taken, claimed that it was for Staatsburg. Now, I knew it was only for Hyde Park, one-half the distance. When I asked for his fare there was trouble. When I told him he would have to leave the train at Hyde Park or pay the extra fare there was still more trouble. In those days conductors wore linen dusters in the summer time, and after my final demand for his fare the passenger and I came together. When I got up I had lost my linen duster, but he got off at Hyde Park all the same. That was a case where I had to fight for self-protection, but with the exercise of discretion such cases generally can be avoided. I can count such disturbances in my years of experience on the fingers of one hand.

The pay of a passenger brakeman in the local service is from forty to forty-five dollars a month; in the through service to Buffalo, about sixty dollars a month. A passenger conductor receives $83.33 on the local service, $100 on the Albany run, and $132 for the run to Buffalo.

Such, in outline, are the experiences of a passenger conductor of to-day. If he attends strictly to his duty and makes himself popular with the officials of the road, his crew and the passengers, he is in the line of promotion.

FROM CONDUCTOR TO TRAINMASTER—ANOTHER STEP

In my case promotion came in the form of a trainmastership. The trainmaster equips trains on his division with their men. He looks after specials of all kinds, and is the immediate superior of the conductors. From trainmaster I became Assistant Superintendent of the same division on which I began as a brakeman.

In conclusion, let me say that the prospects for a man's success in the railroad business were never brighter than they are to-day. The pay was never better, the work steadier, nor promotion surer. The better education a beginner has the better are his chances. If I had my life to live over again I should take up the study of mechanical engineering. If a man wants to become an all-around railroad man, technical knowledge of that sort is almost indispensable. Though many men are advanced to high places from the general offices without possessing any practical experience, and though these men often make most admirable officers, still I find that the greater my responsibilities are the more value my practical experience is. It is impossible for anything to happen in the shape of an accident on my division that I cannot comprehend at a glance. Nine times out of ten I have had a like experience, or, if not, I have been able by foresight and caution to avoid it. In either case I can look at the occurrence from a practical view-point.

WHAT INDUSTRY, GOOD SENSE AND GOOD FAITH WILL WIN

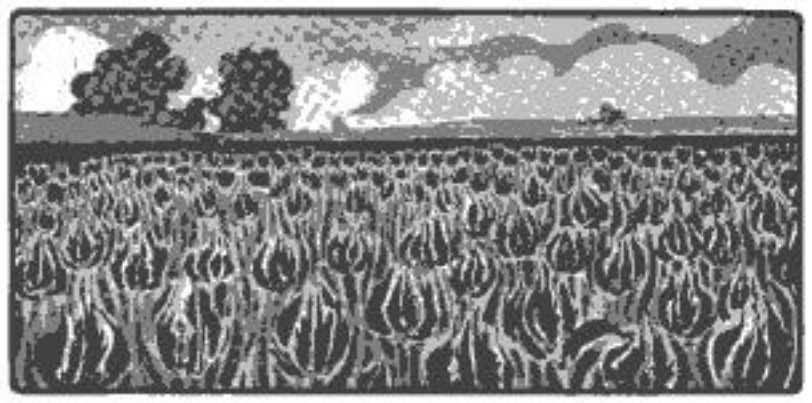
There is nothing in my modest career that any faithful, intelligent and willing beginner may not duplicate. My life has been one of honest, hard and plodding industry since I began as brakeman thirty-three years ago until to-day. As an extra hand I left my address at my home whenever I went out for business or for pleasure. As Assistant Superintendent to-day I never leave my office in the yards that I do not leave my address, so that I can be sent for in case of accident. During these thirty-three years I have never been out of daily touch with the road a single working day. The company has always known where to find me, and any young man who is willing to give that same kind of loyal service to his company, and who makes the best of every opportunity, and regards no duty too small to receive the whole of his attention, can hope for the same or even greater promotion.

The Field Fraternity

By Edwin Markham

WHEN God's dear justice is revealed—
The Kingdom that the Father planned—
His children all will equal stand
As flowers in the field.

There each one has a goodly space—
Each yeoman of the flowery race—
Each has a foothold on the Earth,
A place for business and for mirth.



No privilege bars a flower's access
To Earth's whole store of preciousness.
The flowers stand level on God's floor,
With equal nearness to His store.

And flowers, they have no private ends,
But stand together as close friends.
They send their beauty on all things,
An equal gift to clowns and kings.

They worry not: there is enough
Laid by for them of God's good stuff—
Enough for all, and so no fear
Sends boding on their blameless cheer.
This noble blessedness can be
In kingdoms of Equality.

So from the field comes curious news—
That each one takes what it can use—
Takes what its lifted cup can hold
Of skyey rain and beamy gold;
And all give back with pleasure high
Their riches to the sun and sky.

Yes, since the first star they have stood
A testament of Brotherhood.

Two Great Railroad Men in Russia

IN THE awakening throughout Russia some very remarkable men have come to the front. One of them has a history which reads like romance. He was born in 1859 and was of the peasant class. To-day he is in all respects next to the Czar himself in power; in many respects greater than the Czar. This young peasant had a position in the railway service. He gave his thought to the great problems of transportation which he saw would come up in the development of his country. The war with Bulgaria broke out and the getting of the troops to the front was the all-important problem. The usual official orders were issued. He was assistant station master and his chief was away. He disregarded the orders and he was at once scheduled for Siberia, but the investigation of his insubordination did not proceed very far before it broke upon his judges that his genius had saved the Czar's troops from destruction. The work was promptly recognized and he was made a director in the Imperial railway. Then step by step he became the Minister who has not only reformed Russia's finances so that they command the respect and the confidence of the world, but has made possible the vast schemes of railway construction which are one of the marvels of the closing century. The peasant boy's name was Sergius Witte. He is now the great M. de Witte, with the title of Count and the admiration of the world.

Even more important than the railroad development which M. de Witte has aided in Russia is his complete reform of the financial system of the country. With a revenue of considerably over a billion dollars a year, Russia was falling behind several millions annually with nothing specially to show for it. No better indication of the change could be found than the fact that American bankers recently loaned to the Russian Government the extraordinary sum of $25,000,000. This, though a fine sign of confidence, was at the same time a good stroke of business on the part of Americans, for as Russia is purchasing about a million dollars' worth of American manufactures every month, the money will, after all, be kept near home.

The working man of Russia's railway development is Prince Hilkoff, who took the regular course in practical railroading, and who traveled around the world studying all sides of the transportation question before becoming the practical head of Russia's railway system. And it is he who expects this year to make a trip around the world in forty days, going by way of the route he has built across Siberia.

These men are strong in experience, and they have brought a new element of strength to the power of Russia by rigid integrity in official work. Their examples will naturally be followed by many strong men in Russia, and the development will doubtless be followed by large results.

"PUBLICK OCCURRENCES" That are Making HISTORY

Big Things of the Century's End

Just about ten years ago a young woman went around the world in eighty days, and everybody who read newspapers was talking of her performance. Before the present year is over it will be possible to make the trip in forty days, and before the earth is very much older man will probably get around it within the limits of a month. The one tremendous maker of miracles has been transportation, and it is filling this very year with wonderful performances. On the ocean the whole tendency is toward bigness. The North German Line had scarcely finished the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, 13,800 tons and 27,000 horse power, before the White Star Line had the Oceanic, with 17,040 tons and 27,000 horse power, and now two other lines are building ships that will exceed both of these leviathans. Every shipyard in the world is busy. Newport News, which a generation ago was a cornfield, is now a centre of ceaseless activity, with 6000 men building fourteen vessels, some of which have a tonnage of nearly 12,000. There are nearly 4000 men at work on vessels in the Union Iron Works at San Francisco, and in the yards of the Cramps, at Philadelphia, 6000 men are busy. More than 100,000 skilled workmen are engaged at the different yards on the two coasts. In addition to all this, the Government has over 200,000 tons of warships either on the stocks or under contract.

To quicken our commerce, vast schemes are under way, the greatest of them being a canal across the Isthmus, which will save more than 10,000 miles in the trip from New York to San Francisco, and which will cost, according to one of the estimates, at least $125,000,000.

For land transportation the projects exceed everything in the history of the world. The longest tunnel on earth is now being built through the Alps to open a new route between north and south Europe. It will be twelve and two-fifths miles long, will be completed in five and one-half years, and will cost $14,000,000. In this country a great tunnel is to be built under New York at a cost of $35,000,000, for the local traffic of that crowded city.

The Great Railroad Through Africa

Every one understands that one of the certain results of the South African war will be a railroad and telegraph line down the backbone of Africa. A few days ago there arrived at Cape Town a man who had made the entire journey of 5500 miles from Cairo, and he reported that the route was practicable for a continuous line of road. From Cairo south there are now 1100 miles in operation. Then there is a break of 3000 miles. Thence to Cape Town 1400 miles are built, and would be in regular operation were it not for the temporary embarrassments caused by the war. The vast wealth which Africa will yield will easily pay for this great line, and it will not be too much to predict that within five years, or at the outside ten, there will be through trains from the metropolis of the Nile to the Cape of Good Hope.

The Wonderful Progress of Modern Russia

Few of us have the slightest idea of the astonishing growth of enterprise and industry which is going on throughout Russia. With characteristic promptness the Americans have recognized the opportunities, and are not only selling tens of millions of dollars' worth of material in that country, but are now planning to invest at least $15,000,000 of American capital in Russian manufactures.

You probably do not know that to-day at Moscow you may take a train that combines the elegance and the convenience of the best modern travel, so that in your trip through Siberia you could not only bathe in a porcelain tub, get all the reading matter you wanted from a complete library, dine sumptuously and sleep comfortably, but that you would have at your command a complete gymnasium where you might take exercise as the train sped along. To many of us the road has simply been a line across the map, but the news comes that it is almost completed and that it will not be very long before trains can run all the way to Vladivostock. Already there are under construction numerous branch lines. Russia has also plans and partial concessions that will take a line thousands of miles through Persia to the Persian Gulf.

Millions for New Railroads in Asia

In Asia there are already 30,000 miles of railroad, and it is a safe prophecy to say that within five years there will be over 50,000. European syndicates have now concessions for nearly 4000 miles in China; Japan is rapidly increasing its 3200 miles, and in the French possessions over 2000 miles are projected. Russia will add thousands more, including a very important line on the left shore of the River Volga, which will connect with the general system, and will be of the utmost importance to the commerce of Russia, Central Asia and Persia. Down in Asia Minor there is an interesting rivalry between several of the nations, but Germany is ahead. The German syndicate will build 2000 miles that will unite the Persian Gulf with Europe, thus giving Germany entrance into the chief markets of the East. Already the Germans control Constantinople and Smyrna. In India, Great Britain has something like 20,000 miles of railway, and thus the great work of opening and modernizing Asia with its hundreds of millions of people goes on.

Transportation Development in this Country

The development of transportation in this country is mostly along railroad lines. The Great Lakes, which almost equal ocean travel in the cheapness of a long haul, will always have an increasing commerce. The tendency there is the same as upon the ocean—big ships that can carry big cargoes. Senator McMillan, who got a large part of his wealth from lake transportation, predicts still greater things in the size and importance of its trade.

Navigation on the Missouri River, which, next to the Mississippi and the Amazon, is the greatest waterway in the world, has been practically abandoned. If any one had predicted this twenty years ago he would have been laughed at, but the railroads, by increasing the size of their trains, and reducing the cost of their operation, have come closer and closer to water rates, and thus what was a wonderful river commerce has been diverted to the land.

The New Cable to the Far East

A few weeks ago the United States Ship Nero, Lieutenant-Commander H. M. Hodges, reached San Francisco after several months of interesting work in the Pacific Ocean. It is perfectly well understood that we must have cable communication with our possessions in the East. Several years ago a practicable route for this cable was established between San Francisco and Honolulu. Rear-Admiral R. B. Bradford, Chief of the Bureau of Equipment, after a very careful study of the conditions, laid out a route from Honolulu by way of Guam to the Philippines, and also to Japan. His selection met with opposition from some of the cable authorities; but Commander Hodges, after a careful survey of the whole route, found that Rear-Admiral Bradford was right. The work was a peculiarly difficult one, and was brilliantly performed by Lieutenant-Commander Hodges, so that the whole result was most gratifying.

In the 240 days the ship was at sea she steamed over 30,000 miles. Here is an experience on one of the Midway Islands where there was no human life: "The number of sea birds on this island is infinite. Our visit was made during the nesting season, and on fully half the island the sand was literally covered with sea birds. It was quite impossible to cross it without stepping on the nesting birds and their eggs, unless precaution was taken to drive them away by means of a shrub branch. The noise of the retreating birds as they hovered overhead, screeching and darting threateningly, was deafening."

The bill in Congress to contract with the cable company which is to construct this line, provides that the cable shall be of American make, that the cable ships shall fly the American flag, and that the line to Honolulu shall be completed January 1, 1902, and the line to Manila and Japan by July 1, 1903. This will add largely to the cables of the world, of which there are now more than 170,000 miles.

To Connect the Three Americas

On December 4, 1890, a remarkable gathering took place in the State Department at Washington. It was composed of three of the leading railroad men of the United States, and representatives from Central and South American countries, including Brazil, Venezuela, Peru, Mexico and Colombia. Secretary Blaine called the gentlemen to order, and the Intercontinental Railway Commission began its official existence. Mr. A. J. Cassatt, now President of the Pennsylvania Railroad, was elected President. In a few months this commission had organized surveying parties to find out the feasibility of what was then called the Three Americas Railway. Three corps of engineers were sent to South America, and twice the Congress of the United States voted $65,000 for this country's portion of the cost of the work. Contributions of smaller sums were made by the other countries, and altogether something like $200,000 was spent. Nothing very definite came of the labors except a corroboration of the idea that the line is entirely practicable. The engineering difficulties are not so great as those which have been solved in railway construction in the United States, especially in Colorado. From New York to Buenos Ayres is 9000 miles, and to-day more than one-half of this distance is covered by railroads. Mexico has been pushing southward. The Argentine Republic has been pushing northward. Chili has a good railway system, and the time will undoubtedly come when there will be railway service all the way from Alaska to the southern part of South America. As in South Africa, the enormous natural wealth of South America will easily pay for the several thousand miles of line which will one day be built. The extreme cost of the whole work has been placed at $300,000,000.

MEN & WOMEN of the HOUR

Lord Strathcona's Canadian Regiment

Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal, the Canadian millionaire who is paying the entire expenses of a regiment to fight the Boers, is a brilliant example of a self-made man. All his great wealth has been acquired within the last thirty years. As Donald Smith he came to Canada when a boy and entered the service of the Hudson Bay Company. Until 1867 most of his life was spent on the bleak Labrador coast, collecting valuable furs from the numerous tribes of Indians scattered through that dreary region.

After the death of Sir George Simpson, Mr. Smith succeeded him as supreme head of the Hudson Bay Company, and from that time he came rapidly to the front. During the famous Riel rebellion of '67 he was deputed by the Government to try to settle the difficulties of the half-breeds. He was taken prisoner by Riel and held for some days, but, knowing the character of the rebels well and understanding their grievances, he was instrumental in settling the difficulties notwithstanding. Later, he sat in the Dominion Parliament for some years, and has always been most active where Canadian interests are concerned. He has given largely to charitable and educational objects.

With four or five others Mr. Smith purchased the St. Paul and Minneapolis Railway, a venture which resulted in a profit of many millions to those concerned. Mr. Smith also took a prominent part in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The year of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee he was created Baron Strathcona and Mount Royal, in recognition of his many services to the Empire.

In private life Lord Strathcona is a man of simple, almost ascetic habits, but he is fond of entertaining his friends in a truly princely manner. He is now President of the Bank of Montreal, one of the largest monetary institutions in the world, and is High Commissioner of Canada. He resides in London most of the year, though he has a splendid mansion in Montreal to which is attached a picture gallery containing one of the best collections in North America. He also has a Highland seat — "Glencoe" — in Perthshire, Scotland, where in his brief times of leisure he gathers about him a group of congenial friends. Yet even here he keeps in touch with the busy world and has a post office and telegraph at his very door.

Though over eighty years of age, Lord Strathcona works very hard. In appearance he is tall, thin and wiry, and has an essentially Scottish face. His keen, deep-sunk eyes, still having the fire of youth, contrast with his snow-white hair and beard.

The regiment Lord Strathcona has equipped is known as "Strathcona's Horse." It is fitted out and maintained entirely at his expense; the first cost is estimated at over half a million. The men are skilled riders and are chiefly taken from the ranchers and cowboys of the Northwest.

How Lieutenant Peary Retrieved Wild Ducks

Lieutenant R. E. Peary, the Arctic explorer, is a native of Maine. He prepared himself for entering Bowdoin College at Fryeburg Academy, in Fryeburg, in the western part of the State. The following story of Peary's early days shows his method of overcoming obstacles:

One of his fellow-townsmen, while out hunting one day in November, discovered a flock of ducks in a pond about two miles from the village. The man wanted the birds, but knew no way of getting them, even if his shot were effective, for he had no dog, and there was no boat in the pond. On his way home he met Peary and told him about the ducks and why he had not fired at them.

"Now," said Peary, "let's go back to the pond, and if the ducks are still there I promise to retrieve all you kill."

They returned to the pond; the ducks were undisturbed. The weather had been cold for several days, ice had formed around the shore of the pond, and the ducks were bunched out in open water, but within range. Merrill fired and killed two. Without more ado than if he were about to take a dip in the old swimming-hole on a hot July day, Peary removed his clothing, broke the ice with a heavy stick and swam out, picked up the dead birds and brought them to land.

Private Epps and His Seventeen Prisoners

Private Epps, of the Thirty-third Volunteer Infantry, Company B, is to have a medal of honor, and thereby hangs the tale of one of the most remarkable of recent incidents in the Philippines.

It was in the great fight at Vigan — the fight in which the gallant Thirty-third was led by Colonel "Jim" Parker. Out there this battle is on record as one of the hardest-fought engagements of the war. The Tagals, in considerable force, had sought shelter in houses and in all sorts of odd places whence a rifle could be fired at the detested Americanos. It was Colonel Parker's business to clear them out, and the job was a hot one while it lasted.

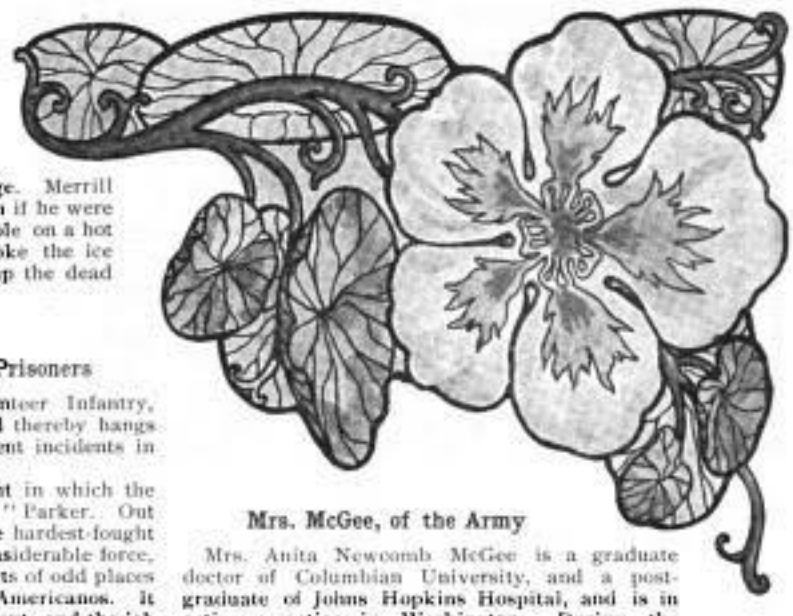
The Thirty-third Infantry is composed chiefly of Texans — rough and tough frontiersmen — every one of them a practiced marksman. What with their appetite for fighting and their shooting ability, they are probably the most formidable regiment in the army. Private Epps is merely a sample.

On the occasion of this big fight Private Epps suspected that a certain house might shelter some insurgents, so he went to investigate it. The dwelling was in the middle of an enclosure surrounded by a stone wall. He jumped upon the wall, which was about five feet high, and, looking down, saw no fewer than seventeen Filipinos crouching with rifles ready.

Without a moment's hesitation he called upon them to surrender. Five minutes later when Colonel "Jim" came up, he found them disarmed and under guard by Private Epps, their guns conveniently stacked.

When Private Epps was summoned later to headquarters and formally complimented for his achievement, he seemed surprised, and remarked that he couldn't see anything especially notable in his performance.

"Why," said he, "what could they do but surrender? I had the dead drop on them."



Nevertheless, Private Epps is to have a medal of honor.

Miss Cutter's Ubiquitous Friend

A curious case of mistaken identity took place not long ago, in which Miss Ruby Cutter, a church choir soprano and concert soloist, was the chief actor. She and a friend, also a soprano, were engaged to sing for a church charity the same evening, the latter in Jersey City and Miss Cutter in Brooklyn. They selected about the same repertoire. After supper they took cabs.

When Miss Cutter alighted in the darkness she found, to her dismay, that she was in Jersey City and that in all probability her friend was at her church in Brooklyn. Evidently there had been a mixup in cabs. There was no time to undo the mistake, however, and Miss Cutter went forward, and, without explaining anything, took her friend's place and sang her numbers on the program.

The other singer, on the other hand, was more careful. She told the committee of the mistake but, like Miss Cutter, also filled the bill, but she did it in her own name. The next morning the papers had Miss Cutter's friend singing with great applause in both cities at the same hour.

Mrs. McGee, of the Army

Mrs. Anita Newcomb McGee is a graduate doctor of Columbian University, and a post-graduate of Johns Hopkins Hospital, and is in active practice in Washington. During the war with Spain she offered her services, and on August 29, 1898, was appointed Acting Assistant Surgeon, United States Army. She was stationed in the Surgeon-General's office in charge of nurses. Mr. McGee is the ethnologist in charge of the Bureau of American Ethnology, and is an author of some of the important scientific books of this country. Mrs. McGee spent three years in Europe, during which time she studied in Cambridge, England, and at the University of Geneva. She is one of the most active of American women, being a Fellow and ex-Secretary of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and one of the Vice-Presidents-General of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

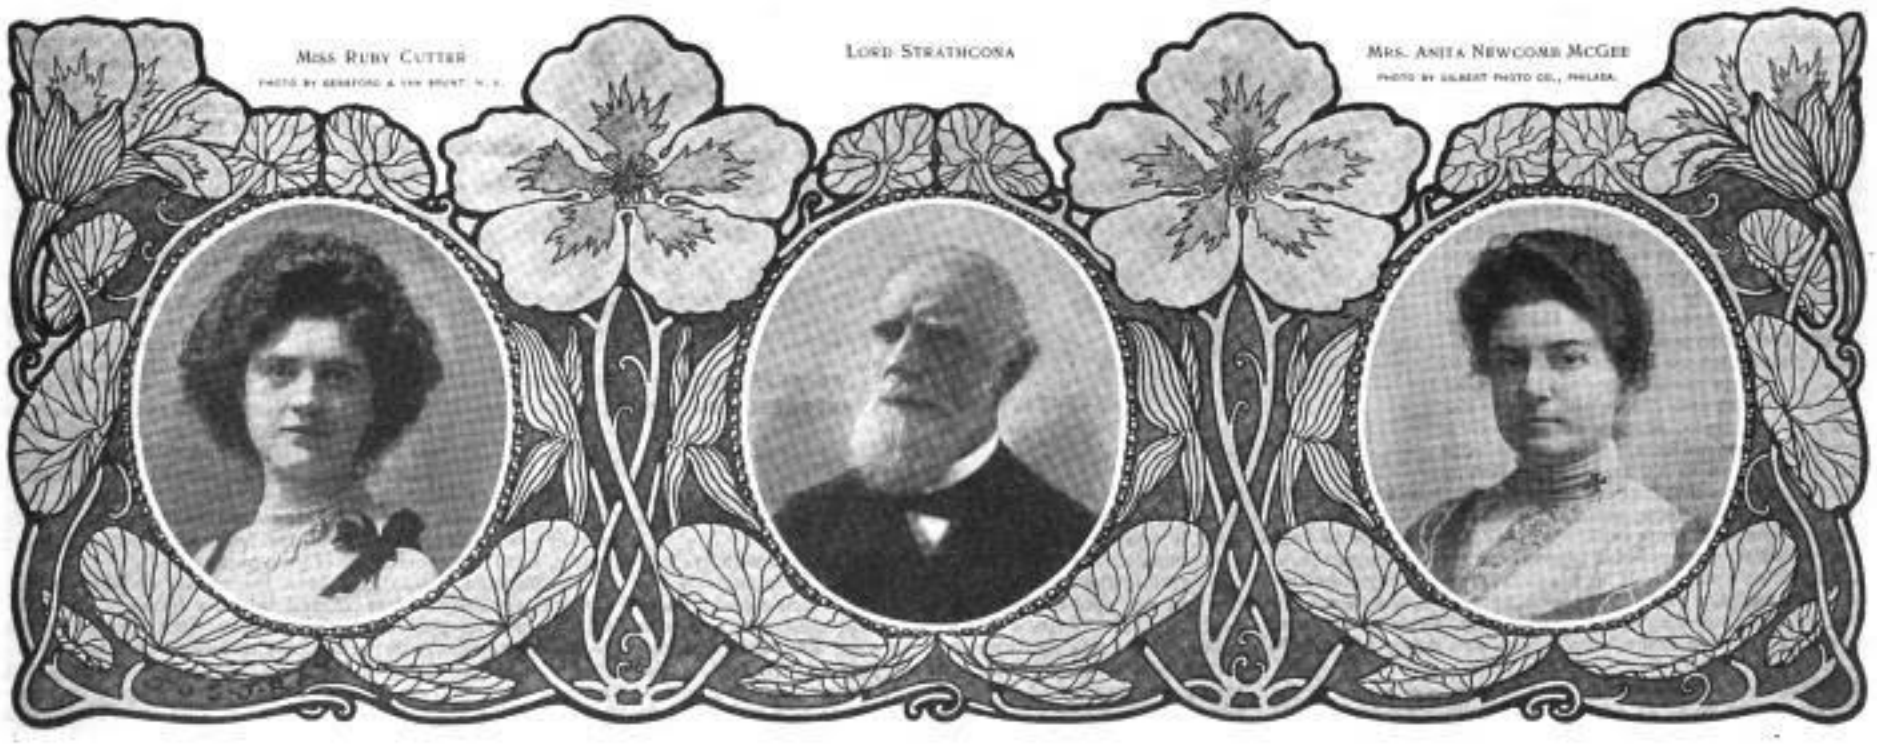
The Kangaroo with the Feathered Tail

Robert Frank, the well-known artist, is a self-made man, and not until he had become self-supporting did he have a chance to pursue the regular studies which most people have in earlier life. When he began drawing for a living, his workmanship was so excellent that he had no trouble in securing orders. One day he delivered some sketches to an employer who said, "By the by, Frank, I want a picture drawn in a great hurry. It is a novel thing, a boxing kangaroo."

"Ja, wohl," answered the artist, "I will have it ready to-morrow for you."

"You know what a kangaroo is, of course?"

Frank must have been thinking of an ostrich, because he answered with a complacent smile:



"Ja, gewisslich. It is a long, tall thing mit lots of feddars." And "Feddars" has been his nickname ever since.

A Well-Merited Retort

Ex-Assistant United States District Attorney Sutherland Tenney, of New York, was graduated from the Columbia Law School in 1875, when he carried off the first prize of five hundred dollars. A disappointed competitor congratulated him, and added:

"I suppose it was because your thesis was illegible, as usual, and the judges gave you the benefit of the doubt."

Mr. Tenney, unruffled, replied: "How much better you would do if you adopted that practice in all your work."

The three men—George, Harris and the author—are touring Germany awheel. A tandem and a safety are the mounts.

Back to Ethelbertha

ANYBODY could rule this country," said George; "I could rule it."

We were seated in the garden of the Kaiser Hof, at Bonn, looking down upon the Rhine. It was the last evening of our trip; the early morning train would be the beginning of the end.

"I should write down on a piece of paper all I wanted the people to do," continued George, "get a good firm to print off so many copies, have them posted about the towns and villages, and the thing would be done."

In the placid, docile German of to-day, whose only ambition appears to be to pay his taxes, and do what he is told to do by those whom it has pleased Providence to place in authority over him, it is difficult, one must confess, to detect any trace of his wild ancestor to whom individual liberty was as the breath of his nostrils; who appointed his magistrates to advise but retained the right of execution for the tribe; who followed his chief, but would have scorned to obey him.

In Germany to-day one hears a good deal concerning Socialism; but it is a Socialism that would only be Despotism under another name. Individualism makes no appeal to the German voter. He is willing, nay, anxious, to be controlled and regulated in all things. He disputes, not government, but the form of it. The policeman is to him a religion, and one feels will always remain so. In England we regard our man in blue as a harmless necessity. By the average citizen he is employed chiefly as a sign-post, though in busy quarters of the town he is considered useful for taking old ladies across the road. Beyond feeling thankful to him for these services, I doubt if we take much thought of him. In Germany, on the other hand, he is worshiped as a little god, and loved as a guardian angel. To the German child he is a combination of Santa Claus and the Bogie Man. All good things come from him: holidays, Spielplatze to play in, furnished with swings and giant strides, sand heaps to fight around, swimming baths, and fairs. All misbehavior is punished by him. It is the hope and aim of every well-meaning German boy and girl to please the police. To be smiled at by a policeman makes it conceited. A German child that has been patted on the head by a policeman is not fit to live with; its self-importance is unbearable.

The German citizen is a soldier, and the policeman is his officer. The policeman directs him where in the street to walk, and how fast to walk. At the end of each bridge stands a policeman to tell the German how to cross it. Were there no policeman there he would probably sit down and wait till the river had passed by. At the railway station, the policeman locks him up in the waiting-room, where he can do no harm to himself. When the proper time arrives he fetches him out and hands him over to the guard of the train, who is only a policeman in another uniform. The guard tells him where to sit in the train, and when to get out, and sees that he does get out. In Germany you take no responsibility upon yourself whatever. Everything is done for you, and done well. You are not supposed to look after yourself; you are not blamed for being incapable of looking after yourself; it is the duty of the German policeman to look after you. That you may be a helpless idiot does not excuse him should anything happen to you. Wherever you are and whatever you are doing you are in his charge, and he takes care of you—good care of you; there is no denying this.

If you lose yourself, he finds you; and if you lose anything belonging to you, he recovers it for you. If you don't know what you want, he tells you. If you want anything that is good for you to have, he gets it for you. Private lawyers are not needed in Germany. If you want to buy or sell a house the State makes out the conveyance. If you have been swindled, the State takes up the case for you. The State marries you, insures you, will even gamble with you for a trifle.

"You get yourself born," says the German Government to the German citizen; "we do the rest. Indoors and out of doors, in sickness and in health, in pleasure and in work, we will tell you what to do, and we will see to it that you do it. Don't you worry yourself about anything."

And the German doesn't. Where there is no policeman to be found he wanders about till he comes to a police notice posted on a wall. This he reads; then he goes and does what it says.

I remember in one German town—I forget which; it is immaterial; the incident could have happened in any—noticing an open gate leading to a garden in which a concert was being given. There was nothing to prevent any one who chose from walking through that gate and thus gaining admittance to the concert without paying. In fact, of the two gates, quarter of a mile apart, it was the more convenient. Yet of the crowds that passed not one attempted to enter by that gate. They plodded steadily on under a blazing sun to the other gate, at which a man stood to collect the entrance money. I have seen German youngsters stand longingly by the margin of a lonely sheet of ice. They could have skated on that ice for hours and nobody have been the wiser. The crowd and the police were at the other end, more than half a mile away, and around the corner. Nothing stopped their going on but the knowledge that they ought not. Things such as these make one pause to wonder seriously whether the Teuton be a member of the sinful human family or not. Is it not possible that these placid, gentle folk may in reality be angels, come down to earth?

In Germany the country roads are lined with fruit trees. There is no voice to stay man or boy from picking and eating the fruit, except conscience. In England such a state of things would cause public indignation. Children would die of cholera by the hundred. The medical profession would be worked off its legs trying to cope with the natural results of over-indulgence in sour apples and unripe walnuts. Public opinion would demand that these fruit trees should be fenced about, and thus rendered harmless. Fruit growers, to save themselves the expense of walls and palings, would not be allowed in this manner to spread sickness and death throughout the community.

But in Germany a boy will walk for miles down a lonely road hedged with fruit trees to buy a pennyworth of pears in the village at the other end. To pass these unprotected trees, drooping under their burden of ripe fruit, strikes the Anglo-Saxon mind as a wicked waste of opportunity, a flouting of the blessed gifts of Providence.

I do not know if it be so, but from what I have observed of the German character I should not be surprised to hear that when a man in Germany is condemned to death he is given a piece of rope and told to go and hang himself. It would save the State much trouble and expense, and I can see that German criminal taking that piece of rope home with him, reading up carefully the police instructions, and proceeding to carry them out in his own back kitchen.

The Germans are a good people, on the whole—the best people, perhaps, morally speaking, in the world: an amiable, unselfish, kindly people. I am positive that the vast majority of them go to Heaven. Indeed, comparing them with the other Christian nations of the earth, one is forced to the conclusion that Heaven will be chiefly of German manufacture. But I cannot understand how they get there. That the soul of any single individual German has sufficient initiative to fly up by itself and knock at St. Peter's door I cannot believe. My own opinion is that they are taken there in small companies, and passed in under the charge of a dead policeman.

Carlyle said of the Prussians (and it is true of the whole German nation) that one of their chief virtues was their power of being drilled. Of the Germans you might say they are a people who will go anywhere, and do anything, they are told. Drill a German for the work and send him out to Africa or Asia under charge of somebody in uniform, and he is bound to make an excellent colonist, facing difficulties as he would face the devil himself, if ordered. But it is hard to conceive of him as a pioneer. Left to run himself, one feels he would soon fade away and die, not from any lack of intelligence, but from sheer want of presumption.

The German has so long been the soldier of Europe that the military instinct has entered into his blood. The military virtues he possesses in abundance. But he also suffers from the drawbacks of the military training. It was told me of a German servant, lately released from the barracks, that he was instructed by his master to deliver a letter to a certain house, and to wait there for the answer. The hours passed by and the man did not return. His master, anxious and surprised, followed. He found the man where he had been sent, answer in hand. He was waiting for further orders. The story sounds exaggerated, but I can credit it.

The curious thing is that the same man, who as an individual is as helpless as a child, becomes, the moment he puts on a uniform, an intelligent being, capable of responsibility and initiative. The German can rule others and be ruled by others, but he cannot rule himself. The cure would appear to be to train every German for an officer and then put him under himself. It is certain he would order himself about with discretion and judgment, and see to it that he himself obeyed himself with smartness and precision.

—he is worshiped as a little god, and loved as a guardian angel

For the direction of German character into these channels, the schools, of course, are chiefly responsible. Their everlasting teaching is Duty. It is a fine ideal for any people; but before buckling to it one would wish to have a clear understanding as to what this Duty is. The German idea of it would appear to be, "Blind obedience to everything in buttons." It is the antithesis of the Anglo-Saxon scheme, but as both the Anglo-Saxon and Teuton are prospering, there must be good in both methods. Hitherto the German has had the good fortune to be exceptionally well governed; if this continue, it will go well with him. When his troubles will begin will be when by any chance something goes wrong with the governing machine. But maybe his method has the advantage of producing a continuous supply of good governors; it would certainly seem so.

As a trader, I am inclined to think the German will, unless his temperament considerably change, remain always a long way behind his Anglo-Saxon competitor, and this by reason of his virtues. To him life is something more important than a mere race for wealth. A country that closes its banks and post-offices for two hours in the middle of the day while it goes home and enjoys a comfortable meal in the bosom of its family, with perhaps forty winks by way of dessert, cannot hope, and possibly has no wish, to compete with a people that takes its meals standing and sleeps with a telephone over its bed. In Germany there is not—at all events, as yet—sufficient distinction between the classes to make the struggle for position the life-and-death affair it is in England and America. Beyond the landed aristocracy, whose boundaries are impregnable, grade hardly counts. Frau Professor and Frau Candlestick-maker meet at the weekly Kaffee-Klatsch and exchange scandal on terms of mutual equality. The Wirtschaft-keeper and the doctor hobnob together. The wealthy master-builder, when he prepares his roomy wagon for an excursion into the country, invites his foreman and his tailor to join him with their families. Each brings his share of drink and provisions, and returning home they sing in chorus the same songs.

So long as this state of things endures a man is not induced to sacrifice the best years of his life to win a fortune for his dotage. His tastes—and more to the point still, his wife's—remain inexpensive. He likes to see his flat or villa furnished with much red plush upholstery and a profusion of gilt and lacquer. But that is his idea, and maybe it is in no worse taste than is a mixture of bastard Elizabethan with imitation Louis XV, the whole lit by electric light and smothered with photographs. Possibly he will have his outer walls painted by the local artist: a sanguinary battle, a good deal interfered with by the front door, taking place below, while Bismarck, as an angel, flutters vaguely about the bedroom windows. But for his Old Masters he is quite content to go to the public galleries; and, "the Celebrity at Home" not having as yet taken its place amongst the institutions of the Fatherland, he is not impelled to waste his money turning his house into an old curiosity shop.

The German is a gourmand. There are still English farmers who, while telling you that farming spells starvation, enjoy their seven solid meals a day. Once a year there comes a week's feast throughout Russia, during which many deaths occur from the overeating of pancakes; but this is a religious festival, and an exception. Taking him all around, the German as a trencherman stands preëminent among the nations of the earth. He rises early, and while dressing tosses off a few cups of coffee, together with half a dozen hot buttered rolls. But it is not until ten o'clock that he sits down to anything that can properly be called a meal. At one or half-past takes place his chief dinner. Of this he makes a business, remaining at it for a couple of hours. At four o'clock he goes to the café, eats cakes and drinks chocolate. After that he touches nothing for at least three hours. The evening he devotes to eating generally; not a set meal, or rarely, but a series of snacks; a bottle of beer and a Belegete-semmel or two at seven, say; another bottle of beer and an Aufschnitt at the theatre between the acts; a small bottle of white wine and a Spiegeleier before going home; then a piece of cheese or sausage, washed down by more beer, previous to turning in for the night.

But he is no gourmet. French cooks and French prices are not the rule at his restaurant. His beer or his inexpensive native white wine he prefers to the most costly clarets or champagnes. And, indeed, it is well for him he does, for one is inclined to think that every time a French grower sells a bottle of wine to a German hotel or shopkeeper Sedan is rankling in his mind. It is a foolish revenge, seeing that it is not the German who as a rule drinks it: the punishment falls upon some innocent traveling Englishman. Maybe, however, the French dealer remembers also Waterloo, and feels that in any event he scores.

In Germany expensive entertainments are neither offered nor expected. Everything throughout the Fatherland is homely and friendly. The German has no costly sports to pay for, no showy establishments to maintain, no purse-proud circle to dress for. His chief pleasure, a seat at the opera or concert, can be had for a few marks; and his wife and daughters walk there in home-made dresses, with shawls over their heads. Indeed, throughout the country the absence of all ostentation is to English eyes quite refreshing. Private carriages are few and far between, and even the droshky is made use of only when the quicker and cleaner electric car is not available.

By such means the German retains his independence. The shopkeeper in Germany does not fawn upon his customers. I accompanied an American lady once on a shopping excursion in Munich. She had been accustomed to shopping in London and New York, and she grumbled at everything the man showed her. It was not that she was really dissatisfied; this was her method. She explained that she could get most things cheaper and better elsewhere; not that she really thought she could, merely she held it good for the shopkeeper to say this. She told him that his stock lacked taste; she did not mean to be offensive; as I have explained, it was her plan; that there was no variety about it; that it was not up-to-date; that it was commonplace; that it looked as if it would not wear. He did not argue with her; he did not contradict her. He put the things back into their respective boxes, replaced the boxes on their respective shelves, walked into the little parlor behind the shop and closed the door.

"Isn't he ever coming back?" asked the lady, after a couple of minutes had elapsed. Her tone did not imply a question so much as an exclamation of mere impatience.

"I doubt it," I replied.

"Why not?" she asked, much astonished.

"I expect," I answered, "you have bored him. In all probability he is at this moment behind that door smoking a pipe and reading the paper."

"What an extraordinary shopkeeper!" said my friend, as she gathered her parcels together and indignantly walked out.

"It is their way," I explained. "There are the goods; if you want them you can have them. If you do not want them they would almost rather that you did not come and talk about them."

On another occasion I listened in the smoke-room of a German hotel to a small Englishman telling a tale which had I been in his place I should have kept to myself.

"It doesn't do," said the little Englishman, "to try and beat a German down. They don't seem to understand it. I saw a first edition of The Robbers in a shop in the Georg Platz. I went in and asked the price. It was a rum old chap behind the counter. He said, 'Twenty-five marks,' and went on reading. I told him I had seen a better copy only a few days before for twenty; one talks like that when one is bargaining; it is understood. He asked me 'Where?' I told him in a shop at Leipzig. He suggested my returning there and getting it; he did not seem to care whether I bought the book or whether I didn't. I said:

"'What's the least you will take for it?'

"'I have told you once,' he answered; 'twenty-five marks.' He was an irritable old chap.

"I said: 'It's not worth it.'

"'I never said it was, did I?' he snapped.

"I said: 'I'll give you ten marks for it.' I thought, maybe, he would end by taking twenty.

"He arose. I took it he was coming around the counter to get the book down. Instead, he came straight up to me. He was a biggish sort of man. He took me by the two shoulders, walked me out into the street and closed the door behind me with a bang. I was never more surprised in all my life."

"Maybe the book was worth twenty-five marks," I suggested.

"Of course it was," he replied; "well worth it. But what a notion of business!"

If anything changes the German character it will be the German woman. She herself is changing rapidly—advancing, as we call it. Ten years ago no German woman caring for her reputation, hoping for a husband, would have dared to ride a bicycle; to-day they spin about the country in their thousands. The old folks shake their heads at them; but the young men, I notice, overtake them and ride beside them. Not long ago it was considered unwomanly in Germany for a lady to be able to do the outside edge. Her proper skating attitude was thought to be that of clinging limpness to some male relative. Now she practices eights in a corner by herself until some young man comes along to help her. She plays tennis, and I have even noticed her, from a point of safety, driving a dog-cart.

Brilliantly educated she always has been. At eighteen she speaks two or three languages, and has forgotten more than the average Englishwoman has ever read. Hitherto this education has been utterly useless to her. On marriage she has retired into the kitchen and made haste to clear her brain of everything else in order to leave room for bad cooking. But suppose it begins to dawn upon her that a woman need not sacrifice her whole existence to household drudgery any more than a man need make himself nothing else than a business machine. Suppose she develops an ambition to take part in the social and national life. Then the influence of such a partner, healthy in body and therefore vigorous in mind, is bound to be both lasting and far-reaching.

For it must be borne in mind that the German man is exceptionally sentimental, and most easily influenced by his womenfolk. It is said of him he is the best of lovers, the worst of husbands. This has been the woman's fault. Once married, the German woman has done more than put romance behind her; she has taken a carpet-beater and driven it out of the house. As a girl, she never understood dressing; as a wife, she takes off such clothes even as she had and proceeds to wrap herself up in remnants; at all events, this is the impression she produces. The figure that might often be that of a Juno, the complexion that would sometimes do credit to a healthy angel, she proceeds of malice and intent to spoil.

She sells her birthright of admiration and devotion for a mess of sweets. Every afternoon you may see her at the café, loading herself with rich cream-covered cakes, washed down by copious draughts of chocolate. In a short time she becomes fat, pasty, placid, and utterly uninteresting.

When the German woman gives up her afternoon coffee and her evening beer, takes sufficient exercise to retain her shape, and continues to read after marriage something else than the cookery book, the German Government will find it has a new and unknown force to deal with. And everywhere throughout Germany one is confronted by unmistakable signs that the old German Frauen are giving place to the newer Damen.

Concerning what will then happen one feels curious. For the German nation is still young, and its maturity is of importance to the world. They are a good people, a lovable people, who should help much to make the world better.

The worst that can be said against them is that they have their failings. They themselves do not know this; they consider themselves perfect, which is foolish of them. They even go so far as to think themselves superior to the Anglo-Saxon; this is incomprehensible. One feels they must be pretending.

"They have their points," said George, "but their tobacco is a national sin. I'm going to bed."

We rose and, leaning over the low stone parapet, watched the dancing lights upon the soft, dark river.

"It has been a pleasant Bummel, on the whole," said Harris, "I shall be glad to get back, and yet I am sorry it is over; if you can understand me."

"What is a Bummel?" said George. "How would you translate it?"

I thought a moment, listening to the endless voices of the waters hurrying onward.

"A Bummel," I explained, "I should describe as a journey, long or short, without an end; the only thing regulating it being the necessity of getting back within a given time to the point from which we started. Sometimes it is through busy streets, and sometimes through the fields and lanes; sometimes we can be spared for only a few hours, and sometimes for a few days. But long or short, but here or there, our thoughts are ever on the turning of the sand. We nod and smile to many as we pass; with some we stop to talk a while; and with a few we walk a little way. We have been much interested, and often a little tired. But on the whole, we have had a pleasant time, and are sorry when 'tis over."

Why Mlle. Chauvin Was Barred Out

MLLE. JEANNE CHAUVIN, who is a professor of law in a woman's college in Paris, has sent a special invitation to the Portias of this country to visit the Exposition. Mlle. Chauvin is slight, pretty and winsome. In her plea before a famous Parisian Judge for admission to the bar she said: "I am a doctor of philosophy, a doctor of laws and a bachelor of literature."

The Judge replied: "I do not doubt your word in the least. You are indeed an encyclopedia in miniature, and we are all so afraid of you that I am sure it will be impossible to admit you to our ranks."

The Quadrennial Furor

MUCH has been written and said about the disturbing influence of our Presidential elections, and the great advantage which would accrue to the business interests and the moral repose of the country from a constitutional amendment lengthening the official term of our Chief Executive to six, eight, or even ten years. Doubtless such a change in the elections, giving a longer period of quiet between them, would have its advantages; but that it would adequately lessen the worst evils of great popular excitement is not apparent to the intelligent and careful thinker. Probably the longer the Presidential term the higher would rise the flood-tide of agitation when the "campaign year" should arrive with all its apples of discord and all its elements of unscrupulous organization. The prizes of official life increase in seductiveness year by year, and the means for artificially exciting the public mind become better and better understood. What politicians call "the issues of the day" are no longer mere natural points of division for the stream of public sentiment and its attendant interests. These issues are "manufactured to order," and the politicians long beforehand begin "sparring for position" and "skirmishing for advantage," with a view to the greatest possible popular strain of passion; so that by the time the polls are reached by the voters there is a dangerous furor in the public mind.

This sort of thing is not to be regulated by constitutional amendments, nor can it be materially modified by any form of election law. Here, as everywhere else, reform must be reached through educating the masses. The individual voter, the citizen, must be liberated from the passion we call politics. This does not mean that party relations are to be broken, or even partisanship, in the best sense, destroyed; but it does mean that the voter must be trained to ignore the insidious stimulus of mere artificial excitement in politics. Not only is this election furor not necessary to a wise use of the elective franchise, but detrimental to it in the last degree. The voter who goes to the polls drunken with the passion of the campaign prejudice and partisanship does not imbue his ballot with the saving wisdom of patriotism; it counts for nothing but the gratification of a desire originated not in thoughtful study, but by a factitious "issue."

No republic is safe longer than it can count upon the calmest and wisest judgment of its enfranchised citizens. Freedom is not a condition; it is a quality. No matter how much "independence" we may have, or how liberal may be the form of our government, we are no freer than our character makes us. The man whose nature takes naturally to slavery cannot be free—he will vote chains upon his own limbs; he will bind his wife and children to servility by his vote. What our people need is to have their minds liberated from the influences which bring on the furor of politics. It is probably hopeless to attempt radical reformation of the office-seeker until after the plain people have been convinced of the folly of campaign rabies. When the unambitious and patriotic voters shall show that they are not to be influenced by mere campaign wind and noise, and that their ballots are to be deposited calmly, thoughtfully, for a well-understood and perfectly formulated purpose, the politicians will be less and less stimulated to the use of artificial "issues" and stump statesmanship, and our quadrennial fury will be a thing of the past. —MAURICE THOMPSON.

Why the Boss Can't Be Ousted

IN A CERTAIN corner of Michigan is a political boss who has caused the good people of his county many and many a sleepless night. He has done things that these good people deem are outrageous. Some time ago they united to dethrone him. When their organization was complete they sent an emissary to the lieutenants of the boss saying the organization of good men would defeat the party at the polls if the boss was not dethroned. Would the lieutenants promise to dethrone him? The lieutenants promised, and the good ones went their way, happy in the belief that politics would run smoothly forever after, but when the time for the next Congressional convention rolled around the boss was found to be working for a candidate. His candidate won. The boss was still boss. The good ones reproached his lieutenants for failure to keep their promise. The lieutenants with one voice replied:

"We couldn't help it. He merely worked like the rest of us. We couldn't keep him from working, and since he had more influence than the rest of us, he won."

The lieutenants were right. Their only fault lay in making a bargain when they were unable to deliver the goods promised. They had agreed to dethrone the boss. They had no power to do so, since they did not elect him. Nobody elects bosses. They boss because they have the force of character which enables them to make other men do their will.

Men find it hard to realize this fact. "Why does Governor So-and-So have John Doe for his local boss? Why does not the Governor throw him over and choose another boss?" These questions are asked in every county and city in America. The persons asking them declare that John Doe's qualifications are very poor. They point out better men, more intelligent men and more brilliant men, who, they say, could serve the Governor better.

But the Governor did not make John Doe boss. Hence he cannot dethrone him and appoint a successor. The Governor looked around and saw that John Doe was the only man of his political faith who could control the party vote. Therefore the Governor made love to him and secured him for a lieutenant.

Suppose Governor So-and-So should listen to his advisers and say to John Doe, "You are dethroned," and to one of the better, more intellectual men whom the good ones point out, "I make you boss." John Doe would use the powers that made him a force for the Governor to turn men the other way. The newly appointed boss would find that the same lack which has heretofore made him politically inferior to John Doe will keep him inferior still. He cannot control the vote now any more than he could before his appointment.

This experience would teach the Governor that bosses are not created by appointment. They are chosen by natural selection. The only way to dethrone one is to find another person with greater ability to control men, and let him ingratiate himself into the hearts of the people until they will heed his dictates rather than those of the other boss. But the power to do this is conferred neither by election nor appointment. It is inherent in the man. Bosses are born, not made. —LEONIDAS HUBBARD, JR.

Fairy Stories

GRANDMOTHER GRUNDY is on her rounds again, crying up a fresh reform. She will have us to believe that the reading of Mother Goose and the Arabian Nights and Cinderella and Jack and the Bean Stalk is injurious to the minds of small people. The worthy old dame is curiously credulous as to the credulity of these little ones. She fears they will believe in fairies, and if they believe in fairies they will believe what is not true, and if they believe what is not true it will be to the peril of their souls.

Now, this belief of hers is a more narrowing and foolish, therefore injurious, belief to her supporters than that of the children is to themselves. They have recently come into this wonderful place, bringing with them faint memories of some other world that is bigger and brighter, and they like still to be told of that other where the flowers grow so large, where the houses are of ivory and silver, where fountains gush perfume in the gardens, where people eat nothing but ice cream and cake from golden dishes, where the birds speak, where dogs and cats are servants, where it never rains, where there are no nurses or governesses, where little girls are as lovely as angels, where all the boys are princes, bearing swords with which they slay dragons and monsters offhand, where nobody ever tears his clothes and no one has a stomach ache.

Not only are the children young: they represent the youth of the race. In them live the traditions which were poetry and romance in earlier centuries, which made knight errantry, created chivalry, fostered such literature and arts as the times afforded, which inspired to heroism, to purity and to honor. The chronicles of those early centuries that have come down to us reveal the child character of the people—the simple heart, the open mind, the quick and unchecked passions, the ready credence, the love for good, the scorn of baseness, the wholesome fondness for outdoor life, the admiration of beauty, and withal a stoutness and a heart, that seem to have passed out of our more correct and formal age. In furnishing ideals, in stimulating good impulses, in warming the spirit to enthusiasms, in founding in our human nature a place for poetry and imagery that have ever softened and chastened the deeds and thoughts of men, the stories so popular with our little ones do a service which the older, cruder myths did for our distant ancestors.

The objections of Grandmother Grundy are not well founded, because she confuses symbolism with fact. A truth is as plainly told under guise of a story as in the form of a dry and scientific statement. The child learns to abhor tyranny, harshness and greed quite as much when those passions are personified by Cinderella's sisters, by Blue Beard, or by various giants, witches and wizards, as he does when he learns of them from distant report in his Sunday-school. Probably no single instance can be offered by Mrs. Grundy of tangible harm done to a boy or girl through the reading of fairy stories.

Fairy tales may appeal to a raw and youthful taste, which is soon outgrown; but, whatever is to be said against them, they do not make hypocrites and prigs. The child has a healthy realization of what it needs to limber its mind, to make it grow, to stock it with bright fancies against the needs of the colder, harder years to come, and when supplied with that it will refuse trash. The boy who has Robinson Crusoe will not read Sanford and Merton, and the girl is not going to waste any time over the Elsie books if she has Alice in Wonderland. And if they read books that are sound and kindly and honestly written, they will not care for the coarse stuff, the antithesis of mawkish literature, that is devoted to the exploits of criminals and desperadoes.

Young people require sugar in their reading, as in their food. They read for the joy of reading. The tender stomachs of their imaginations rebel at the harsh and sad, and they are nauseated by the milk and water of the Mary-Had-a-Little-Lamb school of writing. Frank, hearty, laughable nonsense, stirring adventure, fairy tales that create visions of beauty, stories of knights and ladies that embody ideals of nobility and gallantry, even verse, an artificial form to which young readers do not always take kindly, save when it jingles or has a narrative interest, are the proper and natural choice of young readers. Guide them, but do not force them. With advancing years they will outgrow their fondness for the wonderful-impossible, and will be as far engrossed by the possible-wonderful. Let them have the joy of their childhood in the little time while they may, and make them moral by example rather than by precept—at least, such precepts as are found in books avowedly didactic. Keep ghost stories away from them, for they frighten and give pain, and their baneful influence may not be shaken off in a lifetime, but let them have their fill of merry inventions and fairy tales, for their effect is not only innocent but healthful. Never suppose that the child who delights in fairies is not master of his imagination, and will not emerge soon enough into the world of gray realities—the world ruled by Grandmother Grundy. —CHARLES M. SKINNER.

Reward for Equine Respectability

AMONG articles of incorporation recently placed on file in Brooklyn was that of the Equine Provident Society, the object of which is to "provide a shelter and ranch where horses who have served their masters faithfully can be taken care of in their declining years."

The new society seems to promise a somewhat novel charity, but, if well conducted, it will be no less beautiful on this account. What has a greater claim upon our gratitude than the horse? It promises, too, to furnish much food for thought—especially to horses. This is not to be an indiscriminate charity. Every horse would do well to note the clause, "who have served their masters faithfully." Running away with a master and precipitating him violently into a ditch, balking with a master on the public highway and bringing upon him ridicule and loss of time, kicking a master through the stable window—none of these can be called serving a master faithfully. It isn't even treating a master with common decency. Indeed, though it may be a selfish view, perhaps the best part of this new charity is the good effect it ought to have on horses when intelligence of it spreads generally among them; the most recalcitrant steed may well pause when he has his foot raised to smite his master as he realizes that it will disqualify him for admission to the Provident Society's Home. It will, without doubt, improve the average of behavior among horses. They will have something to look forward to and the feeling that faithful service will bring its reward. The spectacle of an aged horse coming to the Home carrying his "character" from his late master between his teeth will be highly edifying.

There is, however, another view to take of the matter. Is the horse a free agent? Is it not possible that the most vicious horse lives up to his "lights"? If this is so, it is unjust that he should be shut out from the benefits of the Home. This would seem to be a point which properly falls within the province of the trained theologian. Then, too, it seems no more than right that the master be taken into consideration. A horse would have to be a very equine angel to get along with some of them.

It is noticeable that mules do not appear to be included among the beneficiaries of the Home. Are there no good mules except dead ones? Perish the thought! Perhaps another and separate home for respectable aged mules will be established, of bomb-proof construction.

The respectable horse may now felicitate himself something as did the Irishman who observed of the steam-shovel that, though it could do the work of fifty men, it couldn't vote. So of the automobile, though it may serve its master never so faithfully, in the end it goes to the scrap pile, while the conscientious horse passes a green old age in the Home of the Equine Provident Society. —HAYDEN CARRUTH.

At the English Capital

AMBASSADOR CHOATE tells a story of a visit at a country house among whose guests was the usual wag. They were in friendly discussion upon the one inevitable subject, of course, when the wag suddenly blurted out: "You know, Mr. Choate, really I can't understand Americans. A hundred years ago or so you chucked a cargo of tea into the ocean and your people fought us. Now we pick a cargo of flour out of the ocean and your people want to fight us. Come, now, what in Heaven's name do you want us to do with foodstuffs?"

HECTOR MACDONALD'S REFUSAL OF THE V. C.

That sturdy fighter, Hector Macdonald, has taken up his command of the Highland Brigade in South Africa. Macdonald's career in the British Army has been a remarkable one. It is at no time easy for a man to make his way from the ranks to a commission in our army, but in days of comparative peace the task is ten times more difficult than it is to-day when so many officers are falling. Yet Hector Macdonald has gone forward with wonderful rapidity. He has been so fortunate as to be in the thick of almost every one of our little wars and never served without distinguishing himself. Every honor has fallen to him except the greatest of all. He has not been decorated with the Victoria Cross. But he could have had that crowning distinction had not his canny Scottish nature preferred the practical to the extrinsic. After a fight in India in which the Highlander showed to the best advantage, the General in command sent for him and said: "Macdonald, the only thing I'll say about your conduct to-day is that I'll recommend you for a commission or the V. C., whichever you please. Think it over and report to me." Macdonald thought it over. The V. C. meant a tiny Maltese cross marked "For Valor" and carried with it ten pounds a year, the whole constituting the highest honor that a British soldier, officer or private, can attain. A commission meant the chance of pushing on in the profession. He took the commission, and the V. C. is out of his grasp forever.

The Boers had him in their power once, but let him go. He was at Majuba Hill and was down, badly wounded, when, the fighting being over, a Boer private happened along and began to rifle Macdonald of his belongings. The Highland blood in the wounded man caused him to summon all his strength and to deal the Boer a terrible blow with his fist, sending the burgher reeling yards away. When the Boer regained his wits and feet he grabbed his gun, but as he shot at Macdonald a Field Cornet struck up the gun, and the bullet whistled over the Highlander's head. If it should happen that Hector Macdonald comes out of this war with credit, there will be no position in the British Army that he may not reasonably hope to attain. He has no money except his salary.

THE ROLL OF HONOR OF THE PRESS

Down in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral there is a large plate of beaten brass of stately design. Upon the plate appear about one dozen names, but there is an ominously large space left blank for additions. This space will be materially lessened before the Transvaal War is over, for the plate records the names of those war correspondents who fell in active service. It already bears some prominent names: Powers, who died with Gordon in Khartum; Cameron, of the Standard, shot in the desert march for the relief of Gordon, and Mr. H. Garrett, of the New York Herald, who died in Kitchener's Khartum campaign—his name has been, or is to be, added. I believe his is so far the only American name ordered to be graved upon the brass. Up to date, three English correspondents have fallen, two by bullets and one by fever. The Chronicle's man at Mafeking was accidentally shot. The Morning Post's correspondent in Ladysmith, Mr. Ferrard, was killed in the Boers' determined assault upon that unfortunate place, and best known of all correspondents, G. W. Steevens, of the Mail, has died of fever. Steevens was one of Editor Harry Cust's discoveries. When Mr. William Waldorf Astor bought the Pall Mall Gazette he appointed as editor Mr. Cust, a young Tory member of Parliament. Now Cust did not know an M Quad from a steam roller. Unhampered by the least little bit of knowledge of the production of a newspaper he caused the most wonderful things to be done, and what is more, scored every time. London never before had seen so unconventional a paper, and the Pall Mall was soon in everybody's hands. The Editor spent money with both hands and got value for it, too, but so lavish was the expenditure that it is doubtful whether the sheet could ever have been made to pay. Cust gathered around him a set of young men, nearly every one of whom has made a name in the world, and among the most brilliant was poor Steevens, who has now died at the age of thirty years.

POULTNEY BIGELOW'S BRILLIANT SPEECH

An honor has fallen to Poultney Bigelow that he little dreams of. There was a meeting of the Whitefriars Club, the club that entertained Mark Twain not long ago when the humorist delivered his famous aphorism, "When in doubt, tell the truth," and the night was spent in an on-your-feet discussion of the stage. Grein, the dramatic critic and sometime manager of the Independent Theatre, was the guest of the evening and led off the oratory. He was followed by many distinguished lights—authors, journalists, actors and ordinary mortals. When the debate was at its height there were loud calls for Bigelow, but it was discovered that he had slipped away unobserved. When the evening came to an end it was necessary to decide who had made the best speech of the night. Without a dissenting voice the non-speakers voted the honor to Poultney Bigelow.

PEPPERING THE WAR LORDS WITH MICHIGAN AIR-GUNS

As showing how the same alleged joke arises to a multitude of minds simultaneously this may serve. You may have heard that over here the War Office is coming in for bitter criticism owing to the supposed inferiority of our field guns as compared with the guns possessed by our friends, the enemy. The fact that our guns are field guns, guns that you gallop over ditches and stone walls and things with, and that the Boer guns are guns of position, does not count for anything with the all-knowing public. It so happens that just before Christmas a Michigan firm flooded this United Kingdom with a vicious little air-gun that here costs under a dollar and which bids fair to cause the rising generation of Englishmen to be a one-eyed race. In one week, during the height of the condemnation of British artillery, more than one hundred and fifty of these guns were delivered by parcel post at the War Office, with all sorts of genial letters of advice to the War Lords. If the war continues, Michigan should do as well out of air-guns as Chicago is doing with her canned beef for the British soldier.

THE UNEMOTIONAL ENGLISHMAN RUFFLED

The Englishman is a long-suffering, desperately unemotional, quiet man, even if I say it "as shouldn't." I was traveling in the underground the other morning, a few days after the grand assault on Ladysmith. A day or so before we had read the names of our long list of British killed and wounded in that affair. There were three Englishmen in the compartment and their knees touched those of four Germans, who got in at Hammersmith. For a time the Germans conversed in their own tongue, but one of them, opening a newspaper, hit upon the Boer paragraph giving the burghers' casualties as four killed and fifteen wounded. Instantly he gleefully read out the news in English, and his three companions nodded the one to the other, saying "I told you so," and passing uncomplimentary reflections on the British soldier as a fighter. Not a sign or word came from any one of the Englishmen. The talk went on, and really it was distressingly difficult to sit and bear it. Presently one of the Britishers put down his paper—he was an old man—and, speaking in a quiet voice, said: "Gentlemen, you come of a valiant fighting stock. You are Germans, are you not?"

They admitted the fact with justifiable pride.

"Don't you think, then, that you can afford to appreciate bravery and determination in others?"

One said he always did—when he found it.

"But," said the elderly man, "the Boers are valiant."

"We were not reflecting on the bravery of the Boers," answered the spokesman.

"Pardon me, you were. Could you possibly have believed a more belittling thing of the Boers than to think that they would draw back from the assault of a town they desired to take because they had had four killed? Perhaps you thought you were belittling the fighting quality of our fellows, but—well, I'll say no more. Excuse me for interrupting your conversation, gentlemen." He retired behind his paper.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

The employers wonder why it is that their salaried underlings do not manifest an eagerness to work over hours and in other ways sacrifice themselves to show that the interest of employer and employed is one. There are several reasons. First, the interest of employer and employee in the majority of cases is not a unit, and the subordinate is made to feel this from the first day of his entrance into the establishment. Instead of being treated like a friendly assistant, worthy of the confidence of his employer, the clerk in the average big office learns that he is merely a paid automaton, hired to grind out the greatest possible amount of routine work a day of which he is capable, and that he is judged not by individual ability, but by his quickness in converting himself into a well-oiled machine that can be run while it lasts without thought of human weariness and thrown aside as soon as it begins to slip cogs.

Another cause of failure on the part of the employed to work for the interest of the employer is the unwillingness shown by the masters to advance their help according to merit. Not one employer in fifty ever raises the salary of a clerk of his own accord, and if he does it at all it is usually only after the employee has found a better-paying position and announced his intention of leaving. The clerk very naturally resents the injustice and the selfishness that refuses him the money that he knows his services are worth, and he broods and grows angry over the belief that it is the might of the employer that denies the right of the employed.

Now just a word as to the remedy, for I trust employers are not above listening to an honest suggestion, since they are so free in offering them. Let the proprietors of our great industries take the time to make the acquaintance of their subordinates, not as between master and servant, but on a basis of equality as man to man, and I have not a doubt that employer, as well as the employed, will make some very startling discoveries. If there is an immense amount of brain-stifling routine work to be done in an establishment, give each clerk whose duty it is to perform this work at least one hour a day of varied and more responsible employment, that he may feel that he has a chance of eventually working out of his treadmill position into something where cultivated brains will be of service. If the office is connected with a manufactory, give the office force the opportunity three or four times a year of going through the works and studying the other end of the business. And I would suggest further that the shopmen also be granted the privilege of occasionally seeing how the office work is executed. I believe that a half-hour's talk once a week with his clerical force, even down to the office boys, confiding in them as far as is practicable his plans for furthering the interests of the concern and occasionally asking for a suggestion as to ways and means of accomplishing his object, would entirely revolutionize the spirit that now prevails in the average big office.

Furthermore, I believe there should be a regular scale of salaries, permitting of constant, if slight, increase at stated intervals, so that the employee will know that his services are not paid for according to the caprice or the stinginess of one man, but according to their actual worth to the company. Nothing brings out the best in an honest man's work so much as kindly appreciation.

To sum it all up in a nutshell, let the employer treat his men as if he expected each one of them to some day distinguish himself in his employ, and he will no longer have occasion to mourn the dearth of progressive young men. E. A. R.

Editor Saturday Evening Post:

The primary adjuncts to success in life are health, temperance, honesty and ambition. Perfect health makes a man equal to all emergencies. Temperance in all things helps a man to keep himself physically, intellectually and morally perfect.

Every man measures honesty according to his conscience. What one man will deem dishonest another may consider honorable, because the elasticity of his scruples does not render him competent to appreciate probity in its nicer degree.

I do not believe opportunity comes to a man. On the contrary, the man creates the opportunity and is the sole architect of his life. The boy that is born of humble parentage has an equal, if not a superior, chance with the rich man's son in this American country. The rich man's son, before he is out of his teens, is sent to college, where he acquires tastes and habits that often prove burdensome to him later in life. Care, self-denial and thought for the future are as foreign to him as it is to a well-fed house-cat basking in the summer sun with a full stomach. I believe the men who have made the most complete successes are self-made men.

When I see a young man with a university education working behind a counter or mechanically filling a fifteen-dollar-a-week position, I can safely conclude that he lacks one of the essential qualifications necessary to success. Of course, he will say, and so will his friends, that he cannot get ahead because he lacks influence. This is a mistake, and no young man should throw his time away harboring the thought, for merit, properly exploited, invariably receives recognition. No live business man of to-day is filling his positions of trust with blockheads to oblige his friends.

Go carefully over the career of the self-made man. Witness cash boys who have risen to high places of trust, or the office boy who finally succeeds his employer, and you will learn that they had a faculty of making their employer feel their worth.

Some young men fail because they are too diffident, lack self-assurance. This fault can be charged to their modest ambition. Therefore, I conclude it is better to be egotistical than to underestimate one's ability.

Some young men fail because they do not realize that it is not what a young man is, but what he makes himself. As the progress upward is as imperceptible as the growth of the sturdy oak, young men often become discouraged and give up the struggle, settle down and take things in a matter-of-fact way, when a few years more of hustling would bring them to the goal of their ambition. Many young men who do well in minor positions fail when they take a step higher because they lack executive ability.

But patience is also a wonderful factor in a man's success—patience to wait for results. I have made it a practice to conclude that the difference between what I receive in the way of salary and what I think I ought to get is so much capital stored up, experience being the intrinsic coin in which I am paid. This is also very consoling to the underpaid young man, who, if not counting up this capital, would leave employment that promised advancement for something less certain of improvement.

Young men should bear in mind that it is during the early years of manhood that a reputation is built up, and that the young man who achieves distinction as a spendthrift and dissipater can never hope for a position of trust.

I would earnestly advise young men to read the lives of great men—and especially of self-made men—Lincoln, Garfield, Napoleon, Cæsar, John A. Stewart, and hundreds of others.

The Diary of a New Congressman's Wife

WASHINGTON, March, 1900.

DURING this last week I have felt as though I were living between the covers of a three volume novel, and that I was hero, heroine and Fate all in one. Some one has said that "Love is an egotism of two," but I would make that saying read in this present love affair, "Love is an egotism of three," for my part in this romance has been quite as important as Page's, or as Alain de Courcelles'. I have not only had to overcome the heroine's pride and plead the hero's cause, but I have enacted the fairy godmother to perfection. Robert says he is thankful that my attention has been diverted from the iniquities of the Republican party, for the time being at least, and that the Puerto Rican Bill has given place in my mind to the De Courcelles' billet-doux.

When we drove home from the Capitol the day that the bill passed the House, I was full of curiosity and anxiety to know what it was that Mr. Morelos had told Page and what it was that the newspaper which he had given her contained. We had scarcely reached home and Page had but just plunged into her reading when the footman brought me a packet which had come in my absence, and which bore a foreign postmark and was in unfamiliar handwriting. While Page was absorbed, I tore open my packet and found inclosed a letter addressed to me, together with one bearing Page's name. They were both from Alain de Courcelles, and were of much import, as I soon found out. In mine was the grave announcement of his mother's death, and also the announcement that he had inherited her private fortune. He then stated that, though such a bereavement was perhaps not the most fitting occasion upon which to follow the "affairs of the heart," he begged me nevertheless, as the person nearest to Page, and as the only one, in lieu of relations, whom he could approach, to make to her a formal proffer of his hand and to give to her the inclosed letter. He went on to say that he would be unable to return at once to the United States as he had to comply with certain formalities under the French law in the settling of his mother's affairs, but that he would come the first moment that he could be released, and meantime would I supplement his letter of pleading with special pleading of my own in his behalf.

SENATOR WETMORE TELLS MANY FUNNY STORIES

I don't remember to have been as much excited over my own affair with Robert in years gone by as I was over this offer of marriage of Alain de Courcelles, but then Robert had not been a French Marquis, with a château in Brittany and a hôtel in Paris. He had been only an every-day sort of man, a dealer in hides and tan-bark, and instead of a château and hôtel had been possessed of a large tannery solely. I looked across at Page. She had just finished her newspaper and also was folding up a letter. She handed them to me without saying anything, but her face was very white.

I glanced at them. The paper contained, just as I thought it would, the announcement of the death of the Marquise de Courcelles. The letter was more remarkable. It was from a notary in the little town in Brittany where she had died, and it was written before her death, as the date of it testified. In this letter the notary, in the most formal and polite manner, desired, in the name of the Marquise, information concerning the young American lady for whom it was alleged the Marquis de Courcelles had formed an attachment. In stilted fashion the full name and age of the young lady and date of commencement of this attachment were asked for, very much as though the coming of love were a matter of the seasons and could be reckoned by the date of the calendar. I ran over this letter hurriedly, then I handed my letter from Alain de Courcelles to Page and watched the alternate red and white color play over her face. At its close she sank down into a chair as though overcome and looked up at me appealingly.

"Well, Page," said I, "I am to act for him, and I make right here a formal offer of marriage to you, in his name. Will you accept?" And I smiled in pleased anticipation.

"Ah don' entirely understan' yet, Mrs. Slocum," she said in bewilderment.

"Page, here is his letter to you, and if I do not mistake, it will explain."

I handed to her the unfolded letter which came within mine, addressed to her, then I mercifully walked away while she read it with trembling fingers. After quite an interval I heard my name softly called. I went back to her where she still sat. She could not trust herself to speak, so I said:

"Was it satisfactory, Page?"

She nodded her head just as a child would have done, and tears stood in her eyes. I was in great hopes that she would show me his letter, but she held it tightly in her fingers as though it were too precious. At last she said reproachfully:

"You've known about it all this time an' kept it from me. Ah don' see why you didn' tell me long ago."

And then at last I told her all that Alain de Courcelles had told me before he went away. I interrupted my recital every little while with the question:

"What will your answer be, Page?"

But she shook her head as though doubtful, and said:

"Ah mus' have time to think it all out."

We talked all the rest of the afternoon and into the deepening twilight and up to the dinner hour, and still Page would not commit herself fully. I knew that she loved Alain de Courcelles, but she would not say it in so many words. Just as we were about to separate to dress for dinner there came a messenger boy bringing a cablegram addressed to Page. She tore it open in an agitated manner, then held it out to me. It read:

"Cannot bear suspense of waiting for letter. Cable reply. Alain de Courcelles."

SENATOR P—— SAYS GENERAL CORBIN HAS NOT CARED WHETHER HE WAS LIKED OR NOT

There was a moment or two of silence. Page had a terrified, half-desperate look on her face, and I stared at her in consternation. We were both in almost a panic. I said at last:

"You will have to send some sort of answer, and, Page, it might as well be the truth."

She seized the blank form of a cablegram and wrote without faltering:

"Yes. Page Mason."

The die was cast, and all the rest of that evening I was planning in my mind what sort of a wedding there should be and what amount of dot Robert and I should give this young girl. I ran over the brilliant weddings which Washington high-life had witnessed during the winter, beginning with the Admiral of the Navy and including the daughter of the General of the Army and ending in the Pauncefote-Bromley nuptials. Well, St. John's Church should shelter yet another distinguished bridal party when Page should become Marquise de Courcelles. We decided that not one word should be spoken of the affair until Alain de Courcelles should have arrived in this country and the day had been appointed.

Meantime Lent is well along, and the season for prayer-books and piety, reflection and charity is in full swing, though, as some pessimistic man said, the only thing that keeps Lent persistently, nowadays, is the extra dollar which he had hoped to lay away for a rainy day. One part of society instituted a veritable Lenten penance, however, by giving some theatricals the other night, and Page and I agreed that not even the cleverness of Mr. Reginald de Koven in the chief male rôle could redeem the play sufficiently to make it other than a sacrificial offering of the season. The multitude of smart dinners which preceded the play, however, were charming, as was also the supper after the play given by the Secretary of State. At one of the dinners I was taken out by Senator P——, and he was most amusing and kept our end of the table in high good humor. Both he and Senator Wetmore told many good stories, though it seemed impossible at times to keep the conversation entirely off dangerous political topics, and again and again would the Puerto Rican matter crop up, for it is most evident that signals of distress are flying on the breeze, and it is enough to watch the face of any Republican when the question is discussed to know that some very lively back-pedaling has got to be done if the party hopes to get down the hill in safety. I promised Robert that I would not start the topic myself, nor would I mention to any one the avalanche of letters that has come upon him from his constituents, all more or less threatening. I plainly see defeat ahead for the member from Spruce City, but to this Robert only smiles inscrutably and says:

"Just wait a bit, Agatha; you don't suppose that a whole great party has deliberately gone wrong, do you? If a mistake has been made we are strong enough and wise enough to remedy it, and you must remember that Washington has said of public opinion that 'In a free and republican government we cannot restrain the voice of the multitude. Every man will speak as he thinks, or, more properly, without thinking, and consequently judge of effects without attending to their causes.'"

"That is all very well, Robert, but Bancroft says that 'The public is wiser than the wisest critic,'" I retorted.

I shall be very much undone if Robert and I are destined to quarrel on politics, but I have heeded his request and have not brought up the Puerto Rican question, and at this dinner I turned the subject when some of the others at our end of the table got upon it. I seized with avidity upon the mention of the Senate inquiry into General Corbin's war record, and I found but one opinion, that the attack upon him is cowardly and unjust, and that his letter to Senator Davis is considered to be a fine example of straightforward manliness. Senator P—— says that General Corbin has not cared whether he was personally liked or not, and that his soldier's training has made him rather arbitrary and brusque and unwilling to conciliate even when he wished for promotion, and that that is about all there is behind the attack upon him. Just here the theme threatened to bark back to the political situation, for it was but a step from General Corbin's letter to Senator Davis—to Senator Davis' proposition to amend the bill for Puerto Rico now in the Senate by substituting free trade for the fifteen per cent. duty clause, but here Senator P—— and Robert both interposed with amusing stories which sent the conversational ball rolling briskly away from the danger point.

Senator P—— spoke of the Lenten season, and then, apropos of it, told a funny story about the predicament the Senate was led into by Senator Voorhees one Ash Wednesday morning some years ago. There was a certain bill which threatened to come up in the Senate, and it was a piece of legislation that the Senator was most anxious to stave off. As soon as the morning prayer was over the "Tall Sycamore of the Wabash" suddenly remembered that it was Ash Wednesday. So he arose to his feet and, with a gravity and solemnity that would have done credit to the blind chaplain himself, said:

"I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the day. This is Ash Wednesday, and the rest of this week is holy week, with Holy Thursday and Good Friday succeeding each other as days of prayer, and I move that, in deference to this solemn season, the Senate shall adjourn until Tuesday after Easter Monday."

The Senate was taken so unawares and was so amazed, and there were so few Senators present, that before anybody realized what had been done the motion had been carried, and the Senate woke up to find that it had adjourned for six weeks. Senator P—— and Senator Wetmore and Robert led the laugh, and then some one asked:

"But what did they do? Did they stay adjourned for six weeks?"

"Oh, no," replied Senator P——. "They got together the Tuesday after the Senate had been declared adjourned, and corrected the journal and amended it, so that the adjournment appeared to have been made to that day."

From this story the talk suddenly became all about the relative merits of baked beans. It is rather a far cry from Senator Voorhees to baked beans, and some of us at the table were considerably mystified as to what bearing such an edible had upon things in general, but it soon became evident that the Senate restaurant has become famous for hot baked beans served on Sunday morning to various grave and reverend seigniors, and that the bean-pot comes up fresh from the pit of earth under the Capitol, where it has reposed since Saturday covered over with red-hot coals, and its contents disappear like chaff before the wind. I asked:

"Who attend these bean-feasts, Senator P——?"

"Oh, we all take a turn at it. Frye and Littlefield both are to be seen there at times, and Senators Proctor and Cullom sometimes come in, and I often go, of course. I can testify that no other beans taste as these do; perhaps it is the effort of getting there on Sunday morning that makes them so savory, for it is a clear case of 'seeking sauce by labor,' as Horace would say. By the way, does any one know whether Cullom has got away yet?"

And here the talk turned to Senator Cullom and the fight he has on his hands for reelection and the war of extermination which Mr. Tanner is waging against him in Illinois, and, in connection with it, of course, the Hawaiian Bill was talked of.

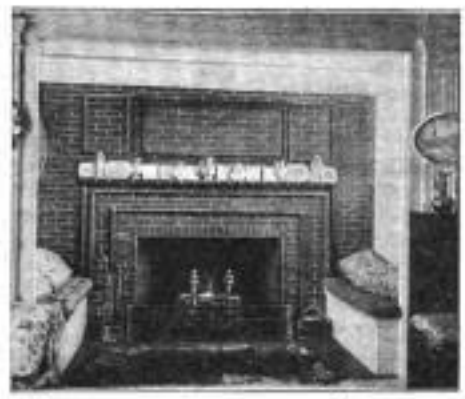
SENATOR DAVIS WHO PROPOSES TO SUBSTITUTE FREE TRADE

I was in the Senate the day that Mr. Cullom made his pathetic plea for a cessation of debate over the Hawaiian Bill in order that he might get away to attend to Mr. Tanner out in Illinois. The Senate is noted for the tremendous talk-box it keeps on hand, and it only has to turn the crank to let loose a flow of eloquence that can go on, like Tennyson's brook, forever. So when the eloquence on the Hawaiian Bill was about a week old and with no sign of cessation, Senator Cullom arose from his seat and said in a despairing tone, which went home to the heart of every listener:

"Gentlemen of the Senate, there is a matter of importance pressing upon me which I cannot specify on the floor of the Senate, but when I assure you that I am anxious to get away from here and that I cannot go until the Hawaiian Bill is out of the way, you will understand just what I mean, I hope."

This produced an instantaneous effect and forthwith the fountain of eloquence ceased, for every man perfectly understood that Senator Cullom had the fight of his life on his hands, and the Hawaiian Bill, minus the amendment to pay Liliuokalani for her interest in the crown lands of Hawaii, passed without division.

I was much interested in this bill from the beginning, for I knew that it promised unlimited amusement from the time that the clerk should read out the ex-queen's name down to the final disposition of the matter. I had not forgotten his wonderful performance when he had wrestled with the bones in the royal Hawaiian mausoleum, so I lent my most attentive ear, and I was fully rewarded. He rolled out her name in this bloodthirsty style, "Lily-Kill-Annie," and the listener was left with the horrible suspicion that this poor, homeless ex-queen must be possessed of some homicidal mania.



Senator P—— says that he remembers when Liliuokalani made a royal tour through this country during the lifetime of the reigning king, Kalakaua, and that the Government and society received them with all the deference due to their rank as royalties. At that time Mr. Carter was the Hawaiian Minister accredited here, and he gave a brilliant entertainment to which all the officials, together with the most exclusive of the smart set of that day, were bidden, and the princess created a most favorable impression. They were dignified and seemed possessed of that nameless sort of majesty which belongs even to savages, if they hold imperial station.

This description of Senator P——'s illustrates impressively the grimness of human mutability, or, to put it in the language of another:

"All our life goeth like Penelope's web, and what one hour effects, another destroys."

I had a glimpse of this famous ex-queen the other day, and any one who mistakes her for an ordinary negress must be lacking in all discrimination. To be sure, even in the days of her royalty and youth, one could scarcely have applied to her that line from Tennyson, "Queen lily and rose in one," but she possesses dignity to an unusual degree, and in her plain, well-cut black satin gown, in which she is usually attired, she is no insignificant figure. Mrs. Dominis lives quietly here in Washington on Fifteenth Street. She is usually attended by her secretary, Mr. Joseph Heleluhe, and sometimes even by her nephew, Prince David, when he is in this country. When the ex-queen walks upon the street she is attended by a good-looking young Hawaiian girl who is well-dressed and who follows usually a pace or two behind her, and in turn this pair is attended by a trim-looking white maid-servant who carries the wraps and the purse, and walks well behind both mistress and maid. The ex-queen remains here in the hope that the Government will pension her, or make her some small douceur in compensation for her dethronement, but in view of the fact that the amendment looking to her relief was laid on the table the other day amid profound silence and indifference, and in spite of Mr. Hoar's amendment to the Consular and Diplomatic Bill for the amelioration of her condition, I am afraid that Liliuokalani has made her last appearance as queen of the Hawaiian Islands before the Senate of the United States.

Tales Told by Handwriting

By Wm. J. Kinsley

THE stories of many cases in the solving of which handwriting has played a prominent part read like romances.

A few years ago a committee from a church brought to the office of the writer several letters written and mailed on different dates from various cities calling the pastor of their church to fields of greater usefulness—at larger salaries—each letter offering a few hundred dollars more than the preceding one. Upon the receipt of each call, a committee meeting was held and the pastor's salary raised to meet the offer of the call. The fourth call within a year caused the committee to decide that they had reached their limit—and also aroused suspicion. When the documents were brought to the writer's office two questions were asked: first, are, or are not, the four letters in one handwriting, and second, are they in the handwriting of the person who wrote the standards (afterward admitted to be the pastor)? It was decided that all four "calls" were written by the same person—and he the pastor. It was decided to let him take the last call.

"Billy" Woodward, alias "Big Hawley," the prince of gamblers and blackmailers, who boasted on the witness-stand that he was "thirty-seven years old and had been arrested thirty-seven times, but never convicted once," was convicted that time—the thirty-eighth—and by his handwriting. This conviction was for blackmail in endeavoring to frighten a wealthy and honorable gentleman into paying $100,000. Woodward always "played for large stakes," as he expressed it. He admitted that in three months he cheated his victims of over $1,000,000. Arrested time and time again, he wriggled out of the clutches of the law by various means—once on an alibi, proving that he was in jail in one town on the day he was charged with a robbery in another city.

The two Davis Will Cases, involving respectively $13,000,000 and $2,000,000, and the Tighe Will Case, involving $1,500,000, are some of the recent instances in which the expert in handwriting has been in the foreground.

A TALE THAT BEGGARS BELIEF

Several years ago the New York courts brought to light a story which equaled in interest the tales of Dumas, Scott or Stevenson. A Boston newspaper writer and art critic of prominence and family, owing to the alleged discovery that he was using his paper to "bull" and "bear" the stocks in which he himself was speculating at the same time, left Boston in 1854. He took with him $70,000, which another man claimed, and quietly established himself in New York.

By investment and speculation this snug fortune grew to a million or more. Yet no one in New York knew that the "Miser," as he was called, possessed enough to buy even the cheapest Bowery meal. He would hang around restaurants and eat scraps and leavings. Clothes he never bought and was always clad in filthy rags. His one absorbing passion was music, and it was the one thing for which he would spend money. He would beg admission and try to induce well-dressed auditors to pay his way in, but if these schemes failed, as a last resort, he would pay for the cheapest seat in the house.

One cold day in the middle of December, 1885, the "Miser" was run over by a cab. When he was taken to the hospital it was found that he had no underwear, no shirt, no vest—only the ragged coat that he had worn for twenty years. He begged to be taken "home"—and such a home—a squalid garret. Here he died a few days later.

A lawyer produced an old power of attorney given him by the "Miser." It was a document which gave absolute power to the attorney. This attorney claimed that the deceased had promised to leave all of his property to his "dearest friend"—naming the lawyer. He had witnesses to prove this; claimed that the old miser's trunk had been rifled and a will leaving the property to him (the lawyer) stolen.

A friend of the deceased remembered that the "Miser" had left a bundle of papers, tied up in a large red bandana handkerchief, in his care nearly twenty years before. The package was taken from the safe, opened and found to contain nearly $400,000. The Metropolitan Bank informed the authorities that it held $40,000 more in the same name which had been idle for nearly twenty years. A large amount in ready cash was found in the hair-covered trunk in the attic. It is not too much to suppose that he was worth from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000 when he died.

Upon this discovery the lawyer redoubled his efforts, and the power of attorney was mainly relied on to prove his contentions. An expert examination of the document brought to light that several lines had been added to it after it had been signed, and these added lines made it unlimited instead of limited as it read originally. The handwriting and ink in the added lines were different from the originals and in some places the added writing overlapped the signature—thus proving that this writing was made after the signature. The expert proof was so clear that the claimant lost his case and the property went to the heirs.

A DUMMY BANK AND A VISIONARY CORONER

In another case, certified checks were shown to have been written and certified by one penman, although there purported to be four different handwritings on them. A bogus bank was opened and the first few checks went through the clearing house all right and were promptly paid. When confidence had been established the city was flooded with fraudulent checks which, when presented at the "bank," were found to be forgeries and the bank a dummy.

The case of a coroner in a large city was a unique if not gruesome one. The coroners were paid a certain sum for each inquest held, and in one month the coroner presented bills for one hundred and fifty inquisitions—about ten of them genuine and one hundred and forty bearing forged signatures of jurors and witnesses. Some of the jurors purported to live on streets not in the city, and others at numbers higher than the streets extended.

Forgeries on the nominating petitions of candidates for political offices are of frequent occurrence.

OUR IGNORANCE OF OUR OWN HANDWRITING

Occasionally we see in public prints that certain forgeries are so skillfully executed that even the owner of the name cannot tell whether his signature is forged or genuine. This is considered by some as indicating extraordinary skill on the part of the forger, and also that an expert's opinion in such a case must be of no value, since the owner of the name doesn't know his own handwriting. But there is nothing unusual about either the skill displayed or the occurrence. Writers themselves are usually unacquainted with those tell-tale minor characteristics which form the basis of an expert's opinion.

The writer was a witness in a case some two years ago in which some bankers and others were testifying as experts on the other side. As they claimed to be able to identify, offhand, the signatures of the plaintiff, the writer had the plaintiff write his own name several times, leaving spaces between. In these spaces the writer forged the plaintiff's name. In less than ten minutes the attorney asked the plaintiff which were his and which were forged—so that the opposing experts might be properly cross-examined—and the plaintiff, who but a few minutes before had watched the writer forge his name, was unable to pick out his own signatures, with the ink on them scarcely dry.

So much for knowing one's own handwriting.

THE CRAZE FOR THE ANONYMOUS LETTER

People who, to cast blame on some one else, or to arouse sympathy, write anonymous and threatening letters to themselves, furnish a peculiar study for the psychologist as well as the handwriting expert. Such cases are by no means uncommon. I recall the circumstance of a young woman customer of a large Western store who brought to the proprietors of the store anonymous letters she had received, charging her with being in love with the manager of the store. The clerks, manager and proprietors received similar anonymous letters—all apparently in different handwritings. An examination of the handwriting of every one connected with the store exonerated them all. At last the handwriting of the young woman in question was examined, and it was found that she herself had written all four (apparently) different handwritings, including the letters to herself. It was found that she was in love with the manager, that he didn't know it, and that in her desperation to win him and attract his attention she took this means of arousing his sympathy.

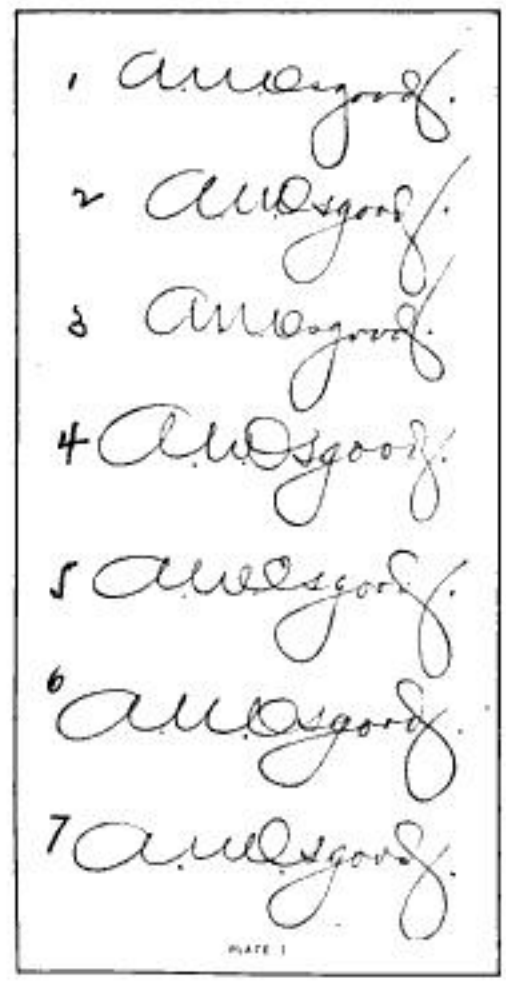

PLATE I

A TEST OF EXPERT SKILL

Plate 1 serves to illustrate two things: first, a court-room test to trip the expert, and, second, to show how even a skillful forger overlooks some marked characteristics. This particular case is selected because of its simplicity, as even a layman can see the differences without study. During cross-examination of the writer by a New York attorney (one of the most skillful offhand simulators of signatures in the country), these seven signatures written in lead pencil were handed to the writer and he was asked to pick out the genuine from the forged. The witness asked the court for an hour's time to study them, and this was allowed. In fifteen minutes, however, he picked out numbers one and three as the genuine and the five others as forged. This was right. The defendant, following this decision, pleaded guilty.

No one can write his name twice exactly alike—that is, so that when one signature is placed over another and the two held up to the light that but one signature appears. When two signatures are found that exactly superimpose it may be accepted as a fact that at least one of them is a forgery. In all handwriting there is a normal, healthful variation.

Tracings are made in various ways; by holding the sheet of paper between the light and the eye with copy to be traced beneath; or by making copy on tracing cloth or paper and transferring it in lead pencil and then inking it over. Photographic reproductions are also sometimes made. Traced writings usually show in the quality of the lines that they are not genuine. The lines look too formal, halting, hesitating—lacking the life of genuine, offhand, cursive writing.

The question of "guided" hand occasionally arises. This term is applied to writing when the writer's hand has been guided by the hand of another. This is done frequently when the writer is ill, and as the person assisting very often injects his or her characteristics into the handwriting of the signer, it raises a dispute as to whether or not the signature was the voluntary act of the signer.

A difficult thing to imitate is the tremulousness of old age—and in several important cases forgers have been unmasked by attempting it. A strong, controlled hand, simulating weakness and uncontrol is certain to betray its strength at some point and almost certain to overdo the tremor at others.

That handwriting, when once thoroughly learned, and beyond the period when thought is given to the mechanical part, is entirely unconscious reflex action there can be no doubt. Even while writing this article the writer has found his mind at times intent on other subjects—yet his pen has been flying over the paper at the rate of thirty-five words a minute.

The question has arisen whether or not a hypnotized person would retain his characteristic handwriting. Checks, notes, deeds and various documents have been signed in apparently natural handwriting of individuals who afterward claimed that they were in a hypnotic state at the time they signed them. On the other hand, it was contended that if these individuals were in other than their normal state their writing would be totally different. The writer investigated the subject, but could find no records of any tests.

The two specimens shown in Plate 2 were written by a young man twenty years of age—one in his normal state, the other in a hypnotic state—in a test made by the writer in 1898. It will be noticed that the characteristic misspelling of the word "speciman" is also the same, and that the two samples of writing are characteristically the same. This is further proof that handwriting is unconscious reflex action.

DETECTING RAISED DRAFTS AND CHECKS

The ink used in the handwriting often takes a decisive part in disputed writing cases. Crossed or superimposed ink lines have settled many a case. Where it is claimed that all writings on a document were put there at one time, and it can be shown that some lines, which, in order of writing, should have been put on the paper first, were in reality put on after others, of course fraud is evident. And if the document purports to be all written in one ink and two or more are found, this, too, is an indication of fraud.

The writer had an interesting case a few years ago where a few words were added to a check after it had been canceled and returned from the bank. It was important to know whether or not these words were on the check when it was given to the payee. The check had been canceled by punching out of the paper the word "Paid." To give the appearance of genuineness to the added words they were run so close to holes made by the punch as to run into the holes. This is where the forger made his mistake. An examination under the microscope showed that the edges of paper—the wall of the punch holes—where ink lines overran, in the disputed writing, were smeared with ink, and there was even a little ink around the punch holes on the back of the check. Where the punch had run through the dry ink lines in the original writing no such phenomena existed.

TRICKS OF CRIMINAL PENMEN

A common trick is to "raise" or alter documents by chemical erasures, additions and alterations. It is an easy matter to change nine to nineteen hundred, or nine thousand or nineteen thousand, and it is frequently done. The Nevada Bank case, where a twelve-dollar draft was altered to read twenty-two thousand dollars, is one of the most recent successful raisings. Another scheme is the erasing, by means of chemicals, of the body of a document—a receipt or short letter—leaving the signature unaltered, and writing a note or obligation over the genuine signature.

The handwriting expert must be an ink expert as well, and must equip himself with the necessary chemicals. He must know the constituents of the many kinds of ink, how erasing fluids and reagents act on them, and know how to restore faded and erased ink lines, etc. Comparatively little is known of the chemistry of ink—even by ink laboratory chemists—and there is much charlatan posing by many so called "ink experts." There is no ink made that is a safety ink—that is, that will withstand the action of chemicals and water. The various "protectors" in shape of special papers, etc., have been found too expensive and cumbersome, and, after all, do not protect.

The paper used in disputed documents often furnishes a clue to a forgery. The water-mark, the ruling, the fibre, all have to be examined, and the expert is expected to be able to do this. The microscope is of great service in examining handwriting, ink and paper. Simulated tremulousness, patched and overwritten lines, the serrations of an ink line, the fibre of the paper and the nerve tremor can all be studied best under the microscope.

Graphology is sometimes confounded with the work of the handwriting expert. The graphologist pretends to read in the handwriting the character of the writer; the handwriting expert reads the characteristics of the handwriting. The graphologist claims to read character only in undisguised writing—some of them even going so far as to say that it is unfair to submit to them even an undisguised specimen which was written for that special purpose. The handwriting expert has to compare disguised with undisguised writing and identify the writer. The graphologist is unable to identify the writer of a document where the writing is forged.

In this, as in other professions, a notoriety-seeking, newspaper-puffed charlatan can do more damage to the calling in a year than many honest and skilled men can repair in a lifetime. And the profession of expert handwriting has attracted to it charlatans who would disgrace and bring odium on any calling.

The writer believes the remedy for this evil and all others is to have official court experts.

When the days of official experts are here we can look for greater confidence in opinions expressed, and the wider use of the identification of the individual by his handwriting. And in that day life and property will be safer.

Sixteenth Chapter

AS SOON as they had drifted some little distance from the Serapis, O'Neill arose, threw off the boat cloak and stepped aft to the stern-sheets, where Elizabeth sat motionless, holding the tiller. He knelt down before her.

"Elizabeth, dearest, we have actually escaped!" he said softly, stooping toward her. "I did not think it possible." Elizabeth released the tiller, took his head in her hands and kissed him in happy exultation.

"Free! Free!" she murmured, "and together—my own, my own!"

"Yes, yes; and with you!" he whispered, giving back kiss for kiss and stretching out his hands toward her. There was a little pause broken by a rough voice, which the owner had evidently tried to render more gentle. In a hoarse whisper the man at the oars asked: "W'ere are ye a-headin' of the boat, Yer Leddyship?"

"I know not," she answered wildly, seizing the tiller again, "only away from that awful ship."

"Who is this man at the oars?" asked O'Neill, sitting down by Elizabeth, and taking the tiller from her nervous hands.

"Well, Yer Honor," said a low, deep voice with a smothered laugh in it, "my name ashore w'ere I was left by Cap'n Jones t'other night to look arter you, mought be Smith, or Brown, or anything else, but yere in this boat it's Price—William P. Price."

"Price!" exclaimed O'Neill in great surprise. "How did you find him, dearest?"

"I found her, please Yer Honor," replied the man. "I seed Her Leddyship a-comin' down to the beach, an' I ups an' captures a small boat from the English, which the man'll be awful disapp'inted like w'en he don't find her to-morrow, an' then I ups an' offers to take her, an' I tells her I knows you an' we fixed it up, an' here y'are!"

They were not yet so far from the Serapis, even by this time, but that the quick ear of the girl detected the confusion on her decks; heard the shrill piping of the boatswain and his mates, the sharp commands of the officers, the trampling of many feet. She clutched her lover nervously, all alert at the thought of further danger to him.

"Oh," she whispered, "they are doing something on the ship. Our escape is discovered; they will come after us."

"Not with the whole ship," he answered smiling.

"I think they're gittin' under way, sir," observed the old seaman. "Listen to the clankin' o' the pawls, Yer Honor."

"You are right. It cannot be after us, though. A cutter or two would suffice for that."

"It'll be fur the Richard an' the rest of 'em. Our weasel ought to be a-comin' up from Flamburry putty soon, now. But if I mought make so bold, w'ere are ye headin' fur now, sir?"

"We head for the Richard, of course," said the young man promptly.

"That's w'ere we b'long," said the sailor joyfully. "I don't want no fightin' goin' on an' I ain't there."

"Nor I," replied O'Neill. "I would put you ashore, Elizabeth, before we go, but——"

"'Whither thou goest, I will go; . . . . thy people shall be my people,'" she quoted softly.

"Oh, to be worthy of it all, to be worthy!" he answered.

William grinned sympathetically, wiped his mouth wistfully with the back of his hand and tried to look away. Presently, unshipping the oars, the two men stepped the mast and hoisted the small sail. The little boat under the freshening breeze began to draw through the water rapidly. In order to win out of the mouth of the harbor they would have to pass in a direction which would bring them once more near the moving Serapis. They could hardly hope to escape discovery. They had, of course, gained a good start on the frigate, but as her great height enabled her to catch the freshening breeze blowing over the hills, which was lost to the smaller craft, she literally rushed down upon them.

A noble picture she made to those in the boat. Ghostlike and eerie in the pale moonlight shining fitfully through the overcast heavens, the great white ship towered above them, her soaring masts covered with clouds of snowy canvas stretching far out on either side on the spreading yardarms. Her sails swept the skies, her keel ploughed the deeps, the wind sang in the top hamper; the white water, shot with sparks, piled up in front of her, bubbled and played around her forefoot, and rolled away on either side in broad sheets of foamy phosphorescence. The yellow lights of the battle-lanterns streamed through her open ports, a drum was grimly rolling the call to battle on her decks. Dark forms passed to and fro; men leaped hither and thither in casting loose the double row of great black guns; sometimes a vivid flash in the moonlight proclaimed a drawn sword. Presently the cries and orders died away, the men settled down at their stations; silently the huge fabric, a splendid example of that power which for twice two hundred years had ruled the seas, swept toward them. O'Neill watched her with generous admiration.

"A fit antagonist even for our great Captain," he cried, all his enthusiasm aroused by the ship. "And nobly handled," he added. "Mark the discipline; see the order!"

"Ay, sir, that'll be a hard one to take, but we'll take her, never fear," said the old seaman, sharing his officer's ungrudging approbation of their gallant foe.

As they drew toward the mouth of the harbor the wind came stronger. The little boat fairly roared through the white-capped waves. She heeled over until the water trickled in on the lee side, but O'Neill resolutely and skillfully held her up to it. He could not afford to lose an inch of distance to leeward, for the water shallowed rapidly in that direction, and abounded in rocks as well. The Serapis was alongside now—they had not yet been observed. The attention of the men on the frigate was fixed upon the approaching ships to the southeast, now plainly visible. O'Neill fairly held his breath as he congratulated himself that they were to be passed by unnoticed. Suddenly a sharp cry rang out just as the Serapis drew ahead.

"Sail ho! Boat ahoy there!" For a moment the small boat lay right in the path of light cast by the brilliantly illuminated stern-ports of the frigate.

"'Tis the prisoner! He that escaped!" shouted a powerful voice.

"Sentry, give him a shot from your piece!" cried Captain Pearson himself, springing on the rail and leaning over toward them. Old Price shook his fist at the frigate in stout defiance. The sharp crack of a musket rang out in the air. The bullet seemed to have struck something forward in the boat. A shudder swept through the little craft, a hoarse cry quivered through the night; there was a splash, the boat struck something, and that something, whatever it was, rasped along her keel as she drove ahead.

"Clear away the second cutter," cried another voice on the frigate.

"Keep all fast," shouted Pearson; "we have bigger game to-night," and then he hollowed his hand and cried out as the Serapis drew rapidly away: "We'll take care of you, sir, in the morning, when we return!" A few more musket shots were fired at them from different parts of the ship. One bullet tore through the sail and whistled by the ear of the young Lieutenant, but did no harm.

"We are saved again," cried Elizabeth.

"But not without a cost," said the young man solemnly.

"What mean you? Are you hurt?" she cried.

"Price!" called O'Neill softly, though he knew it was useless.

There was no answer.

"It was he," added O'Neill gravely; "he was hit by the first shot and went overboard. Did you not feel him strike the keel?"

"He helped us—both of us—in time of need—our way to liberty and happiness seems to be over the bodies of those who love us," she cried piteously.

"So it has ever been in the world; a thousand deaths to make one life, a thousand griefs to make one joy," he answered, laying his hand tenderly upon her head.

"But, come what may," she added, looking up resolutely with all the selfishness of love, "I have you at last, and we are together again."

"Aye, let us pray it may be forever, sweetheart."

They were out of the harbor now, and the Serapis was stretching along to the northeast to gain an offing, with the Scarborough some distance ahead of her and to leeward. The lighter draft of the small boat permitted O'Neill to head her directly for the coming American ships, whose lights, and the ships themselves, were now plainly visible in the moonlight.

Seventeenth Chapter

"THE battle which will take place to-night, yonder, decides my fate," said O'Neill. "I hope to Heaven I may arrive in time to take my part in it. The Richard is fearfully short of officers at best; Landais, who has the Alliance, is crazy and a coward; Cottineau, in the Pallas, is an unknown quantity, and the rest have fled. Jones has only Richard Dale and a lot of midshipmen with him upon whom he can absolutely depend, and there are over two hundred prisoners in the hold. He needs me. If this breeze holds on I think we may intercept the Richard before the battle begins. Pray, dearest, as never before, for the success of our arms. It means life, and you, for me."

"It means life for me as well," Elizabeth answered, nestling against O'Neill and nerving herself up to the inevitable confession. How he would take it she did not know, or rather she would not permit herself to guess. She was conscious only of an impelling necessity to tell him the whole story, though she had deliberately waited until she believed he could do nothing.

"Ah, yes, 'tis sweet of you to say so, but not the same. Me they will hang, but not you," he answered fondly.

"Yes, they will," she replied. "I—I—I must confesseit to you before we go further; it weighs upon me. I also am guilty."

"Guilty! You! Of what, pray? Of loving me too much?" he queried, laughing in pure lightness of heart.

"No, not that," she answered, "but that—that order—your reprieve. It was—the Admiral did not sign it," she added desperately.

The murder was out.

'And who did, then?" he said, still auspicious of her meaning.

'I did it myself," she answered with rted head.

'It is not possible!" he exclaimed, with- wing from her a little in his astonishment.

''Twas for you — for you I did it — reproach not; nay, you shall not!" she cried, on to defend herself and her love, now the ret was out. "Captain Jones said six irs' delay and you were saved. 'I knew you would not like it," she swered, "but there was no other way. onfess I was terrified when Edward——"

"Good Heavens!" cried O'Neill, "he the order?"

"Yes," said the girl, cowering before him ain. In truth, this phase of the transaction d actually escaped her memory.

"Captain Pearson accepted it without questioning him?" he queried. She would have given all the world to lie to him, but even in the darkness she could not be further untrue, in his very presence, though now in a flash she saw it all.

"He — he doubted it," she whispered hesitatingly. "He handed the paper to Edward and asked him if it — it was all right."

"And Coventry?"

"He took it and looked at it, looked at me — I had forgotten him, I must confess," she went on brokenly, "and then he handed it back to Captain Pearson, and — and said it was correct — the signature, I mean."

"He knew, think you?" asked her lover with deadly calmness.

"Yes, he knew," she faltered.

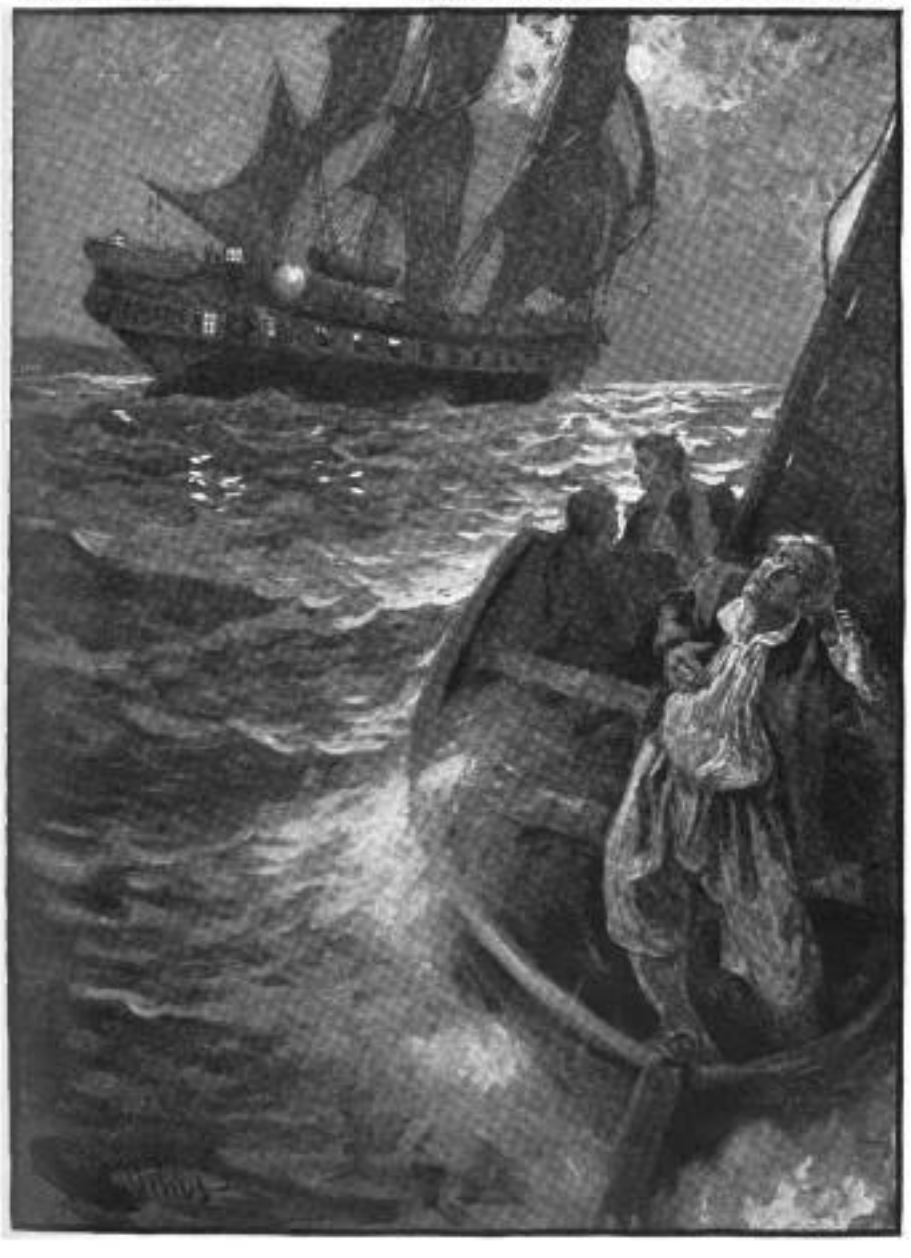
"And the sentry — our unheeded escape?"

"Edward took his place; I might as well tell you all now," continued the girl desperately.

"Ah!" he said coldly and sternly; "and do you know, Lady Elizabeth, what the penalty is for such acts as his?"

"No," she replied in alarm; "I never thought. They will not harm him. He is the son of the Admiral — what is it?"

"They will shoot him, or hang him like a dog to the very yardarm prepared for me!" he answered with stern emphasis.



"No, no! It is not possible!" she cried, appalled at the naked fact.

"Aye, but it is," he replied, "and it is through your acts, and my blind acquiescence therein, that this honorable gentleman is done to death. This puts another face on the thing. You have made me a craven — I am dishonored — his life is sacrificed for me!"

"I did not mean to do it; I did not know," she wailed, stricken to the heart by his bitter reproach.

"Aye, but you should have known; but when women meddle in affairs of state the consequences oft exceed their narrow views. Pray God there may yet be time to rectify the frightful happening," said O'Neill bitterly, putting the helm hard over as he spoke.

A HOARSE CRY QUIVERED THROUGH THE NIGHT

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Next week's Post will contain, among other strong features, a timely story by Marie Corelli, dealing with conditions growing out of the war in South Africa:

The Laurels of the Brave

The scene is laid in London, and the chief characters are a heartless, ambitious society woman (whose husband is just outside Ladysmith) and a pushing, self-advertising actress. The author's descriptions of Mrs. Long-Adder, who gives recitations in khaki uniform; of Prince Dummer-Esel and Mrs. Arteroyd, is the severest and most brilliant arraignment of the Society Department of the War Office which has yet been written.

By MARIE CORELLI

Memories of Moody

The second paper in this notable series on the life and work of the great preacher by his son.

By W. R. MOODY

The New Rich Element

In New York society. A paper devoted to wealthy New Yorkers who are knocking at the doors of society.

By MRS. BURTON HARRISON

The Hold Up

The adventures of a delegation on the way to a Presidential convention—a clever story of exceptional humor.

By MOLLY ELLIOT SEAWELL

Moving the Big Show

One of the most entertaining papers in the late W. C. Coup's reminiscences of an Old Showman.

By W. C. COUP

Hamlin Garland's Serial

THE EAGLE'S HEART, a powerful serial story of Western life, will begin in an early number. The hero is a proud, fearless, wayward boy, who takes a new name and begins life afresh among the cattlemen. His career is an exciting one and his adventures many. His story, though strongly dramatic, is faithfully and graphically told. Few living writers know the great West as Mr. Garland learned it when he toiled in the wheatfields, herded cattle on the grassy ranges, and lived in the saddle for weeks at a time.

Stories by Ian Maclaren

IAN MACLAREN has written for the Post a series of six delightful stories which centre about A Scots Grammar School. These tales are based upon the author's own schooldays at Stirling Grammar School. All who read the first series of tales of A Scots Grammar School — which appeared in the Post last summer — will wish to follow the fortunes of Spiug, Nestie and the Dowbiggins, and their lovable old master, "Bulldog." These delightful stories of Scotch life will appear in early numbers of the Post.

The boat swept around, the sail gybed, and they headed for the northeast.

"What is it you would do?" cried Elizabeth, laying her hand on the tiller.

"Follow the Serapis," he answered shortly.

"For what?"

"To give myself up, if possible, and thus insure his freedom."

"I knew—I knew it would be so," she whispered. "I loved him," she murmured, turning away. "I have sacrificed everything for him, and he repudiates, reproaches me. Oh, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me!" she wailed in unconscious imitation of a greater sufferer. She drew away from him and knelt down in the boat, buried her face in her hands, leaning upon the weather gunwale. He looked at her a moment, and before the pathetic abandonment of her grief his anger melted. She was a woman; with her, love was all.

"Elizabeth," he said tenderly, "the bitterness of having caused that good man's death, his apparent dishonor, overwhelmed me. I love you, as you know, more than life itself. You are a woman—you see things differently. There is nothing above love in a woman's heart. Come back to me; your place is here, whatever happens. I love you the more for your great sacrifice, but now we must undo it if we can. Heaven has not smiled upon our meeting. Perhaps if we go hand in hand before God together we may find mercy; perhaps joy."

Elizabeth made no answer, but nestled against him, forgiven, contented. For a time they sailed the sea in silence. The clouds had broken and left a clear sky whence the moon had flooded the ocean with her silvery light, but the breeze came fitfully, and gradually died away where they now were, under the lee of the land. It was such a night as lovers dream of. They loved and they were together, side by side, alone, in the soft autumnal night, adrift on a summer sea. There was that in the past which kept them silent, and yet in their very proximity, in the hands that touched and clasped each other, the head that nestled on his shoulder, the arm that encircled her waist, the lips that met, the eyes that spoke, there was a sweetness which neither had ever known before.

By and by Elizabeth slipped down from the thwart and crouched down in the boat at his feet. O'Neill held the tiller with one hand, the other lightly stroked her golden hair. She was peacefully content; everything was out of her heart but him and the present; she was very still. O'Neill could see the soft curve of her cheek resting upon her sweet white hand in the moonlight. After one of the little intervals of silence he looked down upon her again. She made no motion, and did not reply to a word. He discovered that she was asleep.

He did not wonder. The experiences of the past few days would have killed any ordinary woman. How heroic she had been! With what abandon she had put aside everything for the purpose of saving him! She had not hesitated at anything. His love for her was measured by his honor—hers for him was boundless. 'Twas ever so, and he had reproached her, spoken harshly to her, upbraided her, turned away from her. Now his heart yearned over her. He vowed that if God did permit them to escape from the perils which environed them he would make up to her for every unkind word spoken, every reproach, every cutting glance, by an eternity of devotion.

The night, the ocean, the loneliness impressed him. What had he ever done to be so blessed in the love of this noble woman? His life, as he had said, had been an idle one. In the courts he had played at hearts as he played at war on the ships, for the fun of the game. With her a serious purpose had entered his life and was before him. The silence of the night was broken only by the soft splash of the waves, as the little boat rocked gently through them. The gentle wind grew fainter and fainter; presently the flap of the idle sail against the mast apprised him that it had gone.

The white Serapis and her consort were far, far ahead, going fast and leaving a long white wake across the sea. They seemed to have kept the breeze which had failed the small boat. Coming up from the southward he could see the black shapes of the Richard and her attendant ships. What would he not have given to be upon the deck by the side of that dauntless Captain? But even could he approach the two ships that privilege would be denied him, for honor demanded that he present himself upon the deck of the Serapis without delay. It might be that it would be too late even then to save Coventry, but he would go and do his best. When the boat lost way he sat a moment in indecision. He was loth to awaken the tired girl, but it was necessary. Gently he raised her head.

"Why, my dearest," she said, "was I asleep? What has happened? Oh!" It came back to her. "You are going back to the Serapis." Then she looked eagerly forward. The ships were far off now, several miles away, and as the breeze still held with them, the distance was increasing with every passing moment.

"We do not advance," she cried, a note of joy in her voice, as her ear detected the flapping of the sail. "The wind has died out." She laughed triumphantly. "We will never reach them."

"And poor Coventry," said O'Neill.

"I cannot help it," she answered simply; "I think only of you. Now, if I could go back alone and take his place and let you go free, I would cheerfully do that."

"What advantage would that be to me?" he asked her.

"Well, there is little use in our discussing it any more, for you cannot reach either ship now before it is over. The wind has gone over to them, and we are still."

"Ah, but I have another way of getting along."

"How is that?"

"I shall row," he said quietly; "will you take the tiller?"

"No," she replied defiantly, folding her arms, "I will not help you at all."

"Elizabeth! Elizabeth!" he murmured.

"I will not, I tell you!" she said. "Frankly, I do not wish to. What is Edward, what are those ships, what is the whole world to me beside your safety?"

"I must do it alone, as best I can, then," said O'Neill, leaving her side and going forward and unstepping the mast and thrusting out the oars, which he handled with the skill of long practice and strong arms. The difference of speed between the boat and the two ships was now, of course, less than before.

"Why fatigue yourself unnecessarily?" she said to him at last, after he had been rowing for some time; "you gain nothing; 'tis useless."

"No matter," was his reply as he desperately tugged at the oars, "I shall at least have the consciousness of knowing I did what I could." But after pulling hard for an hour, he leaned over the handles of the oars and, turning his head, looked forward. She was right; it was a perfectly hopeless task. The nearest ships were now ten or a dozen miles away, and going farther, when a flash of light pierced the darkness on the horizon, followed some time after by the roar of a heavy gun.

More About the Anglo-Saxon *

WE HAVE heard a vast deal about Anglo-Saxons during the last few years, and it cannot be claimed that the subject commends itself for freshness or originality; but Aline Gorren has much to say that is interesting, and much that is true. If she does not openly question the superiority of the dominant race—a heresy too frightful to be contemplated in cold blood—she has nevertheless a sneaking preference for Latin civilization which keeps her heart steady and her head cool when she comes to classify and compare. She feels the strength and the momentum of the English-speaking people, the economic greatness of men who have carried the Gospel of Action and the Gospel of Comfort triumphantly over the world; but she is incapable of that popular delusion which accepts "the career of the Anglo-Saxon nations as an object lesson vouchsafed by a Higher Power in order that the other nations of the earth might learn what course to take if they would reach the most exalted dignity."

In fact, the value of this thoughtful little volume lies in its breadth and serenity—I had almost said in its good humor as well. Its author, tracing with infinite pains the early influences which moulded Saxon and Teuton and Celt, finds in each race the qualities essential to its well-being. No one can hope to develop on another's lines, and nothing is less worth while than the flaunting of purely national characteristics, as if they were an example and a necessity to the world. Thus the fundamental formative desire of the Frenchman "to secure mental ease through the play of social activities" is as incomprehensible to the Englishman as his own steady cultivation of the "practical virtues" is incomprehensible to his Gallic neighbor.

French rationalism stands terribly in the way of this practicality. "Tartuffe," says Miss Gorren, "knew that he played a double part—that he appeared to be a saint, and was in reality a low-lived liar. An Anglo-Saxon is not conscious of being a missionary with half a breath and an excellent commercial speculator with the other half. He is not conscious of duality; and if he be ever brought to realize it, he asks 'Why not?' He will not understand that others see an incompatibility, an illogicality which shocks them. For him no illogicality exists."

Equally suggestive are the comments upon Anglo-Saxon humanitarianism, that earnest and dutiful endeavor to help the needy, which has yet never bridged for one moment the deadly chasm between rich and poor; which has never—in spite of rigid truth and justice—bridged for one moment the chasm between black and white, conquerors and conquered. In contrast to this unflinching and unlovely goodness, Miss Gorren points out with a smile "small French missions scattered through the Levant whose modest history is full of a certain characteristic charm of sunny patience, broad humaneness, and debonair philosophy which is very captivating, and which, when it is contrasted with things that we know of our own missionary attitude, might well give us something to think about."

Indeed, there is much food for thought in all Miss Gorren says, and it is the kind of food which may nourish tolerance in place of self-esteem. —Agnes Repplier.

A Ten Years' War *

MR. JACOB A. RIIS is one of those useful citizens who does not know what it is to despair. Without some such as he this world would not be half so good a place to live in as it is; if we had a great many such as he the world would improve by leaps and bounds, instead of creeping so slowly that only the cheerfully optimistic can always remain hopeful and confident.

This new book by Mr. Riis tells of the long battle with the slums in New York. When he and his associates began their war on these plague spots, these beds of crime, these centres of poverty, there seemed to be very little hope that they would be able to accomplish anything. They were opposed by Tammany Hall, the landlords were against them, and even the unfortunate tenants in the slums did not wish to be disturbed; though they were far from happy, there were very many who did not know that there was a possibility of anything better. Those hopelessly submerged by poverty saw in any change a worse condition, for such people are always getting worse off. Then the criminals find congenial surroundings in the slums; they like the filth and the gloom, and find security in the dark places with such picturesque names as Hell's Kitchen and Bone Alley.

Under such circumstances it took bold spirits and brave hearts to accomplish what has been done in the metropolis where the worst of these tenement-house slums have been wiped out of existence.

Mr. Riis gives to the late Colonel Waring credit for having done more to show that slums need not exist than had been previously demonstrated. When Colonel Waring undertook to clean the streets of New York, practical men said that he would not have any measure of success. "He will be able to clean Fifth Avenue and a few such thoroughfares, but when he gets into the tenement house section and the few quarter he will surely fail." But he did not fail. He cleaned the great central thoroughfares, and he cleaned also Mott Street and Hester Street and Mulberry Bend. He cleaned the whole town. And the good men who believed that the city slums were pest holes and schools of vice which menaced the town took renewed courage and attacked them with increased vigor. Now they are gone, and some of the very sorest spots have been changed into public parks with trees and green grass. Where misery used to hide itself and where vice was formerly on parade, fountains now are playing and on summer evenings there is music for all who care to listen.

Mr. Riis tells about the efforts to secure these reforms and changes in most entertaining fashion. He is a very skilful workman and a thorough master of his tools. He never tells too much and he never "slops over." He is entirely frank, but there is still that reserve of strength which makes the reader sure that he might have said much more if he had chosen to do so. Then there is one other charming characteristic about the book. It is lightened and lighted by a naive humor which discloses itself shyly rather than boldly. It is therefore a pleasure to read this book—a pleasure and a profit. It is surely good to know that in this busy and tolerably sordid world there are unselfish men and women who are willing to work long and hard, not for their own personal gain, but for the betterment of the poor and unfortunate. —Jno. Gilmer Speed.

Remodeling a Gown

Becomes a pleasing occupation, provided it was stitched on a Singer Automatic. The elastic seam made by this machine is perfectly safe when locked, but can be taken apart in an instant when unlocked. Thus its use is especially desirable for the clever woman who wishes to make over a garment so that it may conform to the changing styles. Whether in the hands of the amateur or the expert, this simple bit of mechanism is the most convenient and effective of any. Having all the advantages claimed for other "automatic" sewing machines, the Silent Singer has many points of preference that can easily be demonstrated by comparison. Of faultless construction and finish, it is absolutely the lightest-running, the simplest and most compact. It is more easily threaded, and its parts are better protected from dust. The broad treadle better promotes the health and comfort of the operator, because it is lower and the position of the feet can be changed at will. These points are worthy careful consideration by those of delicate health or unaccustomed to continuous use of a sewing machine.

AN UNDECIDED YOUNG LADY

By Hayden Carruth

COMING from Boston to New York the other night I met an entertaining chap in the smoking-room of the sleeping-car. He told several stories—and how seldom you meet a man nowadays who ever tells a story, especially on a train coming out of Boston! But this man I am convinced was not a Boston man—in fact he said he lived in Denver. There was some talk about the alleged vacillating policy of a well-known officer of the National Government when this Denver man said:

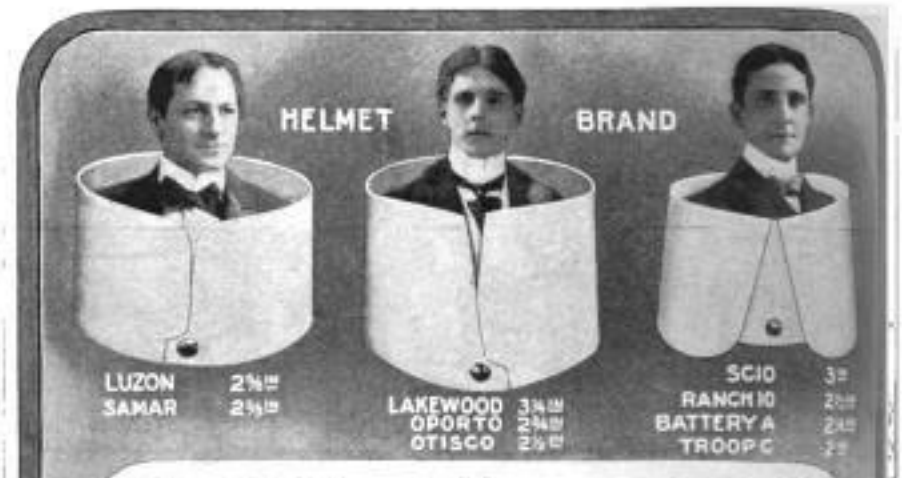
"This thing of not knowing your own mind always makes trouble. The worst person I ever knew for it was a girl where I used to live, named Alice Merrington. She never knew her own mind. Didn't pretend to. Why, she couldn't even make up her mind how she wanted her new clothes, and was usually six months behind the fashions, just wearing her old clothes, and changing her mind about how it would be best to have her new ones made.

"Well, Alice was a pretty good-looking girl, and you couldn't help liking her, so she had plenty of attention from the young men. Two of them, one named Thornton and the other Ross, got particularly smitten, and pretty soon they both proposed.

"Alice studied over the thing for a long while, but she couldn't come to no decision, so the only way she could see out of it was to promise 'em both. So she done it, but it didn't do much good, 'cause they were wideawake fellows, and didn't cotton to the idea of much delay. They both kept coaxing her to name the happy day, and she soon saw that she had got to do something. She simply couldn't make up her mind which she wanted, so there was nothing for it but to give 'em both the same day, and trust to luck for something to turn up to make her decide. As her folks opposed them both, an elopement was the thing in either case, so she told each of them to come at one o'clock Thursday morning. She reckoned like this, that one of them would be certain to arrive before the other, and with him she'd go; and of course the other couldn't blame her, since delays are dangerous, as everybody knows.

"Well, Wednesday evening the girl went to bed at eight o'clock, knowing what an early start she'd got to make the next morning. To make sure, she set the alarm of her clock at half-past twelve. Alarm went off at the right time and she got up and dressed. All ready ten minutes to one, so she turned down the light and waited. She had told Thornton to come to the west winder and Ross to the north—just happened to give 'em different winders. As she sot and thought it over she was glad that she'd done it, 'cause it would be better if the second should happen to come before the first had got away—less embarrassment all around. Awful well-meaning girl—no desire to hurt anybody's feelings. So she just sot and waited, naturally her young heart in considerable of a flutter, not knowing but the dog might bark and wake up her father, and also being so uncertain as to which of the young men of her choice she was going to spend the long years ahead of her with, for better or for worse.

"Well, you never seen what luck that girl had. Just as the clock hand p'inted to one she heard a slight rustle outside. The next second she seen the top of a ladder appear at the north winder, and as she turned her eyes to the west winder there was another just looming up above the sill. Something had got to be done, or they'd both be scrambling in; so she just stepped quickly to the north winder and said to Ross in a loud whisper, 'Take the ladder 'round to the west winder, dear,' and then to the other and says to Thornton, 'Take your ladder 'round to the north winder, dear,' and then she just waited and tried to ascertain her true feelings.



"And while she stood there, torn by conflicting emotions, them two strong men started with their ladders carried straight up, and at the corner they just naturally blundered into each other in the dark, and one ladder slammed ag'in' the house and the other smashed into a cherry tree, and the men, being some surprised, happened both to say something and recognized each other's voice, and, already not being at all friendly, went to fighting most tremendous.

"And in the thickest of the hullabaloo, them two young men fighting scandalous, and nothing quieter 'cept the dog, which was now busy biting, there was a bright flare of light overhead, and the policeman seen that the girl had set off a flash-light and took a snap-shot at the difficulty below, she being a great hand at amateur photography, as I ought to of said before, but I forgot it. So the policeman just arrested 'em both, and hollered to the girl and asked her if she knowed what it was all about, and she, not wanting to be mixed up with any such disgraceful proceedings, said she didn't, but she s'posed they was fighting just because they was horrid men, who always delight to bark and bite and make beasts of themselves. Then she went back to bed and the officer towed 'em to the calaboose, and the next morning the judge soaked 'em good and hard and read 'em a lecture.

"As for the girl, she developed the negative and put the pictures on the local market, where they sold like hot cakes, and brought in a tidy sum; and a month after she married a likely fellow, a sort of a second cousin, with the approval of her folks, and a good wife she made, too, so everybody said, though she never did show much decision, so I heard; but, shucks, what difference does that make—I know women who show too everlasting much decision."

The Laurels of the Brave

The Laurels of the Brave

By Marie Corelli

SHE was a thin, tall, "willowy" woman, long-necked, auburn-haired ("Titian Gloire" her coiffeur called it on the bottle) and dark-eyed, with a carefully got-up complexion, and an expensive way of wearing her clothes. She never paid less than thirty guineas for a "plain" morning gown and ten guineas for a "simple" hat. The prices of the various other articles of her attire may thus, by these little items, be dimly guessed at.

Whenever she moved, shook her silk skirts, or played with her handkerchief, a faint odor was exhaled from her person, an odor supposed to be "violets," but more like the last trail of a muskrat. She passed for being very romantic and spirituelle, owing to a trick she had of clasping her hands and looking up at the sky or the ceiling in a sudden dumb ecstasy. She would do this, often without warning, in the middle of an ordinary commonplace conversation, greatly disconcerting every one else who happened to be present. Good-natured people said it was her "soul-forces" that got too strong for her on these occasions; others shook their heads darkly and hinted that she had "too much brain." As a matter of fact, however, neither soul-forces nor brain power were concerned in her composition, and the rapt pose which she found so effective was the chief stock-in-trade of the leading lady at one of the theatres, from whom she had carefully copied it. Few women studied "histrionic" attitudes as arduously as she did, and the chief object with which she ever attended a play at all was that she might take mental note of the languishing movements, the roll of the painted eyes, and the airs and graces generally of the newest fashionable heroine of the footlights.

Yet with all the trouble she took, and all the nervous excitement she suffered lest any "other" woman of her particular style and contour should turn up and compete with her on her own lines of conquest, she was not so much in the "social swim" as she craved to be. No; there was some fatality about it. She, "the beautiful Mrs. Arteroyd," as she was occasionally called in society paragraphs (she having paid the modest sum of five pounds for this distinction to the enterprising lady-journalist who "arranged" for such special items of interest), was not yet where she fain would be. She had made a poor marriage, or so she considered it. Her husband was only a Colonel in the British Army—just a man with a V. C.

Other women, older and plainer, had "caught" or bought real live Russian Princes. They—the said Princes—had not any V. C., but then their wives were Princesses, and went everywhere, and everybody said: "There is the Princess Rumstuffski!" or "How charming the Princess Numskullskoff is looking!" Why was she not a Princess Rumstuffski? Why had an unkind Fate elected her to be the wife of a mere British officer, with a V. C. won in the prime of his manhood? And with absolutely no fortune! Though, when she first fell in love with him she had considered him very well off, and herself very lucky. He was the only son of a saving father, who had left him an income of about three thousand a year, the result of capital soundly and safely invested. But what was three thousand a year to a "spirituelle" creature of super-sensitive intelligence? Nothing!—absolutely nothing! Especially at such a time as the present, when excessive, ostentatious, vulgar, brazen wealth is the only pass-key into what is called "society." Poor Mrs. Arteroyd! She had tried all sorts of ways to obtain a firm footing on that slippery ladder which, like the magic beanstalk of the fairy tale, is supposed to lead aspiring Jacks and Jills to that mysterious region entitled "the Upper Ten" and "the top of the tree," but what success she had won was too perilously like failure to be altogether gratifying.

Sitting in her cosy boudoir she thought it all over, the while she read the morning newspapers sulkily—they were full of war news—nothing but war! war! war! How sick she was of the war! How tired of all the deaths and wounds and blunders and casualties and botherments generally! She skimmed quickly through the list of "killed and wounded," just to see whether her husband was among them.

"And I look my worst in black," she commented, as she glanced from name to name of all those included in the terrible "Death Roll of Honor." But no, Colonel John Arteroyd, V. C., was not mentioned as either slain or wounded, or sick of fever; there was no allusion to him anywhere as being in or out of action, and when she had made herself quite sure of this she breathed more freely. There was no occasion for her to "look her worst" just yet.

"Poor old Jack!" she said; "I'm glad he's all right so far! I don't know why I look for his name in the papers at all, I'm sure, for, of course, I should hear direct from the War Office if—if anything had happened. But I daresay he's really as happy as the day is long. He was mad to go to the Transvaal, and now he's there I hope he likes it. He was made for active service."

Her hard brown eyes flashed coldly up and down the columns of news again, like sharp bits of steel getting ready to cut through the insensible paper; what a number of extraordinary things were being associated with the war, she thought; and what an exceptionally "good time" some of the "leaders" of society were making for themselves out of "Tommy Atkins!"

"Fancy!" she suddenly exclaimed, as she caught sight of a paragraph placed prominently among other items of "court and society gossip." "There's that horrible little fat woman, the Marquise Dégagée, pushing herself everywhere, all because she's getting up a Babies' Fund! What an idea! 'To provide feeding-bottles and perambulators for all infants under twelve months whose fathers are at the front!' And she's going to have a 'Royal Fancye Faire' for that!"

In her excitement she jumped up and went to the window to read the objectionable announcement over again.

"Not a mention of Me anywhere!" she said, with a pettish stamp of her foot. "It's too bad! And I'm sure the woman who writes these things actually lives on me. Drops in to lunch, makes me ask her to dinner, takes me to dressmakers, who, of course, pay her for bringing me, and yet with all my good nature she isn't a bit grateful—she does nothing for me. The fact is, I must do something for myself. But what shall it be?"

She sat down—or rather she "dropped" languidly into a chair with that particular scented rustle of herself which she had long practiced and loved—and meditated. Taking up one of the fashionable weeklies which cater especially to the feminine world, her brows puckered vexedly as on its first page she saw the idealized picture of a lady with a turned-up nose and a tiara, labeled "The Marquise Dégagée," and read the following interesting article:

TOMMY'S BABY

The Marquise Dégagée, who is such a well-known favorite in aristocratic circles ("What a lie!" ejaculated Mrs. Arteroyd. "She was never heard of till last season when Lady Pawperse started 'running' her!"), is organizing a charming "Fancye Faire," which will take place in the rooms of the Hotel Beaumonde early next month. The object of the festival is to raise an "Infants' Fund," which will provide feeding-bottles, bone-rings, teething-pads and other necessaries, including perambulators, for all infants under twelve months whose fathers are at the front. Royalty, always ready whenever a kind action is concerned, has extended its gracious patronage to the function, and Herr Bankumopf, violinist to His Serene Highness Prince Dummer-Esel, will give his valuable services to the entertainment gratuitously. He has graciously signified his intention of being present at the opening ceremony. In order not to delay the useful progress of this deserving charity, all mothers in need of feeding-bottles, "prams," and other baby-comforts are requested to send in their names, together with a copy of their marriage certificate and the number of their husbands' regiments, to the honorary secretary, Miss Jane Muddleup, at the residence of the Marquise Dégagée, Belgrave Square. The Marquise Dégagée is, as everybody knows, a true daughter of the old French nobility, and this generous interest of hers in "Tommy's baby" will do much to improve the somewhat strained relations existing just now between France and England. The Marquise has written a touching poem for the occasion, and one of the special features of the "Fancye Faire" will be her own recitation of it, in that pretty broken English which, as hosts of her social friends are aware, makes her conversation so peculiarly charming. We are permitted to produce one verse of this dainty and delicately humorous lyric:

TOMMY'S BÉBÉ

Hélas! Le pauvre bébé!
What will its muzzer do?
It is sans la bouteille
Which it suck all ze day through!
Hélas! Le pauvre bébé!
It can do nozing but cry,
For its fazer, ze "Tommy," has gone,
Saying "adieu," by-by!

We must not forget to mention that Messrs. Shrewd & Sly, makers of perambulators to the Royal family, have kindly given one of their "Empire Model Prams" to be raffled for, for the benefit of the fund. Any one sending a postal order for one shilling will receive an elegantly mounted photograph of "Tommy's Pram," together with a beautiful copy, printed in mezzotint, with a specially designed "Art" cover, of the Marquise Dégagée's appealing verses. We recommend the public to lose no time in sending their shillings to Miss Jane Muddleup, who will, as far as possible, attend to each applicant in turn. No loyal mother and mistress of an English home should be without the picture of "Tommy's Pram" and the inspiring lyric of "Tommy's Bébé."

Mrs. Arteroyd gave a short, contemptuous laugh.

"Inspiring lyric! Stuff and rubbish! What absolute gibberish!"

She read the "appealing" stanza again:

Hélas! Le pauvre bébé!
What will its muzzer do?
It is sans la bouteille
Which it suck all ze day through!
Hélas! Le pauvre bébé!
It can do nozing but cry,
For its fazer, ze "Tommy," has gone,
Saying "adieu," by-by!

She threw down the journal in a rage—a real rage this time.

"Detestable little cat!" she said. "I can see her at it! Dressed by Worth, of course, and with all her diamonds on, reciting her trash before that ridiculous old Dummer-Esel, who doesn't know the difference between verse and prose—mincing and smirking and giving herself all the airs of a Paris stage soubrette! And Royalty is going to take her up, is it? Not if I know it! It shall take me up first!"

Her eyes flashed. She looked at herself in the glass—ran her white fingers through her "Titian Gloire" hair, and pulled it over on either side of her ears till it looked wild and wonderful, opened her eyelids wide, blinked them to note the effect of her long eyelashes, then smiled languishingly at her own reflection and said:

"I will do a poem!"

In this observation she strictly preserved her honesty. She did not say, even to herself, that she would "think" a poem, or "write" a poem. She said she would "do" a poem. And she did. She shut herself up in her room all day and went to work. She happened to have an unusually large collection of music-hall ditties and "soldiers' songs," which had been sung in happier times by her absent husband. She turned these over, perused them carefully, and eliminated "bits" therefrom. It was hard work, but she persevered and, like a child piecing a puzzle together, she fitted in lines and halves of lines until, by dint of close consideration and painstaking study of the music hall "models," she hit out something like a feeble imitation.

And finally, after making herself quite feverish and thirsty with worry and fatigue and the confusion of brain resulting from "variety" ballad-mixtures, she succeeded in

She said she would "do" a poem. And she did

"arranging" the following colloquial and effective stanzas, much to her own satisfaction:

Hullo, Tommy! Wheer ye off to?
I'm a leavin' old England's shore,
I'm ordered on active service
An' mebbe I'll come back no more.
I'm bound to polish off Kruger,
'Twill be a tough job, old pal,
I don't want to give no trouble—
But—just look after my gal!

Refrain—Just look after my gal, will ye?
While I'm frontin' the fire an' the foe—
Like a good old pal, look after my gal,
An' Gawd bless ye wheerever I go!

"That will do as a beginning!" said Mrs. Arteroyd, nibbling anxiously at the pencil with which she had "produced" these lines.

She bit her pencil again and thought, then glanced over a few more music hall songs and went on:

She's a fond an' a lovin' creetur,
Not "on the strength" you bet,
An' 'tis 'ard to be leavin' her lonely,
Though I hopes we'll be married yet.
But there's death lurking down in the kopjes,
And graves in the golden Transvaal—
Never mind! It's for Queen and country—
But—just look after my gal!

Refrain—Just look after my gal, will ye?
While I'm frontin' the fire an' the foe—
Like a good old pal, look after my gal,
An' Gawd bless ye wheerever I go!

Having got thus far, Mrs. Arteroyd paused and considered. She looked at the clock and saw that its hands pointed to five, nearly the time for afternoon tea. And she had been "making verses" ever since mid-day, with only a brief interval for lunch! Her face was hot and feverish, her lips dry, her brain—her brain?—yes, her brain was actually getting "fagged." She knew now what literary geniuses suffer when they overtax their nervous forces.

"Positively I look quite tired!" she said, gazing at herself in the convenient mirror to which she always turned in moments of harassment; "I have worked hard! I don't think I'll do any more Tommy-poetry now; I can finish it tomorrow. I'd better go to see Mrs. Long-Adder at once. She's 'off work,' and as sick as she can be of not showing herself. I'm sure she'll be glad of a chance to come forward with 'Tommy's Gal.' 'Tommy's Gal!' That must be the title of the thing, of course! That, and no other!" She wrote it down and smiled at it admiringly. "Isn't it splendid! 'Tommy's Gal!' Won't it just draw! All the idiotic women who have managed to get 'left' by Tommies, civil and military, will cry, that is, if Mrs. Long-Adder can be persuaded to recite it. Oh, she must do it! With that peaky face of hers, and monstrous Chinese eyes, and thick wedges of all-colored hair coming over her ears, she will be a succès d'enthousiasme! And so shall I!"

Her smile widened into an open dazzle of white teeth, which irritable and unimpressionable persons might have called a triumphant grin, and enveloping herself in a mysterious and wonderful cloak, all frills, old lace and sable-tails, she drove off in a quick hansom to a certain little flat somewhere about Victoria Street, which for the moment was the residence of the heart-enslaving, eye-fascinating caprice of the stage, Mrs. Long-Adder. Much of the charm of this lady consisted in the delicious vagueness and mystery of her surroundings. She came "from America." What part of America she came from did not transpire. She had a husband—somewhere—but who he was, and how he "fixed up" things for himself also did not transpire. Mrs. Long-Adder was by way of being an actress; that is to say, she could not act. She wore gowns, and glided about on the stage in them. London went mad over her. Royalty bent the knee. The Spread Eagle Conqueror, a society journal published in New York, called her "our matchless American beauty," like a new sort of cigarette. And she, who was "not received" in the intelligent circles of American culture, had a distinctly "good time" of it in England. Mrs. Arteroyd found her reclining in a long sofa-chair, or chair-sofa, whatever the piece of "art" furniture may be called, arrayed in a serpentine tea-gown of diamanté lace over satin rayonnant, and if Mrs. Arteroyd smelt like one muskrat, Mrs. Long-Adder smelt like two. The celebrated stage siren arose as her visitor entered, and extended a white hand, admirably manicured. And then both perfumed ladies embraced—that sisterly embrace of social feeling—in which the one woman looks gracefully over the shoulder of the other and breathes a gentle "Cat!" to the neutral air.

"How sweet of you to come!" murmured Mrs. Long-Adder cooingly. "I have been so dull! Alone all day! Such an unusual thing for me!"

Mrs. Arteroyd smiled discreetly, but said nothing. Sitting down by the chair-sofa she critically studied the woman, who was reported in club parlance to "have old Dummer-Esel under her thumb."

"Not a bit good-looking, really," she commented inwardly. "It's all her get-up. Put her hair quite plain and dress her like an ordinary respectable matron, and she'll be downright ugly. Two of her front teeth are false, I see—and her skin is simply covered—covered with that new Paris mixture which 'defies detection.' Her hair is certainly quite wonderful—she must have tried all the new tints on it in turn. I suppose it's the Chinese eyes that 'take'—horrid Mongolian thing! Anyway, she's the only person possible for my business."

And, forthwith, putting on all her own airs and graces, and talking in softly confidential tones, she plucked out the heart of her mystery at once, and asked Mrs. Long-Adder to recite publicly the "poem" she had written on Tommy's Gal.

Mrs. Long-Adder looked at her in a sort of innocent child-like wonder.

"You have written a poem?" she said, with just the faintest unkind emphasis on the pronoun "you."

Mrs. Arteroyd flushed and bit her lip. Then she laughed sweetly.

"Yes. It's so easy, you know, to write about Tommy! Everybody can do it."

Mrs. Long-Adder laughed, too. Not because she was particularly moved to laughter, but because she wanted to show how much more artistic and melodious her laugh was in comparison to Mrs. Arteroyd's.

"That is quite true," she said, half closing her "Mongolian" eyes. "And 'Tommy's Gal' is a good title. I like it. Have you the poem with you?"

"Only two verses," answered Mrs. Arteroyd. "I thought it better to see if you liked them before doing any more. But I can easily turn out half a dozen ——"

"Oh, no! Please, no. Four will be quite sufficient," said

—and extended a white hand, admirably manicured

Mrs. Long-Adder. "The public, especially the cultured public, will never stand more than four verses of anything. Let me hear the first two."

Thus adjured, Mrs. Arteroyd began, as stagily as she could:

"Hullo, Tommy! Wheer ye off to?"

And Mrs. Long-Adder lay back among her silken cushions and listened, blinking sleepily through her long, black lashes, the while a faint, half-satiric, half-pleased expression came and went on her face, which certain of her admirers called "so weirdly beautiful." Before the second verse was ended she arose up to her full height in a dramatic attitude of inspired resolution, while the satin rayonnant and the diamanté lace fell around her in sweeping, glorious, glittering folds. She saw her game and was prepared to play it.

"That will do," she said. "Yes, it has every chance of a draw. I think I can manage it."

She moved to and fro, softly and swishingly.

"Yes; finish it." And through the tangles of her hair she smiled a bewildering smile. "There's a bazar going to be held at the Gilded Rooms for the benefit of Tommy next week. I'll offer to recite it there, dressed in khaki."

"You will?" cried Mrs. Arteroyd, rapidly considering how that "weird" lady would look "in khaki," and as rapidly deciding that she must have her own way, anyhow. "You really will! And do you think the Prince ——"

"Dummer-Esel? Of course! He will do anything to please me!" said Mrs. Long-Adder. "You may be quite sure he will come and hear me. But you know you must give me a hundred guineas for the job."

"Must I?" And Mrs. Arteroyd's face fell a little.

"Why, of course you must! You must pay me, and I shall give the money to the Fund. That's how these things are done."

"Oh, very well," said Mrs. Arteroyd hurriedly. "I don't mind ——"

"I should think you didn't! It will be a splendid advertisement for you—I mean for your pretty poem! Now, do please go home and finish it as charmingly as you have begun; get it type-written and send it to me at once, with your check. I'll manage all the rest for you! It will be an immense success—simply immense!"

"Do you really think so?" asked Mrs. Arteroyd eagerly, as she arose to go.

"I am sure of it! By the way, your husband is at the front, isn't he?"

"Yes. Jack is somewhere near Ladysmith, I believe."

"Ah! That makes it all the more interesting! Now do go home and finish 'Tommy's Gal.' My recitation of it will quite take the color off the Marquise Dégagée's Fancye Faire!"

"Ah-h-h-h!" And Mrs. Arteroyd drew a sharp breath.

Mrs. Long-Adder's Chinese eyes glittered—she laughed.

"I hate that Marquise. Don't you?"

For the moment Mrs. Arteroyd felt that she loved Mrs. Long-Adder. But she was discreet.

"She is very—er—very—er—well—pushing!" she said cautiously.

"Pushing! Oh, that's nothing. I admire push. You must push nowadays if you want to be anywhere. But she is so—so vulgar! So very theatrical in private life! Yes!—your poem is lovely! Good-by, dear. What an exquisite cloak!"

Moved by their mutual detestation of the Marquise Dégagée, these dear women kissed each other again—this time without looking over each other's shoulders, and Mrs. Arteroyd departed in high satisfaction.

In a few days everything was arranged as triumphantly as the most ambitious advertisement seeker could desire. Mrs. Arteroyd finished her "poem" effectively, thus:

I ain't much given to blubberin'
But a somethin' blinded my eye
When that there gal came to the station
Last night to wish me good-by!
An' now 'ere I am at Southampton
Under orders from bloomin' Pall Mall,
An' we sails in a hour for Cape Town—
So—just look after my gal!

Refrain—Just look after my gal, will ye?
While I'm frontin' the fire an' the foe—
Like a good old pal, look after my gal,
An' Gawd bless ye wheerever I go!

If I fall, of course I'll fall fightin'
For the honor an' name of the Flag,
An' I'll only be one of ten thousand
Who'll die for that rummy old rag!
But we're off. Good-by, England! I'll trust ye!
The great British Nation's my pal!
Pass the hat round! and say when I'm done for,
"We'll all look after his gal!"

Refrain—Yes, England, look after my gal, will ye?
While I'm frontin' the fire an' the foe—
Be a faithful pal, and look after my gal,
An' Gawd bless ye wheerever I go!

When Mrs. Long-Adder heard the final verse her delight knew no bounds. She at once saw what capital could be made out of calling "the great British Nation" the "pal" of Tommy Atkins, and giving his "gal" in trust to England. What a point for patriotic pathos! She practiced the inflections of her voice before a mirror.

"Pass the hat around!" This, with commanding fervor, accompanied by the instant action of lifting the hat from the head, and holding it out to the audience. "And say when I'm done for." Tears in the voice here, with a quickly effective droop of the head and a faint gasp. Then with a burst of enthusiasm and tenderness, "We'll all look after his gal!"

"It will go like wildfire," said Mrs. Long-Adder to herself, as she tried on her "khaki" uniform. "Simply like wildfire! That woman Arteroyd is too stupid for anything. She thinks she has worked out a good trick for herself, and so she has, in a way, but she doesn't seem to see one bit what a first-rate business she is starting me on!"

And, acting on this resolve, she very soon set the ball rolling. London, like a big child waiting to be amused, arose to the occasion; and the forthcoming bazar at the Gilded Rooms, when "the beautiful Mrs. Long-Adder" would recite "an exquisite poem by the gifted Mrs. Arteroyd, whose gallant husband, Colonel John Arteroyd, V. C., is now fighting for England's glory in South Africa," became the talk of the town. The Marquise Dégagée heard of it, and nearly fainted. The bazar would actually take place before her "Fancye Faire"—before she could have the chance of reciting "Tommy's Bébé" in the presence of His Highness Prince Dummer-Esel! This was an unlooked-for catastrophe. And the strained relations between France and England were not improved by the contretemps. However, there was no help for it, and the deeply-disappointed authoress of "Tommy's Bébé" had to conceal her chagrin under an appearance of indifference when the world of fashion poured into her rooms in the kindly way the world of fashion has, and told her of her triumphant rival, of the splendor of the preparations at the Gilded Rooms; how "poor old Dummer-Esel" was really quite off his head with excitement; what interest he was taking in the affair! How Her Highness of Gottdenken was going! How the Countess of Tiddlywinks would be there! How the Duchess of Gloriosa would have a stall!

How that delightful dancer would assist in the selling of cigarettes—and Mrs. Long-Adder!—oh, yes! Mrs. Long-Adder's recitation would be "the thing of the day!"

"And Mrs. Arteroyd," said the breathless gossips, "is simply wonderful! She wrote the poem that Mrs. Long-Adder is to recite!—fancy that! And that poor man of hers at the front! And she's got a gown from Paris that's perfectly gorgeous! And I know the man who does her coiffure, and he told me the other day that he was sure she was going to be a social favorite, as she had just bought three new tails of hair! Think of that!—three new tails! And such a gown! My dear, it makes one's mouth water! And where she gets the money, heaven knows! For that poor man at the front has only got three thousand a year!"

"He may be dead by this time!" said the Marquise with a pretty little shudder. "Poor ting! He may be dead!"

For a moment there was silence. The crowd of fashionable chatterers felt distinctly uncomfortable.

The Marquise smiled; she had made an effect, and she was pleased.

"Yes, he may be dead!" she repeated. "And if ze news come while ze bazar go on, hélas! Come and have some tea!"

The noisy voices and laughter broke out again. The sudden spell of horror was dispersed. And a week later the society throng rushed to the Bazar at the Gilded Rooms, to see and to be seen, to watch Prince Dummer-Esel with slavish zeal, to criticise the lovely Mrs. Long-Adder, and to congratulate Mrs. Arteroyd on "Tommy's Gal." And truly Mrs. Arteroyd was in her glory. She was quite clever enough to perceive that Mrs. Long-Adder meant to make capital for herself out of the business, and she had previously determined that having paid a hundred guineas to be "talked about," talked about she would be. And she spared no pains to win her object. Her dress was a "creation" of some wonderful clinging stuff of delicate amber shades softly interwoven, impressing the eye with the suggestion of early primroses, and it fitted like a glove. Men said—poor, dear, deluded men!—"A fine figure of a woman!" And women eyed her with that casual contempt which is the greatest compliment ill-dressed dames can pay to a well-dressed one. When presented to Prince Dummer-Esel she curtsied with a fine carelessness, and gave him an upward smile of childlike, questioning innocence.

"We are going to give you a wreath of laurels, Mrs. Arteroyd," he graciously observed. "He—he—he—ha—ha! We are going to present you with the symbol of fame!—ha—ha! Pretty idea, isn't it?—he—he! Mrs. Long-Adder suggested it—ha—ha—woman of ideas, Mrs. Long-Adder—a woman of ideas! Hum—ha! We shall have a collection for 'Tommy's Gal' in Mrs. Long-Adder's hat after your poem has been recited—in her hat—ha—ha!—the regular South African hat, you know, that goes with the khaki uniform—he—he! I shall put a tenner into the hat—yes!—ha—ha! Mrs. Long-Adder's hat!—he—he—he—he! And instead of a bouquet we shall give you a laurel wreath! You can keep it, you see—he—ha! Hang it up in the drawing-room at home till your husband comes back—ha—ha! He'll have some laurels too, then, I daresay! Got a V. C., has he? Good—good! Yes, very good! Ha—ha!"

And with these royal and distinguished remarks he took his seat in front of the audience, and Mrs. Arteroyd had the satisfaction of being invited to sit beside him. Then there was a flourish of trumpets, a bit of Soldiers of the Queen played by the band, and then—and then, amid a burst of frantic applause, Mrs. Long-Adder stepped upon a platform gorgeous with palms and exotics, and showed herself arrayed in khaki uniform. The plaudits were deafening. Mrs. "Tommy" Long-Adder saluted. Prince Dummer-Esel grew apoplectically crimson with enthusiasm, and she turned one of her Mongolian eyes sideways upon him with a killing brilliancy. Then she began the doggerel lines, "Hullo, Tommy! Wheer ye off to?" reciting them with all the vulgar emphasis of that cheap, forced, sham sentiment which is the only emotional quality that succeeds nowadays in winning the attention of that still more cheap, forced, sham institution known as "smart society."

Away in South Africa, far removed from all "social" hypocrisies, but on the bare, brown veldt, and under the sickening scorch of a pitilessly hot sun, two men, friends and comrades in arms, were exploring the ground together, and anxiously surveying the Boer position. They had made their way cautiously along as extemporized scouts from the British camp to one particular spot which seemed a sheltered coign of vantage, to see if they could form any idea as to the extent of the enemy's defenses. One of them, dark and broad-shouldered, lay flat, chest downward, on the grass, rifle in hand, looking up at his companion, who, tall and fair, and of an imposing figure, stood erect, gazing out far ahead with something of a dreamy expression softening the light of his keen gray eyes.

"I say, Arteroyd, hadn't you better lie low?" said the recumbent man. "You need not make yourself a target for any marksman who may be inclined to try his aim."

"They have ceased firing for the present," and Colonel John Arteroyd, V. C., calmly took out his field-glasses and prepared to adjust them.

"That ridge opposite is deserted."

As he spoke he glanced down at his friend and smiled.

"Jack!" Silence!

DRAWN BY HARRISON FISHER

"Dandy Ferrers knows how to make himself comfortable, I think, even under possible fire. I shall have to report you at home as a funk. Lie low, indeed! However, you're no safer than I am if a shell comes our way."

Captain James Ferrers, called "Dandy" by all his friends at home, on account of his somewhat curious and capricious taste in neckties, laid down his rifle and took out his cigar case.

"I suppose," he said slowly, as he lit a precious Havana, one of the last he had or would have till he returned to England, if he ever returned, "I suppose you really wouldn't care much? You've got the V. C."

"Yes, I've got the V. C." And Colonel Arteroyd unscrewed and polished his field-glasses with scrupulous attention. "It's the best thing a soldier can have. But it isn't everything."

Dandy Ferrers reddened with a quick sense of compunction.

"No—of course—I forgot—there's your wife——"

Arteroyd looked at him steadfastly.

"Yes, there's my wife; and she is the very reason why—as you say—I shouldn't care much."

"Isn't she good to you, old chap?" queried Dandy sympathetically.

Colonel Arteroyd smiled a trifle sadly.

"Good to me? Oh, yes, I suppose so. But—you see—when I married her—I—I loved her. That is what she didn't understand. When a man loves a woman—really loves her, you know——"

Dandy nodded gravely.

"Well, then, he likes to think of her as something altogether sacred; something removed and different to himself. We don't want women to be angels—no—but very near it. I wanted my wife to love me as I loved her—I wanted to feel that she was proud of me, and that if I could do a good thing at any time she would be glad. A sort of giving her my laurels, you know, if I got any. Well—I soon found out she never would be glad that way. She wanted everything I couldn't get. She went in for society. I hate society. I can't smile when I'm told to. I can't tell lies thirteen to the dozen; and unless you can do that sort of thing society doesn't want you. Then our little child—a boy—died when he was two. He was a jolly little chap—he got very fond of me—used to play with my moustache and kiss me with all his little might——" Here Arteroyd paused and put his field-glasses up to his eyes. Dandy Ferrers puffed a big blue ring of cigar smoke up into the burning sky, and thought it likely that the Colonel was not taking a particularly clear "sight" for the moment.

"Yes, that ridge is deserted," resumed Arteroyd coolly; "I thought I saw a moving speck, but I was mistaken. I believe they've got no more ammunition up there."

"Go on with your story," said Ferrers softly.

"Oh, my story! It isn't much of a story, old chap! The little kiddie died, as I said. That rather knocked me up—left me a bit lonely. Then my wife—well, she was all the time anxious to be a great figure in society. I wanted a home; she didn't care about it. She said that housekeeping was a bore, and that she liked hotels better. And I—well, I felt myself rather in her way. So I was glad to be ordered out on active service. You see, I want her to be happy—for me, nothing matters."

Ferrers was silent.

"I have often thought," went on Arteroyd musingly, "especially since I've been out here on these great, bare stretches of bare, up land, without a tree in sight, that dear isn't the worst part of life. There's a God somewhere, Dandy!"

"Of course there is!" answered Dandy promptly.

"When all the color and gladness have gone out of the world for a man," said Arteroyd, talking to himself more than to his friend, "when he doesn't see any hope or beauty anywhere, and when the one thing—the best thing of all—love—has failed him, and left it all he's done a bit of service to his country and lived as straight as he can—then I think death is often sent to him just in the nick of time to save him from growing hard, and mean, and bitter, and to take his soul to his Maker while it's fairly clean and sweet."

"Ps——st!" A sharp report, a sudden hiss through the air, a small but vivid flash of fire, a smothered cry——

"Look out, Dandy! Take care of yourself! Good-by!"

And Arteroyd's tall figure, erect a moment before, rolled over and over on the ground, and then lay motionless.

Reckless of all danger for himself, Ferrers rushed to his side.

"Jack!"

Silence! A peaceful smile rested on the lips of his fallen comrade, but no sound came from them—no sound would ever come from them again! Shot straight through the heart, death had been instantaneous, and Ferrers, dropping on his knees by the slain man, broke out sobbing, and was not ashamed of his tears. He cared nothing if the same Boer marksman who had "picked out" one of the Queen's bravest officers with such deadly aim, should make for him as well. Almost he hoped for the same fate, and once or twice looked longingly toward the ridge from whence the fatal bullet had sped. But there was not a creature in sight; whoever it was that had hit his mark so well had retired, apparently satisfied, and the unkind sun blazed fiercely and furnace-like through clear and smokeless ether. Like the salt drops of sorrow blistering his cheeks, poor Dandy reverently composed the limbs of the dead, and, crossing the yet warm hands upon the breast, unsheathed the sword that had so often flashed aloft in fight, as a signal of courage and of victory, and laid it, hilt heartward, between the stiffening fingers. Then, planting his own rifle upright in the ground to mark and guard the spot till he could return with help to bear the body into camp, he paused:

"Good-by, Jack!" he said hoarsely, and with a simple boyish tenderness he kissed the dead man's forehead. "Good-by! You said you didn't care much—and—considering everything—I don't suppose you did. But you got your V. C.! And God knows you deserved it!"

The same evening that saw the Colonel's body wrapped in a soldier's blanket and committed to a South African grave "the beautiful Mrs. Arteroyd," as she was now admittedly and eagerly entitled, owing to the proud fact of having been seated next to His Royal Highness of Dummer-Esel, stood a great social success. Her verses, "Tommy's Gal," were received with hysterical enthusiasm, and the collection made in Mrs. Long-Adder's hat, after the recitation, amounted to two or three hundred pounds. An enterprising newspaper proprietor offered to buy the manuscript and "run it up to auction" for one of the Tommy funds, which offer Mrs. Arteroyd condescendingly accepted. And then a classic wreath of laurels, tied with the English colors, was presented to her by Prince Dummer-Esel himself, with his own royal hands, accompanied by the gracious words:

"You must keep your laurels for your husband, Mrs. Arteroyd! Add them to his V. C.! Ha, ha! Add them to his V. C.!"

It was a proud moment! Expanding with her inward sense of elation, she received the garland with a studied affectation of graceful humility, and curtsied beneath the sunshine of the royal smile. Then, swinging the wreath picturesquely on one arm, she raised her head, flashed her eyes and glanced around with an air of amused indifference at the unsuccessful and discomfited women present, and in honey-sweet tones accepted an invitation to a little supper party at which His Highness of Dummer-Esel, with Mrs. Long-Adder, would be present. But——

Unfortunately there is always a "but." And it most often comes in when it is least wanted. Solomon's lament on the vanity of human wishes is the universal daily moan. And the disappointments which sometimes fall to the lot of society schemers and notoriety hunters almost call for a new Solomon to bewail them. Only two days after her triumph, when "the beautiful Mrs. Arteroyd" was just pleasantly engaged in reading a glowing description of herself and her gown in a pictorial weekly, a telegram, not of the appearance of every-day telegrams, was handed to her. Its envelope was red, of the hue of blood. Her heart gave a sudden throb of fear as she tore it open. Its contents were brief:

"Deeply regret Colonel John Arteroyd, V. C., killed Ladysmith."

And Colonel John Arteroyd's widow stood rigid and motionless. Her "society" laurels were withered. She would have to "look her worst in black" after all!

The New-Rich Element in New York Society

By Mrs. Burton Harrison

—a curiously shifting show

A MYSTERY apparently insoluble by time lies in the methods employed by rich and previously unknown families to get to the front of observation in New York society.

Every decade sees the establishment among us as fashionables of some who in former years were content to play a very modest part indeed in the social scheme. The parterre boxes at the Metropolitan Opera House are, for example, a curiously shifting show; people who once looked up or down at their occupants from less exalted positions in the house with a respect almost amounting to awe are now preening themselves complacently in this coveted coign of vantage. For it is here that they consider it of supreme importance to be seen in order to fix their social status. The boxes above, the stalls below, are equally comfortable, eminently respectable, but of no value by comparison to the Social Strugglers. One has only to sit among the rank and file of the audience at a performance at the opera to hear with astonishment the talk going on in the entr'actes concerning the personality of the sitters in this lowest range of the golden semicircle. If they were born royalties the interest could not be greater in identifying them. The mistakes made in fitting the popular ideals read about in the society columns of the newspapers to the people seen are often supremely funny. There is just the same zeal about it, the same eagerness of interest, the same superiority of the well-informed over the ignorant that may be noted in a crowd watching the great ladies of the British aristocracy go by in their carriages to a Drawing-Room at Buckingham Palace. It seems to be inherent in human nature, this desire to pay homage to the passing show, this reverence for the idol of higher place. Our democracy does not in the least prevent the evil—for evil it is—in a community where the social standards are absolutely superficial and material. And the harm it does is far greater to the youth who are forming their ideas upon it than to mature people who better understand its value.

THE PATIENT WAITERS WITHOUT THE GATES

A parterre box secured from the owners for certain evenings and days of the series of operas does not, however, carry the aspirants very far. A new "great house," built on or just off the Park Lane of Fifth Avenue (on the east side of Central Park) may be reared in the highest style of modern architecture, and decorated within by artists and experts acknowledged to be of the première classe. It may hang in its many windows curtains of antique lace of rare and curious web; it may be equipped with a host of well-trained servants; vehicles and horses of correct elegance may every day be marshaled before its portal; but the proprietors still remain outside the pale they long to enter. They patiently come and go like unrecognized spirits. It is pitiful to see their dull and lifeless faces in public. Instead of surrounding themselves with the friends of a lifetime, throwing open their splendid new homes for the entertainment of those who will flock to them with eager homage, they remain in obstinate retirement, sighing for the "unattained, far off and dim" portals of smart society. Truly this weakness, of casting off early acquaintances as soon as the chance presents itself for a step upward on the social ladder, is so common as to be patent to all eyes. And the old friends looking after the Social Strugglers sadly wonder how it can be that they once shared each other's joys and sorrows, and fancied their intimacy was for a lifetime.

But boys—delightful democrats from birth!

Often the siege of society is raised by the persistent occupancy of a dwelling near some fashionable centre of summer life. But one has seen the strugglers, when it is in order for society to remove to Newport, Bar Harbor, Lenox and the like, withdraw obediently into their sumptuous cottages at these resorts, and year after year return to town unvisited. When fashion decrees a flight abroad in the springtime for shopping and sight-seeing in London and Paris, the decks of the great ocean steamers behold them assembled in pomp. They go everywhere, are met everywhere, are known by sight and name, yet are never recognized by the fashionable set.

I don't pretend to say that this is right, or just, or sensible. In our Republic it is even a ridiculous state of things. People who have created their own fortunes and carved their own riches should not exclude their followers. Yet, though among us all have equal rights, some fail in establishing those rights.

GETTING INTO SOCIETY THROUGH THE BACK DOOR

Sometimes the Social Struggler enters American society by way of a foreign country. Abroad, as everybody knows, there is a general density of comprehension as to the grades of our optimacy. Provided the American is good-looking and clever, and able to pay his or her way according to the English standard of necessity in the case, no difficulty is made about mere standing at home. English arms open to the elect and the forsaken of Fifth Avenue alike. With the stamp of a Countess' friendship, or a Prince's attentions at a fashionable Spa on the Continent, the aspirant and her mother return home to find a long-sought place. The marriage of an American girl with a foreign nobleman of distinguished lineage sometimes carries the girl's family in on the crest of the wave at home, whilst she herself remains on the other side of the waters. But the spectacle has been seen of the lady, bearing abroad one of the proudest of titles, coming home to consort with her old acquaintances who are not at all in what is called New York society. It is hardly remarkable that they so rarely do "come home." The whole scheme of their life and associations abroad is so much better and less agitating than it was in their native land. Their place is at last defined for them, and nobody questions it. The people with whom their lot is cast, after once accepting them as equals, make no further sign of inquiry on that point. But "at home" the strife still rages; the issue is still uncertain. An opening wedge that has often proved successful is a charitable enterprise shared with leaders of the coveted set. It must be a stony-hearted manager of a Fund who will refuse to smile upon a persistently generous and helpful giver and worker in her field! And if these things are accomplished in the name of Charity, the poor, the sick, the friendless of our great city have only gratitude to yield for the results.

School children have been observed to bring together their elders, long wavering apart in uncertainty of mutual relation. The friendship conceived by girls for each other is unfortunately, as a rule, most apt to follow in the lines laid down by their elders. One listens in sad surprise sometimes to the chatter of little high-bred maidens, to find that they are perfectly cool and calculating as to whom they must know and cultivate. They visit, invite, give to, and receive from only those children they will wish to know in after years, or whom they consider on the same social plane with themselves. But boys—delightful democrats from birth!—select whom they choose for their comrades and associates. They bring to their homes and demand friendly recognition for the "fellow" who has, at school or in sports, proved himself a thorough man. To such special pleading the mother and sisters do not often turn a deaf ear. And through intimacies thus created spring up the rapprochements of many different elements.

WHAT A SOCIAL BACKER CAN DO FOR ONE

The family desiring to be known in the most exclusive circles of New York does not generally attain that eminence without a long preliminary siege. There is no such thing as bounding into fashion unless propelled thither by the strenuous efforts of some leader determined that her protégée shall hit the mark. This, after all, is the one infallible method. A fairy godmother, possessed of influence and tact and persistence, can bring her people in anywhere along the line. It is to some such intermediary that one may, in looking back, attribute the introduction of many now shining lights of fashion. To be seen in company with one of the "smart set" is to have the question asked, "Who is she?" (I say "she," since it is more rarely that the males of the aspiring family go to this pains; when they do so they are apt to belong to the category of unconsidered trifles.) The great point of acquiring notice once achieved, the aim of the struggler is next to keep herself, at all costs, before the public eye. If her backer is clever, this is not difficult. Invitations given through the backer to her own friends convene them to entertainments carefully elaborated so as to furnish some things that nobody else has thought of. A spice of originality joined to unbounded expenditure of money have accomplished wonders in a single night. If there is music, it must be by the great artists of the opera. The supper must reveal prodigality in the matter of canvas-back ducks, terrapin and good champagne. If a cotillon brings the evening to a close, gifts and trinkets of actual value are apportioned to each guest. And surrounding every such scene there must be a wilderness of flowers.

The toilets and jewels of the hostess and her daughters are, needless to say, in accordance with all the rest. On this point the backer does not in general have to advise. It is the natural instinct of the American woman in any station to dress up to that above her, and the new-rich lady, on her introduction to society, is decked and glitters like a queen upon the stage. After one or two such entertainments, due and well paid heralding by the newspapers, steady appearance in her opera box supported by ladies of higher degree who possess no opera boxes, and a series of dinners mapped out for her, with guests selected by the backer, the beginner is fairly launched. Presently her sons and daughters intermarry with other longer-established families, and in the course of ten or a dozen years she is able to ask with astonishment, "Where the new people come from?"

SOME OF THE ANOMALIES OF NEW YORK SOCIETY

As to the actual metes and bounds of New York society, it would be hard, indeed, to discover them. So many of the most dignified and distinguished of our citizens have emerged directly from the shop and warehouse of a generation ago, it would not do to talk of excluding trade. Speculators, "plungers," have, before our astonished eyes, arisen from the very ranks to own palaces, world-renowned pictures, yachts and race-horses—and to consort with the high-born of the world. Men who spent all the early days of life barefoot are at present the rulers of gigantic industries, and in the daily habit of an expenditure for the pleasures of their households that seems incredible. Social potentates of both sexes are continually exalted by the too often subsidized press, of whom eye-witnesses declare the humble origin and early years of sordid toil. The quiet old families of New York, possessing moderate means, and of modest ambitions for their children, are deliberately elbowed to the wall by the new régime. They seem silenced and dazed, and unable to speak a word in protest. The professional stratum of society, liberal as are its gains by comparison with the scale of such earnings half a century ago, has no show whatever beside the fortunes of traffic and speculation. It is hopeless for the earthen pots to remonstrate against the iron ones when they jog together down the stream. Either they must give place, or be broken in the crush.

We concede, therefore, that it is only a question of time and cleverness before the new-rich occupy the first places in our land. But it cannot be said that the standards of refinement are advanced in the operation. Rather do we observe an atmosphere of garish vulgarity pervading many quarters of opulence in our town. Often is to be seen a barbaric profuseness in the tawdry display of loot accumulated in predatory forays upon the wealth of older generations. What chance beside it has the nearby gentleness of a modest life of culture and good breeding? What influence upon society have the people who illustrate these virtues? It is even almost impossible for them to instil into their own children the value of refraining from display. The minds of young people under the glamour of the ostentatious pageantry of modern fashionable life are being warped beyond reclaim.

—there are still gifts of the gods not to be acquired by merely signing checks

CASH AS A MEASURE OF SUCCESS

A salient feature of the reign of the new-rich is the habit of estimating a man's success in life solely by the money he has acquired. There are gatherings of society in New York where, if the question were asked about a fellow-citizen, "Has he been successful?" the answer would be in the negative had the person inquired about not accumulated wealth. No matter whether he had served his country as a soldier, statesman or philanthropist, had led the youth of his generation as a college president, had been an educator of the people in school or pulpit, had achieved wide renown as a jurist, had written a great book, had held multitudes enthralled by his poetry, had painted noble pictures, had advanced science or surgery, had created a leading newspaper or magazine! Nothing of all this tells. He is not a "success," because he has not piled up dollars to flaunt in the world's face!

But even in such companies the appearance of an evident gentleman—known to be of a short purse, it may be, but coming of generations of the best education that books and universities and the conventionalities of a society long trained in civilization can afford—makes its eloquent mark. True, some among the assembly of rejoicing, and therefore contented, plutocrats may regard the intruder with an uncomfortable consciousness, even resentment, that he represents what money cannot buy for the first generation. All that they have, all that they are, comes from the cash they have accrued. The wise among them are not slow to perceive there are still gifts of the gods not to be acquired by merely signing checks. And in the perception by such people of that pregnant fact the hope of our future resides.

Practical Politics for Infants

THE ingenious educational system known as the School City was invented by Wilson L. Gill, to whose efforts is largely due its success in Omaha, Chicago, Milwaukee, and other cities. On one occasion a class of urchins was being taught the mysteries of election day. One boy was made a Democratic and a second a Republican inspector; two were made poll-clerks; two watchers; two candidates, and so on. When all the tasks had been assigned a square-jawed little fellow looked up and said:

"Please, sir, I want to be a policeman and club that curly headed poll-clerk."

The HOLD-UP

By Molly Elliot Seawell

IT WAS a nondescript train that went bumping along on the short line between Wakefield, the little station on the main line where the washout had occurred, and Grand Junction, thirty miles away. It consisted of an express and baggage car, an ordinary day coach, and the special Pullman in which Senator Walford and a party of friends were on their way to the Republican National Convention, in Philadelphia. When the train on the main line had been unable to proceed farther on account of the washout, and it was decided to wait over until daylight, the Senator concluded to cast in his lot with the ramshackle train on the short line. It would enable him to intercept the Chicago express, which would get him to Philadelphia in time.

A concert party, consisting of the soprano, her manager, and violinist, and a professor, with three lady teachers under his wing, on their way to take the steamer for Europe, had also decided to make a strike for the Chicago express, and were ensconced in the day coach.

Although it was the middle of June, the evening was raw and damp, and as Senator Walford looked out of the window of the Pullman he saw around him only the wide expanse of prairie, with nothing to intercept the view between the monotonous landscape and the dull, low-hanging night sky. They were comfortable enough, however, in the Pullman. The Senator did the thing handsomely when he invited a number of his friends to accompany him to the convention. There were a couple of white-aproned waiters to take care of the inner man, and a porter to take care of the outer one. The Pullman appeared to have a good deal of solid enjoyment aboard. There were half a dozen men sitting about, smoking and reading. In the stateroom at the end of the car a party of five delegates to the convention sat around a table, deep in the great American game; and according to the unwritten law that it must be played in the shirt-sleeves, they had taken off their coats. Perfect silence reigned except for the bump, bump of the train over the rough roadbed. Senator Walford—a clean-cut, well-set-up man, dressed with that immaculate care which a bachelor bestows upon his person after passing his fortieth birthday—was looking over some sheets of typewritten manuscript which lay before him on the table. He read with an air of not unmixed satisfaction, and then, turning to a gentleman who was stretched out on the opposite seat, enjoying himself with a novel and a cigar, said:

"These speeches at national conventions are all well enough when the time comes and you see the surging crowd before you, and hear the roar of applause, and find yourself in the midst of the shouting and the captains, but when you read them in cold blood beforehand they seem to be all assertion, pure and simple."

"That's all right," responded the Representative from the Eighth District, who hoped some time or other to stand in Senator Walford's shoes; "men, at a time like that, won't listen to argument. Assertion is what they want, and bold assertion, too. We have to make promises, and then endeavor to keep up to them. Just try a Supreme Court argument upon a national convention and see how it works."

The Senator smiled.

"I understand," he said. "All the same, reading this manuscript over at the present juncture is a good deal like putting on one's evening clothes and starting in to drink champagne at eight o'clock in the morning."

While he was speaking the door of the car which communicated with the day coach opened and a tall, lean and lanky man, with sleek black hair plastered down over his ears, entered. As he slouched forward into the light, Senator Walford was pleased with his face. It had a kind of shrewd simplicity that was evident at a glance, and he came forward with that typical American ease which nothing confounds or abashes. Here was a man who, as Mr. Kipling says, would

> "Greet the embarrassed gods, nor fears
> To shake the iron hand of Fate,
> Or match with Destiny for beers."

The stranger advanced, seated himself with calm familiarity in the seat in front of the Senator, and, pointing to the manuscript, said:

"Speech?"

"Yes," said the Senator, smiling.

"On what subject?" blandly inquired the stranger.

"It's a speech that I am to deliver at the Republican National Convention."

"And," said the stranger, "you are looking over it to see if it's all right. Well, I don't expect to be at that convention myself, but I know how you feel. I myself am preparing an address to be delivered at an agricultural fair, including a baby show, not very far away from here. It costs me a lot of thinking—that speech."

The Senator, with a well-bred smile, indicated that he recognized the relationship between his own speech and that of the lanky gentleman before him.

"This is Senator Walford, I believe."

"It is," replied the Senator, recognizing a familiar Western type.

"And I," said his visitor, with a smile which showed a row of fine, even teeth and lighted up his black eyes, "am Mr. Reuben Smithers. I might, indeed, call myself the Reverend Reuben Smithers, because I once had charge of a church on the outskirts of Chicago. It was pretty near the Missouri line. Great town, that. The Trustees, however, put up the pew rents just at a time when there was a slump in pork, and when pork went down and religion went up my congregation, sir, melted away—just melted away. But I have never lost my interest in religious matters, and I sometimes take, sir, the liberty which I once possessed as a preacher, and that is what has brought me into this car."

The Senator was delighted with his man.

"Go on, if you please," said he. "I am very glad to see you, Mr. Smithers, and I hope you will make yourself at home. If you were not a clergyman I should offer you a cigar and something else besides."

"Don't," said Mr. Smithers. "Don't do it. I took the pledge many years ago, and I have never broken it. My present profession is one which demands the utmost sobriety. And as for smoking, it upsets the nerves—I don't care what the smokers say—and in my profession we require the utmost steadiness of nerve." He did not, however, mention what his profession was.
